As St. Augustine says, even Councils may reverse their teachings, even General ones. They appeal to the Second Council of Nice, once rejected in England, France. That Council decreed not only veneration but worship due to divine images, relative perhaps, but in a few centuries the whole Roman Church, with prostrating multitudes only too eagerly following, followed the words of the Roman Pontifical, our Anglo-Catholic brethren (?) so eagerly follow, which prints "That supreme divine worship (Latria) is due to the Cross (Rome, 1596, Pp. 67; 672). See also identical declarations of Aquinas in the Summa, Bonaventure, followed by Tridentine theologians, to protest against heresy by fire in England in pre-Reformation time.

No, a duplicate or revised Prayer Book will contain such idolatrous rubrics. Keep the old Prayer Book; let our bishops be true bishops and defend its doctrine!

SEND IT TO OTHERS.

Mr. Editor:

I have been disappointed by not receiving my paper since I came to Boston. I received the paper of February 11, just as I left Roanoke, and ordered my paper to be changed to Boston. I have been a regular subscriber since December, 1868, and it was the first paper I ordered after my marriage. I married a Presbyterian, but he soon came into the Church, and was a very useful member, when we started our little church in Rocky Mount, Va. I never expect to be without my paper and must say it has been my greatest pleasure and comfort and has helped me to raise ten children. Three of my children read and love it as I do, and we all send it to others. You are growing in favor with God and man. What more could you ask?

Mrs. G. H. T. Green.

FACE FACTS.

Mr. Editor:

We must face facts. The war is upon us. The Anglo-Catholics with fierce determination are trying to make this Church over into something which it is not, and which it has not been since the Reformation.

As an old subscriber to the Southern Churchman, I hope sincerely that you will "cry aloud and spare not" in defending our Protestant heritage.

Of course you have seen in the Spirit of Missions the picture of the statue of the Virgin and Child in Calvary Church, Syracuse, the children kneeling before it, and the printed words of commendation?

It certainly seems that an explanation is due the Church from the National Council; and also that it is incumbent upon the Bishop of Central New York to tell the Church why he permits unadulterated Romanism to be taught and practiced in his diocese.

John Taylor Rose.

Atlantic City, N. J.

BEST WISHES.

Mr. Editor:

I am enclosing herewith my check for three dollars, for which continue sending me your paper as usual. I hope all our good Church people, at any rate, will continue to stand by the old paper. In some things I have not exactly agreed with you, but on the main we are together, and I hope you will keep the good work going, but fighting with no one, only stating facts and leaving them to take root where they fall on good ground.

The good old Southern Churchman has been coming into our family for generations and I want it to continue. With best wishes and prayers for your success.

E. Marshall Newton.

"I BELIEVE IN THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH."

Mr. Editor:

It must be confusing to that inarticulate mass of Church members to read the controversial articles pro and contra the Church Catholic. Here is an inflammatory article almost consigning to perdition those who stress catholicity; and they are classed as Romanists. On the other hand, a militant Protestant is placed in the category of the feeble-minded.

We find the Anglo-Catholics at one extreme, and the Protestant-Episcopalians at the other. But it seems to be a fact that in the sight of God neither is a reality. And yet what shall we do who dwell in that would-be happy land between the two grinding stones of belligerancy and who count it a gracious privilege to be born members of the Holy Catholic Church?

Some years ago in an educational conference in the Diocese of Alabama, the Bishop wrote upon the board: "Never say 'THE Church; but remember that it is the 'CHURCH'." At that moment it was a revelation of the very truth. Too often people had been heard to say: "This is THE Church"; and their lives proved that for them it was a big "the", and a little "Church". Narrowness was emphasized, and Catholicity was minimized. The human organization and idiosyncracy was exalted. The human organism and Body of Christ was slighted.

Except as a legal status or title, neither Anglo-Catholic nor Protestant Episcopal is an entity. Some people would revolt at becoming members of a Protestant Episcopalian, or of an Anglo-Catholic Church. The first would seem to be accidental, and the latter only incidental. Certainly much good ink is wasted in the bitter and militant aggressiveness on either side. It is very offensive to multitudes of silent people; and it is not conducive to the upbuilding of spiritual stamina.

Surely it is in order to emphasize the glory and richness and divineness of the Church; and to assert forcibly the truth that it is the "Holy Catholic Church", in which we declare our faith every time we participate in a Church service! We cannot be expected to keep silent when so often the Church is dragged down to the level of the two hundred and odd so-called churches that in proportion to their numbers create an increasing confusion as to what IS the Church and the Gospel!

The fact that we are Witness-bearers to the Church instituted by Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, does place upon us a responsibility to be faithful to that trust. We are commissioned to be Light-bearers. And this obligation takes precedence over any partisanry. We must be up and doing as men who "wait for their Lord".

Even the Prayer Book does not direct us to pray for the "Protestant Episcopal" Church, nor for the "Anglo-Catholic"—but we pray for the "Church". We were not baptized into either; and our ministers were not ordained into either; nor were our bishops so consecrated. But always it is "Christ's Church" or the "Church of God" or the "Holy Catholic Church". On our building its name is written: "St. John's Church." It is enough. Those who see it KNOW that it is NOT Roman, and that it is not one of the multitude of denominations; or it would be so stated. Educated people KNOW that the Church is Catholic, and that it is Episcopally governed, and that it Protests against Sin and the Devil, and every error of man!

The thing to be emphasized until it is engraved upon the minds and hearts of men IS that the Church is ONE and Only One, even though there are many methods and manners of worship and government, and there are many parts and portions separated, and varieties of selections of His teachings that are exalted or neglected. That the Church is the Body of Christ, Living, Acting—Guided by His Holy Spirit. That the Church is Catholic as is His Body, as IS Christ, the Message and Word of God. The Church is Catholic even as is Jesus, the Christ, the Catholic Saviour of the Whole World.

Randolph R. Claiborne.

MISUNDERSTAND ONE ANOTHER.

Mr. Editor:

It is good of you to recognize our unity in vital questions. One great difficulty in connection with the controversies of the Church is that we mutually misunderstand one another. I thought of that particularly in connection with Dr. McCrady's recent article on the Thirty-nine Articles in the Southern Churchman, which begins: "The recent proposal to remove the Thirty-nine Articles from the official formularies of the Church."

Now I introduced the resolution myself and I took every sort of precaution to make it clear that I did not propose either the repeal or the repudiation of the Articles, but simply that they be omitted from the Prayer Book. The authority given to them according to their title page is that they are "established". They will be equally established if the pending resolution should be adopted, and as a publisher, I should see that they were kept in print and readily available. I have no desire whatever to strike at the Articles themselves. Everybody knows that they are misleading and greatly misunderstood and written in long and involved sentences in a language of four centuries ago and that their teaching value today is almost nil. I mention this in passing simply to show how we drift apart, not so much because of actual disagreement, but because of misunderstanding. I recognize that it is entirely debatable whether the Articles should be dropped from the Prayer Book or not and it will not trouble me at all if the question should be decided in the negative; but I do wish that our good friends would distinguish between dropping them from the Prayer Book and repealing them, which are totally different questions.

I congratulate you on your increased subscriptions.

With all good wishes.

LENTEN SERMONS: Edited by Frederick J. North. Doubleday, Doran & Company, Inc., Garden City, N. Y. Cloth. Pp. 190. $2 net.

These twelve sermons by as many leading divines and preachers of England and Scotland, together, form a real contribution to the devotional literature for which there is such a demand for the season of Lent. They will prove of marked value to those who desire to make the Forty Days a time for serious thought and reflection on the "things which a Christian ought to know and believe to his soul's health".

W.

CHRIST IN THE COMMON WAYS OF LIFE: By C. S. Woodward, Canon of Westminster. With an Introduction by the Bishop of London. Longmans, Green & Company, New York. Cloth. Pp. 99. $1.

Europe was converted by the unknown witnesses—

"The unknown good who rest
In God's still memory folded deep".
—Lowell.

And it is to those quiet witnesses today that this book is addressed.

The author shows how simple Christ's teaching was, the quiet teaching "under the stars" about "our Father which art in heaven". Plain men want a simple Gospel and find it in Christianity, simple yet searching in its bearings upon our work, amusements, use of money and attitude towards social questions. There is enough dynamite in the New Testament to blow all our existing institutions to pieces, if illegitimately applied. The social message of Jesus is dynamite, to be used in the right way to revolutionize without destroying the life of the individual and of the social order. In the chapter on The Childlike Spirit the author stresses the present-day need of the four characteristics of the child—freedom from worry, hopefulness, independence of criticism, and frank spontaneity. Their loss destroys the freshness and attractiveness of Christianity. It is with the heart of a child that we enter the Kindom of Heaven here on earth, and walk in the blessed footsteps of Christ in the Common Ways of Life.

THE LIFE ETERNAL: HERE AND NOW: By Alexander Nairne, D. D., Canon of St. George's, Windsor, and Regius Professor of Divinity, Cambridge. Longmans. Cloth. Pp. 173. $1.40.

The practical aim of this book is to cheer those who mourn, by showing that eternal life is the life of spirit, not of sense, that it is not a future life, but here and now, that death does not interrupt the true communion of the soul. This, the author considers, is the doctrine of St. John's Gospel, especially as expressed in the narratives of the Last Supper, that it is in harmony with reason and experience, and is the essential faith of the Old Testament as well as of the New, and of that worldwide preparation for the Gospel which in the West has commonly been called Platonic. To the thoughtful soul in bereavement, this is a book of cheer and comfort through the clearer vision.

Fight "Romanism" in Episcopal Church.

Under the above title the New York Times reports the "petition", which the Southern Churchman has helped to circulate through its advertising section, and says in part:

Eighty-five leading laymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States have organized a revolt against permitting hereafter what they call Roman Catholic "practices" in their communion. These laymen live in all parts of the country and each is a representative citizen of his community. They all belong to what is known as the Evangelical or Liberal group in the communion, and they propose to fight what is known as the Anglo-Catholic group.

These laymen, together with twenty equally prominent women of the communion, have signed a petition to the House of Bishops and the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies asking that at the Triennial General Convention of these bodies at Washington, D. C., in October, steps be taken so that Protestant Episcopal Churches can no longer have mass, reservation and adoration of the Sacrament, prayers to the Virgin Mary, invocation of saints, "worship" of images and relics, auricular confession, the practice of penance, use of the rosary, holy water and "other ceremonies peculiar to the Church of Rome".

The petition has been sent to every vestryman in every Protestant Episcopalian Church and also to other active laymen and women who are communicants, asking for their signature.

The Triennial General Convention held at New Orleans in 1925 gave the first passage to a resolution to eliminate the Thirty-nine Articles. But canon law requires that to put this into effect will require ratification at the Washington convention.

The determination is to keep the Washington convention from ratifying the action of the New Orleans convention. A chief argument set forth is that the New Orleans action was taken when many of the members of both "houses" were absent. The one hundred and five signers represent forty-five of the seventy-two dioceses which make up the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

"This is the most important and drastic memorial offered in the Protestant Episcopal Church since the famous Protestant 'Unity' Memorial which was laid before the House of Bishops in the General Convention of 1853," said former Judge C. L. Marsilliot, of Memphis, Tenn., in a statement made public recently. Mr. Marsilliot, who is a corporation lawyer and a vestryman in Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church, Memphis, declared that while the former memorial, which was lost, sought to draw the Protestant Episcopal Church nearer to other Protestant churches, this memorial is to preserve the union of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

"The present memorialists are profoundly aroused by the organized and sectarian activities of the Anglo-Catholic party in this Church," continued Judge Marsilliot. "They are deeply grieved because of the Anglo-Catholic defiance of the laws of the Church and the introduction by them of Roman teachings and practices.

"This memorial is the expression of a nation-wide conviction on the part of the great majority of the laity that many congregations throughout the United States are being deprived of their constitutional rights by certain bishops and clergy. The laity in this Church under its constitution have coequal rights with bishops and clergy in matters of government and doctrine.

"This movement on the part of the laity may force another split in the Protestant Episcopal Church. If this comes it will not be the Evangelicals who will go out or will be forced out, unless through the accident of a political conspiracy which will deprive them of their constitutional rights."

Judge Marsilliot had reference to the split of a generation ago, when at a triennial General Convention many of the Evangelicals seceded and formed the Reformed Episcopal Church of the United States, a communion which the Evangelicals who remained in the Church have felt should have been reabsorbed by the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The present petition is credited with having been largely inspired by a pamphlet by Judge Marsilliot entitled "Shall the Protestant Episcopal Church Be Destroyed"? This bears an introduction by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Seamon of North Texas, and the Rt. Rev. Robert L. Harris, Bishop of Marquette, Mich., which is an attack on the Anglo-Catholic group.

At the request of Judge Marsilliot and a group of other Southern laymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church, most of them from Memphis and vicinity, Bishop Seaman drafted the memorial which has come to be called "The Preliminary Memorial". The revised memorial by which the laity is now to be circulated asks for exactly the same action except for the omission of a paragraph specifying what the Evangelicals call "Roman Catholic Practices".

The first signature to the preliminary petition is that of W. W. Skiddy, of this city (New York), who is treasurer of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He is a leading layman in Grace Church, Broadway and Tenth Street. Howard Townsend, is also a signer.

Field Department Conference.

Fifty representatives from forty-nine dioceses and missionary districts attended the annual Field Department conference of diocesan executive secretaries held in Taylor Hall, Racine, Wis., February 14-16. Every province was represented by at least three men. The total attendance was sixty-eight, the largest conference yet held by the Field Department and undoubtedly the most interesting from all viewpoints. The outstanding feartures of the program was the presentation of "A Review and a Prophecy", by the retiring executive secretary of the department, the Rev. R. Bland Mitchell. The rest of the program centered around discussions having to do with the General Church program for the next triennium, plans for realizing the advance work, and news from the mission fields, with careful consideration of methods, proved by experience, to be most practical in value for field operations for both national and diocesan departments.

The Bishop Rowe Foundation Fund.

The Women's Committee of the Bishop Rowe Foundation Fund is very glad to announce that the Indian's Hope Committee of the Woman's Auxiliary of Pennsylvania has pledged $1,000 to the very large amount already raised by the women towards the $100,000, designed to commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Rowe, of Alaska, undertaken by a committee of men at the last Convention in Seattle, with which date the anniversary coincided. The Bishops of this committee are now being asked to see that the balance of $13,000 yet to be secured is raised immediately, that the total sum may be presented to Bishop Rowe at the coming Convention in October at Washington.

Will every man and woman in the Church do their utmost themselves, and interest others in the immediate completion of this fund, which is only a faint expression of the appreciation and confidence felt for Bishop Rowe in his life of untiring devotion and joyous self-sacrifice to the Church's work in God's great spaces of Alaska.

All checks may be sent to Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Or to Mrs. John Markoe, President of the Women's Committee for the Bishop Rowe Foundation Fund, 1630 Locust Street, Philadelphia.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton.

On March 18 the beautiful new St. Stephen's Church at Westhampton, Richmond, Virginia, will be used for the first time.

The Church was begun over a year ago and will take the place of the present church.

Frank R. Watson, of Philadelphia, the architect of the new edifice, is already known to Virginia people as having built Christ Church, Norfolk. He is one of the greatest exponents of Gothic architecture in America.

Mr. L. P. Hartsook, of Richmond, is the assisting architect and Jones and Conquest are the builders.

The church is a pure Gothic design and is built of rough stone, quarried near Richmond.

A tower, sixty feet high, is planned for the building. This will cost twenty thousand dollars additional and will be erected later.

The seating capacity is four hundred and twenty-five. Both entrances to the church are from the side. As you enter the building, the baptistry is seen on the right. It is four-square and girded about with massive columns.

The altar is made of George Washington marble, from a special design by the architect. It is beautiful in its simplicity and richness.

The panelling is of dark oak and corresponds with that used for the altar rail, the Bishop's chair and the clergy stalls.

The organ is made by Hook and Hastings, and is one of the best pipe organs in the city.

The floor of the chancel is of white marble and the aisles are of colored tiles.

A morning chapel is one of the special features of the building. The furnishing and beautifying of this has been taken over by Mr. and Mrs. Alexander W. Weddell, as a memorial to Mrs. St. George M. Anderson, who before her marriage, was Miss Penelope W. Weddell. Mrs. Anderson was a devoted member of St. Stephen's and beloved by all who knew her.

The stained glass window over the altar is a representation of St. Christopher, done by the D'Ascense Studies of Philadelphia. It is put in by Mr. and Mrs. T. W. Purcell, in memory of their son, Robert Bosher Purcell. On the window is inscribed, "To the Glory of God and in loving memory of Robert Bosher Purcell, 1908-1926". Lower down are the words, "Serve Him with a perfect heart and with a willing mind (1 Chron. 28:9)".

The grounds which have been designed by Mr. Charles F. Gillette, will be beautified as a memorial to Mr. William M. Habliston, one of the founders of the Church, and for many years its Senior Warden.

The church began with a membership of twenty-three in the year 1910, and the present church was built in 1912. The present membership is one hundred and eighty-five with a Sunday-school enrollment of one hundred and twenty-five. The church also ministers to one hundred boarding students at the two Church Schools, located near by.

Bishop Thomas C. Darst, of East Carolina, will preach the sermon at the opening service. The Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., of the Theological Seminary, Alexandria, and President of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, will assist in the service.

The Rev. James D. Gibson and the Rev. Z. S. Farland, former rectors, will also take part. Others of the clergy who will have a part in the service are: the Rev. Chas. T. Warner, of St. Alban's Church, Washington; the Rev. Wm. Page Dame, of Christchurch, Middlesex; the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt, D. D., of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Richmond; the Rev. Nelson P. Dame, the Rev. E. L. Woodward and the Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, all of Richmond, Va.

The Rev. Giles B. Palmer is the rector, and the Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne is the assistant rector of the church.

The Bishop's Message.

The National Council, at its February meeting, was obliged to make a cut of $238,000 in the appropriations for carrying on the missionary work of the Church during the year 1928. Of this cut the Diocese of Virginia is responsible for $7,280. We were able to promise only $45,000 of the quota of $52,280 which had been assigned to us. This is the first time since the Nation Wide Campaign was started that Virginia has failed to promise its full quota for the Church's missionary work.

Lent is the season when we try to draw closer to the Lord Jesus Christ. When we do so we hear Him saying, "If any man will be my disciple, let him take up his cross daily and follow me". The cross means sacrifice—sacrifice not simply for one's own spiritual good, but rather sacrifice for the purpose of helping others. Each one of us must decide whether the pledges we have already made to the Church's Program exhaust our capacity for sacrifice. If not, I am sure that we will be glad to help the Diocese of Virginia take its full part in fulfilling Christ's command to preach the Gospel to all nations.

H. St. George Tucker.
—Virginia Churchman.

Noonday Lenten Services.

The noonday Lenten services at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, sponsored by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, have attracted a great many people this year as in former years.

The Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker was the preacher on February 23 and 24.

The Very Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, Dean of the Cathedral at Bethlehem, Pa., was the preacher for the first week. The Rev. William Pierson Merrill, D. D., pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, New York City, was the preacher for the second week, and the Rt. Rev. Warren Lincoln Rogers, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Ohio, is the preacher for this week, March 12-16. The other Lenten preachers are:

March 19-23—The Rev. Hugh Black, D. D., Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

March 26-30—The Rev. Charles W. Gilkey, D. D., pastor of the Hyde Park Baptist Church, Chicago, Ill.

Bishop Guerry in Richmond.

The Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop of South Carolina, was the preacher at St. James' Church, Richmond, March 7, 8 and 9.

The first evening he spoke on "The Incarnation and What It Involves".

His second subject was "The Virgin Birth and the Trustworthiness of the Gospel Record".

On Friday evening he spoke on "The Historic Ministry and the Lambeth Appeal of 1920", and in this connection he discussed his League for Church Unity. The Bishop laid emphasis on the fact that he is working for Church Unity and not Church Uniformity.

He concluded his address with the expressed hope that many would use the prayer and sign the membership card which was distributed in the pews of the church.

Dr. Peter, rector of St. James, heartily endorsed Bishop Guerry's League for Church Unity. He asked that the signed cards be sent to him. He said that he intends to meet with the signers of these cards to discuss the reports of the work done at Lausanne and to pray for Church Unity. He also suggested that members of other congregations present start the movement in their own churches, and he said that he would be glad to meet with them.

The prayer and the membership card follow:

Prayer for Church Unity.
(Compiled by the Bishop of South Carolina.)

O God, the Father of our Lord, Jesus Christ, our only Saviour, the Prince of Peace, we pray Thee to send down Thy blessing upon the members of the League for Church Unity. Give us grace seriously to lay to heart the great dangers we are in by our unhappy divisions; take away all hatred and prejudice, and whatsoever else may hinder us from godly union and concord. Suffer us not to shrink from an endeavor which is in accordance with Thy will for the peace and visible unity of Thy Church. Draw us nearer to Thee with the cords of Thy love, and nearer to each other in the unity of the spirit and in loyal obedience to the teaching of Thy dear Son; all which we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

League for Church Unity.
Membership Card.

In obedience to the teaching of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and trusting to the assistance and guidance of His Holy Spirit, I do hereby pledge myself to work and pray for the visible and organic unity of His Church.
Signed:

The Albemarle Association of the Diocese of Virginia will meet at Grace Church, Bremo Bluff, the Rev. W. F. Bunsted, rector, April 24-26.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Arranging for the General Convention.

Local committees, clerical and lay, are at work in Washington City arranging for the triennial convention of the Church, to begin October 10. One unprecedented feature for which preparation is being made will be use of the radio. The general services of the convention will be broadcast regularly and heard by millions in every part of this country and Canada.

The Rev. Dr. D. Wellington Curran, executive secretary of the executive council of the Diocese of Washington, thus summarizes the probable work of the convention:

"The final chapter, probably, of the present Prayer Book revision, important decisions in regard to the Church's program, maintenance budget and advance work budget for the new triennium, a new approach to the whole problem of advance work, renewed emphasis on evangelism throughout the Church, the situation in China, with the report of Bishop Sanford and Dr. Wood after their visit to our missions there; the election of a Bishop for Wyoming."

Fewer mass meeting and more study groups than heretofore are planned.

The beautiful grounds of the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul will be the scene of great outdoor services.

The Woman's Auxiliary, which will hold its triennial meeting simultaneously with the General Convention, will meet at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington.

Beautiful New Parish House.

The new parish house for St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek Parish, on the outskirts of Washington City, will be one of the most beautiful and complete in the world. It is under construction on the brow of a hill to the west of the church. The main building, not including the collonade portico, which will overlook a wide sloping terrace to the East, will be one hundred and nine feet wide by fifty feet deep. Toward the rear of this main building, at each end, will be a wing, or extension, thirty-nine and one-half feet wide by eighteen feet deep. The style of the building is colonial. It will contain a spacious entrance lobby, on the eastern side, secretary's office, large auditorium, class rooms, one of the younger classes larger than the others. The second story will consist chiefly of eight class rooms, separated by folding partitions, so arranged that any three of the rooms may be thrown into one. A large supper, or banquet, hall will be in the basement, with the necessary conveniences for cooking, cafeteria service, check rooms and store rooms. The basement may be utilized for class rooms when needed for that purpose.

A new entrance gate and driveway to the church have just been completed and a new road is being made through from Allison Street.

Meeting of Woman's Auxiliary at St. Luke's Church for Colored People.

A special meeting of the Diocesan Woman's Auxiliary was held at St. Luke's Episcopal Church for Colored people on March 12. This is the first meeting of the Diocesan Auxiliary to be held at St. Luke's Church, but it is expected that there will be an annual meeting of this kind in the future, because of a newly formed Diocesan Committee on Cooperation with Colored Branches. The opening services were conducted by the rector of St. Luke's Church, and the special address was delivered by the Rev. Norman S. Binsted, Missionary in Japan, and formerly connected with St. Alban's Parish.

The Noonday Lenten Services being held at Keith's Theatre under the Washington Federation of Churches, are being largely attended and are broadcast by radio to countless others by station WRC. Dr. Anson Phelps Stokes, Canon of Washington Cathedral, was the preacher there for four consecutive days during the past week.

The Rev. Paul Bull, English preacher, has recently completed a series of five lectures at Washington Cathedral. These lectures were especially for the clergy of Washington. Rev. Mr. Bull is a member of the Community of the Resurrection, which was founded at Merfield, England, by Bishop Charles Gore in the interests of missionary and preaching influence, and is widely known as a result of his activities for the betterment of prophetic ministry. He also is the author of several books concerned with preaching in its various phases, his most recent volume dealing with sermon construction.

The March Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington was held at the Chapel of the Good Shepherd on March 6, at two P. M. Mrs. William D. Hind, Diocesan President, presided, and the special speaker of the occasion was the Rev. A. B. Parson, assistant foreign secretary of the Department of Missions of the National Council of the Church.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial to Bishop Burgess.

The Committee on a Memorial to Bishop Burgess, appointed by the diocesan convention of 1927, augmented by a special committee of the Cathedral Chapter, after conferences with Bishop Stires, has made plans to erect a pulpit in the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, as such memorial. The design of the pulpit is by the Goodhue Associates. The material is stone for the base, carved oak for the pulpit itself and the canopy. A letter is about to be sent to all the clergy, asking their cooperation in acquainting all the people of the diocese with the proposal. Every person confirmed by Bishop Burgess is to be asked to send one dollar or more toward the cost of the pulpit, which will be $6,000. It is hoped that the needed sum can be raised in thirty days. If this be done, then the pulpit can be ready for dedication about July 1. The committee of the convention consists of the Rev. George W. Eccles, Chairman; the Rev. Wm. Grainger, the Rev. Robert Rogers, Ph. D., Mr. J. P. Morgan, Mr. Drigen Seymour and Mr. Raymond F. Barnes, Treasurer. The cooperating committee of the Cathedral Chapter consists of the Very Rev. Dean Sargent and Mr. Wm. M. Baldwin.

Letter From Bishop Murray.

The following letter was sent by Bishop Murray on February 23 to all the clergy of the diocese:

My Dear Brethren:

As Deacon, Priest, and Bishop, I have made the following Constitutional Declaration:

And, consonant with this my vow and in fidelity to the Law and established Usage of our Church from Apostolic Days until now, I hereby inform and assure you that prerequisites for enrollment of any one as a regular communicant of said Church in the Parish Registers of our Diocese are the Sacrament of Baptism in the Name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and Administration of "The Order of Confirmation or Laying on of Hands upon those who are Baptized, and come to years of discretion."

(See first paragraph of Rubrics in Prayer Book at end of "The Ministration of Baptism to such as are of riper years, and able to answer for themselves"; and also second paragraph of Rubrics at end of "The Order of Confirmation".)

The Clergy will kindly read this communication to their congregations.

Faithfully and affectionately yours in Christ and His Church,

John G. Murray,
Bishop of Maryland.

Petition on Retention of the Thirty-nine Articles.

A petition is being circulated in the diocese urging the delegates to the General Convention to vote for the retention of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion in the Book of Common Prayer. The petition asserts that there is an organized movement in the Church to adopt some of the doctrines and forms of worship now observed in the Roman Church, which doctrines and ceremonies are specifically repudiated by the Articles of Religion.

The ground was paved for the circulation of this petition by a pamphlet broadcast through the diocese just before the meeting of the Diocesan Convention in January. This pamphlet set forth in detail reasons for the retention of the Articles in the Prayer Book. It was prefaced on the fly-leaf as follows: "Accepting the fact that every religious denomination has a perfect right to state its tenets constitutionally, precisely as it sees fit will you kindly write me your full criticism of the contnets of this pamphlet.

Constructive Education for Peace.

At the triennial meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary in New Orleans, a resolution was moved and adopted that the Woman's Auxiliary pledge itself to a constructive education for peace. Bishop Murray, in working out this resolution, has appointed Mrs. Walke, a member of the Educational Committee of the Church Service League and Woman's Auxiliary, to represent the women of the Diocese of Maryland on a Continuing Committee which has been formed in Baltimore, following the Washington Conference on the Cause and Cure of War. This committee hopes to foster educational work through the state along the lines of our foreign policy, international relations, etc. They are planning for an all-day conference on Friday, March 30. Professor James T. Shotwell, of Columbia University, will be the luncheon speaker. A round-table, on our Latin American Policy, led by Dr. John Latane, of Hopkins, will follow the lunch.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Coadjutor.

Bishop Sterrett Head of Diocese.

The Rt. Rev. Frank William Sterrett, D. D., LL. D., successor to the late Bishop Talbot as Bishop of the Diocese of Bethlehem, was born at Middleport, N. Y., on January 21, 1885, a son of William J. and Mary Elizabeth (Spalding) Sterrett.

Bishop Sterrett received his education at Hobart College, the University of Buffalo Law School, the University of Pennsylvania, from which he was graduated in the class of 1908 with the degree of A. B., and the Philadelphia Divinity School, graduating therefrom in 1911 and receiving the degree of B. D., in 1912 from the same institution.

Bishop Sterrett was honored by Hobart College in 1924 with the degree of Doctor of Divinity and later with the degree of Doctor of Laws.

In June, 1911, he was ordained a deacon by Bishop Mackey-Smith in St. Matthew's Church, Philadelphia. A year late, in June, 1912, he was ordained a priest by Bishop Talbot in St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre.

Bishop Sterrett served as vicar of Grace Church, at Kingston, a chapel of St. Stephen's, Wilkes-Barre, from June, 1911, to November, 1912. He was curate at St. Stephen's, Wilkes-Barre, from November, 1912, to July, 1914, and minister in charge of St. Stephen's from July, 1914, to January, 1915. He served as rector of St. Stephen's Church from January, 1915, to November, 1923.

Bishop Sterrett was elected bishop-coadjutor of the Diocese of Bethlehem at a special diocesan convention in the Church of the Nativity, this city, on Friday, July 13, 1923, and consecrated as Bishop on November 9, 1923, in St. Stephen's Church, Wilkesburg. At this impressive service Bishop Talbot was the chief consecrator, assisted by Bishops Darlington, Gravatt, Garland, Slattery, Burgess, Cook and Jett.

On October 1, 1927, following an announcement of Bishop Talbot to the diocesan convention of May, 1927, the administration of the diocese was turned over to Bishop Sterrett and he became the ecclesiastical authority. According to the canons of the Episcopal

The Path of Prayer.

F. B. Stone.

The path of prayer's a sacred way;
For God is always there.
He follows down that path to you,
Although His face is hid from view,
E'en though there seems to come to you
No answer to your prayer.

"He will in nowise cast you out,"
His word, forever true,
Shows He is always on prayer's way,
And hears each word you think or say:
Through every day and all the night
He is there to meet with you.

And now through prayer He enters in
The hearts He longs to own,
And there He will with us abide,
In hearts His blood has purified;
And while we strive to do His will,
Will leave us ne'er alone.

The path of prayer is thickly strewn
With idols we've outgrown,
The things we worshipped in the past,
Position, wealth, the pride of caste,
And many things that hurt us now,
In shame we would disown.

The path of prayer's a blessed way,
For there are victories won;
And Jesus met the Father there,
Left us a legacy of prayer;
And now He helps us tread that path
Until our day is done.

The Faith of Chinese Christians.

When the final record is written, no modern period of Christian history will be more inspiring than this present period in China. The loyalty of the Chinese Christians to the faith they have owned, their loyalty during these times of the Nationalist movement, takes one back to first century of Christianity for a parallel. I can set down only a few incidents in that story:

In West China, according to Mr. Lewis Havermale, "the preachers have organized themselves into a 'flying squadron', whereby they can report immediately at any point where the pastor is being overwhelmed by anti-Christian propaganda, by means of interviews, public meetings and tracts or posters, encouraging Christians and effecting reconciliations. They have taxed themselves to provide for the budget. They have, by written contract, bound themselves to provide funeral expenses for any who may be slain by fanatics, and to provide for their widows and orphans."

At a recent meeting in Chungking, when salary cuts were imminent, many said: "If we were in the employ of some other institution, the post office for example, we would now call a strike. We have talked the matter over. We have decided not to strike. The job of preaching the gospel is not that of the missionaries, but of us Chinese Christians. We will, therefore, return to our tasks, even though we scarcely have enough on which to live. We will do our utmost, God helping us."

In Hankow I spent a long evening with Bishop Logan H. Roots, of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He told many incidents of the devotion of the Christians. Here are two:

A pastor in a city near Hankow was taken by the Reds, bound, beaten and carried in disgrace through the streets of the city. He was placed upon a platform before a jeering crowd.

"If you will renounce this Jesus," said the tormentors, "we will let you go."

"I am a Christian," said the pastor. "You may kill me, but until death I cannot cease to preach. And if I am killed my spirit will remain in this place as a witness to my Lord."

In the face of such courage and such a testimony he was released.

Two other pastors of Bishop Root's diocese were imprisoned, after having been badly beaten. Release, they were told, would come when they renounced their faith. It happened that the day on which they were imprisoned was, in the Episcopal Church calendar, sacred to the memory of St. Stephen. So the two Chinese pastors stood up in the midst of their fellow-prisoners and preached the story of Stephen.

"We need men like Stephen in China," said the prisoners—and together the whole company knelt and prayed that God would send more Stephens to the aid of China.

"This is a day of spiritual rebirth in China," said Bishop Roots.

With little question few of the missionaries could have escaped but for the sacrifices of the Chinese Christians—who have been forced to remain to pay the price for their devotion. When the soldiers came to kill Miss Lulu Golisch, the girls of her school made a circle, three deep about her, knelt down in prayer and then told the soldiers: "If you kill her you must first kill us." The dean of this school all day remained at his post suffering the abuse of the soldiers. He refused to leave even when his own home (he is a Chinese) was looted and his wife and children driven away.

"Until this tragedy," said Miss Golisch, "we never knew how deeply Christianity had taken hold upon the lives of our Christian believers."

One of the pastors at Nanking took his accumulated savings in order to buy soap, towels, tooth-brushes, etc., for the missionaries in hiding near his home When they left he gave to each a bar of chocolate "in case you are delayed" The Ginling college girls were dispersed but organized little groups and spent the day, in the backs of shops or hidden in the cemeteries, in continual prayer. When Dr. Price, an aged missionary, was told he must pay several hundred or forfeit his life, it was a group of Chinese Christians who banded together and raised the sum, an almost impossible one for Chinese.

Dr. H. F. Rowe, head of the Theological School, was beaten and dragged through the streets of the city. When I saw him he was still wearing Chinese clothes, provided by his Christian rescuers. Said he:

"It was worth the price of admission. Now we know, as never before, the reality of the faith which our Chinese Christians have professed."—Stanley High.

The Sense of God's Presence.

A correspondent writes: "A man wants evidence of the Divine Presence (Nature does not help) and complains of lack of awareness of God, and of never having had a sense of God's nearness." How are we to deal with a case like this? What methods can be suggested by which a man may hope to come to a direct personal knowledge of God? We may, indeed we must, recognize that people differ as widely in the matter of their awareness of God as in all other respects. Just as some people have great sensibility to beauty and others very little; just as some people have great intellectual powers and others powers of a very low order; just as some people have a ready tact, and quick understanding of the characters and feelings of others, while some, with the best possible intentions, seem quite unable to enter into other persons' minds; so too in the matter of what we may call sensitiveness to spiritual influences, there is wide difference between different men. But we have God's own promise—"They shall all know Me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them". How can this promise be realized?

For young people the matter is pretty simple. I once got into trouble with a distinguished leader of religion for saying that scarcely any one had any direct first hand religious experience before the age of sixteen, and that many people did not attain to it till even later. So, then, if a thoughtful boy or girl, under the age of twenty-one is troubled at having little or no first-hand religious experience, there need be little hesitation what to advise. Here are three sound rules. Be good; fleeing fleshly lusts which war against the soul. Be humble and patient; not expecting to know everything while you are still young, but willing to wait and to learn. Be in earnest; believing that there is something worth experiencing, something worth finding out. I have known very many young people in whose lives these rules have been faithfully followed out with the happiest results.

But with a middle-aged man the question is rather different. It is necessary to ask why he has been without that which should be the possession of all men. It is legitimate to ask, in no carping or unfriendly spirit, whether he is really in earnest in desiring the knowledge of God. There is an effective pulpit story of how a young Hindoo was in the habit of plaguing a holy man with the question how he could find God. At length the holy man took him down to the Ganges and, suddenly seizing him by the neck, held him under water till he was nearly drowned. When the disciple was sufficiently recovered to speak, the holy man asked him what he most desired when he thought he was dying. The disciple, thinking his master expected him to say that he desired God, replied that what he had really most desired was air. "Exactly," replied the holy man, "and when you want God as much as you then wanted air you'll find Him, but not before." So it is legitimate to ask whether a man who has had no experience of God has really and truly desired it. Does he really care?

And again, it is legitimate to ask whether there is anything in the man's life which he himself knows is keeping him from God. "Ye therefore cannot believe because your eyes are blinded," said Christ. And nothing so blinds the eyes as wilful sin. I know a man well who passes as an atheist. But I know, and he knows quite well, what is really the root of the whole matter.

But suppose a man is both earnest in his desire to know God, and moral in his life, what then can be the reason for lack of religious experience? It is impossible to say. But two things are as near certain as anything in this world can be. First, he must on no account try to force such experience. To try to work oneself up into a state of belief is fatal. And, secondly, if such a man will try daily to gain a clear vision of Jesus, and will try earnestly to put His teaching into practice and to copy His character, he will come to the knowledge of God in time.—Canon Peter Green in The Guardian (English).

Lost—A Boy!

Not kidnapped by bandits and hidden in a cave to weep and starve and raise a nation to frenzied searching. Were that the case, one hundred thousand men would rise to the rescue if need be. Unfortunately the losing of this lad is without dramatic excitement, though very sad and very real.

The fact is, his father lost him. Being too busy to sit with him at the fireside and answer his trivial questions during the years when fathers are the only great heroes of the boys, he let go his hold.

Yes, his mother lost him. Being much engrossed in her teas, dinner and club programs, she let the maid hear the boy say his pravers and thus her grip slipped and the boy was lost to his home.

Aye, the Church lost him. Being so much occupied with sermons for the wise and elderly who pay the bills, and having good care for dignity, the minister and elders were unmindful of the human feelings of the boy in the pew and made no provision in sermon or song or manly sport for his boyishness. And so the Church and many sad-hearted parents are now looking earnestly for the lost boy.—The School Index—The Christian Advocate.

The Light of the World.

Light of the World, how long the quest
Down weary years, to learn thy name,
From sacred fire on mountain crest
Or temple altar's flame!

Cringing before the riven oak
Man fain the lightning would appease;
In fear the sunset's fire invoke
Or greet the dawning on his knees.

And all the while, though hearts were dark,
Soft shafts of light were entering;
Each glint of Truth a glowing spark
Of thy divine illumining.

In Thee, O Christ, we hail the dawn
With uncreated light aflame.
Before Thee darkness is withdrawn—
Light of all times and hearts the same.

—Edwin McNeill Poteat, Jr.,
in S. V. M. Bulletin.

Christians may forget Christ? Alas, it is too well confirmed in our experience not as a possibility, but as a lamentable fact! Let us change ourselves to bind a heavenly forget-me-not about our hearts for Jesus our beloved!—C. H. Spurgeon.

The Cross Was His Own.

They borrowed a bed to lay His head
When Christ the Lord came down;
They borrowed the ass in the mountain pass
For Him to ride to town;
But the crown that He wore
And the cross that He bore
Were His own—
The cross was His own.

He borrowed the bread when the crowd He fed
On the grassy mountain side;
He borrowed the dish of broken fish
With which He satisfied;
But the crown that He wore
And the cross that He bore
Were His own—
The cross was His own.

He borrowed a ship in which to sit
To teach the multitude;
He borrowed the nest in which to rest,
He had never a home so rude;
But the crown that He wore
And the cross that He bore
Were His own—
The cross was His own.

He borrowed a room on His way to the tomb ..... ... ... ... ... .....
The passover lamb to eat;
They borrowed a cave to be His grave,
They borrowed a winding sheet;
But the crown that He wore
And the cross that He bore
Were His own—
The cross was His own.

His Bit of Work.

"O John, John," exclaimed the father shaking his head sadly, "what slithering work you do!"

"It's all right, father," replied the boy. "I get it past the boss and get my pay too."

"There's more in the work, my boy, than in the pay," said the father.

"The pay's the main thing," retorted John.

"No, John, it is not the main thing, either. Let me tell you something that I heard today.

"In the stone works a young man was suddenly set to do a piece of carving. The man on the job had been taken ill, and the task had to be finished on time. The young man did not know what stone was for, but he went at the work in his accustomed painstaking way. He chiseled out a stem here, a leaf there, and flowers above. The master workman approved the job and the stone left the works. Some months passed.

"Today the young man was walking through the great and beautiful building that the city has just completed and opened. He came to the most prominent pillar, a handsome column crowned with a piece of lily work. 'Why,' he exclaimed, 'here's my bit of work!' And, taking off his cap, he gazed at it and said reverently: 'Thank God. I did that job well!'

"I happened to overhear the remark. and I spoke to him. Then he told me the story of that bit of work. When I heard the young man's remark and saw the light in his eye, John, I knew then, if I had never known before, that work is a holy thing! Right wages and just treatment for workmen are proper adjuncts, but above and beyond them your bit of work is holy to you.

"The Bible speaks of the 'workman that needeth not to be ashamed'. That young man toiling in the dirt and din of the stone works fashioned his bit with his soul in his job and found at last his work crowning a glorious pillar! That is true of all good work; sooner or later the finished work will be crowned. Then who can measure the joy of the workman? And if that bit of work happens to be the crowning piece of a well hewn character calling forth the praise of the Great Master, 'Well done, good and faithful servant'! the joy of the workman will not be measured by time or by anything that belongs to the world of time!"—Youth's Companion.

How the Children Were Fed.

Mrs. Van Loon was a widow. She had four little children. The oldest was Dirk, a boy of eight years.

One evening the poor mother had no bread, and her children were hungry. She folded her hands, and prayed to God; for she believed that He loved and would help her.

When she had finished her prayer, Dirk said to her, "Mother, doesn't the Bible say that God told the ravens to take some bread to a good man when he was hungry?"

"Yes," answered the mother, "but that was long, long ago, my dear."

"Well," said Dirk, "then the Lord may send ravens now. "I'll go and open the door, and maybe they'll fly in."

"In a trice Dirk jumped to the door, which he left wide open, so that the light of the lamp fell on the pavement of the street.

Shortly after the burgomaster passed by. The burgomaster is the chief magistrate of a Dutch or German town or city. Seeing the door open, he stopped.

Looking into the room, he was pleased with its clean, tidy appearance, and with the nice little children who were grouped around their mother. He could not help stepping in; and, approaching Mrs. Van Loon, he said, "Eh, my good woman, why is your door open so late as this"?

Mrs. Van Loon was a little confused when she saw so well-dressed a gentleman in her poor room. She quickly rose and dropped a curtsy to him; then, taking Dirk's cap from his head, and smoothing his hair, she answered with a smile, "My little Dirk has done it, sir, that the raven may fly in, to bring us bread".

Now the burgomaster was dressed in a black coat and black trousers, and he wore a black hat. He was quite black all over, except his collar and shirt front.

"Ah, indeed!" he exclaimed cheerfully, "Dirk is right. Here is a raven, you see, and a large one, too. Come along, Dirk, and I'll show you where the bread is."

The burgomaster took Dirk to his house, and ordered his servant to put two loaves and a pot of butter into a basket. This he gave to Dirk, who carried it home as quickly as he could. When the other little children saw the bread, they began to dance and clap their hands. The mother gave each of them a thick slice of bread and butter, which they ate with the greatest relish.

When they had finished their meal, little Dirk opened the door, and taking his cap from his head, looked up to the sky and said, "Many thanks, good Lord"! and shut the door.—John de Liefde, in Doing Right.

Meadow Pride.

Anna Hamilton Wood.

So often, just before the harvest's yield,
I turn to look upon a full, wide field
Of waving grain,
And hear, in fancy, those exultant cries
Of angel hosts in the Judean skies

I know the reason why those tasseled heads
Bend with such pride above their brown earth beds.
They bravely wear
The memory that once it was their kind,
Dried to a warm and yellow crispness, lined
A manger there!

The Story of a Little Seed.

Once upon a time there was a tall milkweed that stood in a fence corner at the very edge of a large wood. As the summer advanced, the milkweed was covered with long green pods; and by and by these pods burst open, and dozens upon dozens of tiny seeds with soft, downy tips, came peeping out. "My children, my lovely little seed children," murmured the milkweed, as she swayed to and fro in the summer breeze, "you must fly away now and leave me, one by one. But the good God meant that every one of you should sink down into the cool, damp earth and grow up to be a big, splendid milkweed just as I am."

"And so we will; and so we will!" cried all the downy seeds together; "we will not forget what you have told us. Good-bye, dear mother, good-bye." Just then a gay little breeze came dashing by and caught them up in his arms and away they flew, here and there and everywhere. But wherever a seed dropped into the cold, damp earth, the milkweed mother knew that a tall, splendid plant like herself would be growing next summer.

One little seed, smaller than the others, with downy wings that glistened in the sun, shrank back into the green pod and refused to go with the rest. "I like the sunshine and the pure, sweet air and the bright blue sky," she cried; "don't cast me on the ground, Mr. Wind, but take me sailing away and away, and ever and ever so far!"

Now the wind was a jolly, rollicking fellow, so crying, "All right, here we go!" he caught her up and carried her off in a hurry. On and on she flew with breathless haste, through the woods and over the brook to a wheat field that stood fair and shining in the sun. At last she caught on a prickly ear of wheat and hung there, breathless.

"And who are you?" she cried at last, when she was rested enough to speak.

"I am a stalk in a wheat field," answered the wheat politely.

"And how came you here?" said the seed gazing admiringly down at the long, yellow stalk.

"Oh, I was a tiny grain once," said the wheat. "But a farmer planted me in the cool, damp earth, and I grew up to be the splendid stalk that you see."

"I don't want to be planted," said the little seed saucily. "I had much rather fly about in the sunshine. Take me up again, Mr. Wind," and away she flew.

When she stopped again, after a long, glorious flight, she caught on the rough bark of a broad, graceful tree, covered with green leaves and luscious fruit.

"And who are you?" she asked again.

"I am an apple tree," said the big tree, kindly.

"An apple tree, and how came you here, pray," asked the seed.

"Oh, I was just a tiny apple seed once," said the tree, "but I sank into the cool, damp earth just here, and now I have grown into a great, broad tree and bear ever so many delicious apples every year of my life."

"That's all very well," said the little seed, "but I like better to fly in the sunshine," and away she went, rolling and tumbling and laughing in the summer breeze.

She flew back into the large, dark forest this time, and when she stopped again she found herself in the arms of a great forest tree, larger and more splendid than any she had ever seen.

"And who are you?" she asked of the big, rough tree.

"I am an oak," was the answer in big, kindly tones.

"And where did you come from?" asked the seed.

"Oh, I was nothing but an acorn once," said the tree, "but I sank into the cool, damp earth just here, and now I am a great fine tree, with ever so many birds nestling in my branches."

Just then the seed looked down into a hollow in the great, gnarled branches and saw a little brown something, ugly and shriveled and old.

"And who are you?" she said with a little shrug of contempt.

"Oh, I am an acorn," came the answer in a shrill, cracked voice, "a last year's acorn that didn't want to be planted. Just see how safely I am hiding."

The tiny seed looked at the poor, wizened acorn, and at the big splendid oak, and hung very quietly in her place for a long, long time. At last she called out, very gently: "Take me down to the cool, damp earth, Mr. Wind, for I want to be a milkweed like my mother!"

"All right," said the good-natured wind and away she flew.—The King's Builders.

The Day of the Big Storm.

The Mitchell children had a play room in the big clean basement, and all the other children of the neighborhood liked to play there. The house stood rather apart from its neighbors in a big grassy lawn, and if the children got noisy it hardly ever disturbed even the elderly people, who liked to take naps in the afternoon, or the babies, who napped, too.

"Mother's gone down town and we can stay an hour," said Billy Green, who appeared right after lunch with his sister Josephine. "Maybe we can have that basketball game now."

"Let's play dolls," said Josephine. "I've brought Betty Lou with me."

"Let's get George and Helen Cloud and the Bliss children and let the girls play dolls while we play basketball," said Jay Mitchell.

So presently the little girls with an old stool for a table were sewing busily by the window in the sunshine, while the boys were rushing about the play-room in pursuit of the ball. It had been raining hard all morning, so they could not go out on the lawn; but the spring sunshine was drying things off, and very soon they could be out of doors. But presently it began to thunder, and they knew a storm was coming, but still they played without minding the noise outside.

"Why, look here! The water is running around our feet!" cried the little girls in alarm. "It's getting higher and higher!"

By the time the boys got into the laundry where the girls were playing they were splashing in water. "We'll have to run upstairs," they cried. "We'll be soaked down here."

They rushed up the stairway only to find that the storm had blown the door shut and the spring lock held tight. There was not room enough on the stairs for all, so the boys took refuge on the big laundry table. Presently stools, kindling, basketball, playthings and all were afloat, and it began to look as if the water would reach the ceiling. They pounded and cried, but nobody came to help them out.

"Let's try to break off the register pipe and lift the register," said Jay, turning pale. "Maybe we can crawl out that way."

What a shout went up when Jay tilted off the register and the light streamed down from the dining-room! "Now we can lift the girls through," said Jay, and they can open the door.

But at that minute the water rose higher and the table began to float about. "Quick," said Jay, giving Billy a big boost. "You'll have to hurry!"

So Billy squeezed through and ran like a deer to open the basement door and let the girls out, but by this time the boys had floated far into the corner out of reach of the steps, and of course could not wade to them. "Throw us a rope and tow us in!" screamed George Cloud. "Quick!"

With trembling fingers Billy made a ball on the end of his sister's jumping rope and flung it to the boys on the table, tipping and wobbling in the basement. Four pairs of hands grabbed and almost upset their craft, but in a few minutes they righted themselves and reached the stairs. By this time the anxious parents had made their way home through the storm, and the dining room fairly streamed with water while they all rejoiced and cried together.

"Such a storm!" said Mrs. Mitchell, pale and trembling. "I'm going to have papa take that spring lock off the door this very night."

"How did you ever think of pushing off the register?" asked a dozen voices at once.

"Well, I don't know," said Jay. "I prayed, and then the thought came to me. I guess God must have put it into my mind."

"I think you are right, sonny," said Mr. Mitchell with tears of joy in his eyes. "Always depend upon God in emergencies, and everything will come out all right."—Hilda Richmond.

A Boy I Know.

I know a boy who has a watch,
But he never thinks to wind it;
And when he ought to be on time,
He's always just behind it.

And when he has a task to do,
He says, "Wait till tomorrow";
And when he cannot find his things,
He simply says, "I'll borrow".

That boy may make a business man—
I know he wants to do it—
But he must mend his careless ways
Or he will live to rue it.

That boy must do his work today,
And plan work for tomorrow;
Good habits, everybody knows,
Are something boys can't borrow.

Deaths

RESOLUTIONS.

Mrs. Madge Smith Branch.

In loving memory of MRS. MADGE SMITH BRANCH, wife of Mr. J. E. Branch, who entered into rest Thursday, January 26, 1928.

Although Mrs. Branch was only among us a short time she won all with whom she came in contact by her lovable disposition and her true Christian character.

Whereas it has pleased our Heavenly Father to remove from our midst our coworker; therefore be it resolved:

1st. That in the death of Mrs. Branch each member feels the deep loss of a friend.

2nd. That the Auxiliary has lost a valuable member.

3rd. That we in appreciation of her sweet Christian influence extend to her husband and family our heartfelt sympathy.

4th. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family, the Southern Churchman, the Roanoke News and that a copy be spread on our minutes.

MRS. FRANK A. COLE,
MRS. W. L. SCOTT,
Committee.

IN MEMORIAM.

Mrs. William Henry Chapman.

The death of MRS. WILLIAM HENRY CHAPMAN, in Greensboro, North Carolina, on December 31, 1927, marks the passing of one who had contributed abundantly to the enrichment of human life by the strength of her faith, the beauty of her character, the breadth of her sympathies, the depth and sweetness of her love.

Born at "Edge Hill", near Warrenton, Virginia, on October 28, 1846, the only child of James Jeffries and Esther Foote, his wife, her long life embraced the tranquility of the old South, the period of armed conflict between the States, the poverty and privation of Reconstruction days, the prosperity and progress of the "new South". She lived through four wars, and was an active participant in the experiences of three of them. Her life was suffused with romance and rich in patriotic achievement.

United in marriage to a famous Confederate chieftain at the very height of his glory, she lived to devote much of her time and her rare gifts to leading a wide circle of friends and admirers into a deeper loyalty to a reunited country, and sent her sons into two wars under the Stars and Stripes.

On February 25, 1864, Josephine Jeffries, then a beautiful girl of seventeen, was married to Lieutenant-Colonel William H. Chapman, a member of the galaxy of brilliant and distinguished officers who commanded the famous 43rd Virginia Cavalry, better known as "Mosby's Battalion".

The early days of her married life were replete with adventure and peril. When peace was restored she faced, with her husband, the difficulties and hardships involved in rebuilding the whole social structure of their native State.

Mrs. Chapman's life was intimately associated with the history of Virginia. She was descended directly from Anne, sister of Mary Ball, George Washington's mother, while her family and General Robert E. Lee traced back to a common ancestry in Colonel Richard Lee. She was an active member of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, the Daughters of the American Revolution and the Colonial Dames.

Mrs. Chapman was a woman of great personal charm, of noble beauty and dignity of character and of singular sweetness of disposition. Her poise was perfect, her sympathies deep and tender. Whether in the midst of war's alarms or in the swift exchanges of social life her beautiful spirit, while sensitively responsive to each new situation, was serene and unruffled.

A character so perfect, so symmetrical, could find its explanation only in spiritual ideals. Her life was permeated and directed by a deep religious faith that brightened and beautified each word and action, and all unconsciously brought men face to face with Christ, whom they recognized as the inspiration of a life of such surpassing loveliness.

Dedicated to Christ in infancy through the offices of the Episcopal Church, she was ever active in its service, and found in it joyous worship, its noble liturgy, its sacred associations and its heroic history her highest spiritual satisfaction.

Her family will have the sympathy of many friends in their bereavement. In less than two months Colonel Chapman and his beloved wife would have celebrated the 64th anniversary of their marriage. Sixty-four years on the pathway of life together—and lovers always! A wonderful record, a blessed and beautiful story.

In unfaded loveliness she has passed into the nearer presence, into the higher service of the King. Heaven is brighter for her coming and earth is richer for the legacy of such a life.

P.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE CLERGY AND VESTRY OF BRUTON PARISH CHURCH IN MEMORIAM JOHN LESLIE HALL.

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God, in His Providence, to take from its earthly activities the soul of JOHN LESLIE HALL, therefore be it resolved, by the Clergy and Vestry of Bruton Parish Church, Williamsburg, Virginia:

That the passing of John Leslie Hall marks the close of a life embodying the finest traditions of the Virginian of the Old School, and illustrating in consummate degree the virtues of husband father and friend in every relation.

That we shall ever recall with pride and gratitude to God his outstanding scholarship in his chosen field, applied with unsurpassed devotion and ability to the service of the institution of learning to which he devoted his life from young manhood to its ripe close, a service, by the mercy of God, prolonged beyond the period vouchsafed to any other man in the history of that honored institution.

That Bruton Parish Church gives thanks to God for the life and abiding example of John Leslie Hall, the humble Christian and devout Churchman, ever prompt and regular in duty and attendance, and the wise and constructive Vestryman, through many years, of Grace Church, Yorktown, and of Bruton Parish Church.

That the Clergy and Vestry of Bruton Parish Church do hereby put upon permanent record their sense of the wellnigh irreparable loss sustained, in every relation of life, in the passing of John Leslie Hall, the man, the scholar, the teacher, the loyal Churchman, the faithful Vestryman.

And that this tribute of affection, esteem and honor, be spread upon the minutes of Bruton Parish Register and copies be sent to the bereaved family and to the religious and secular press.

(Signed)
VAN F. GARRETT,
H. DENISON COLE,
WALTER A. MONTGOMERY.

"The Abundant Life."

"The Abundant Life" was the general topic for the Mission to be conducted in All Saints' Church, Atlanta, Ga., during the six days beginning March 4. The missioner was the Rev. John Gayner Banks, D. S. T., National Director of the Society of the Nazarene, with headquarters at Mountain Lakes, N. J. The words used as the topic of the Mission are taken from St. John's account of the parable of the thief in the sheep-fold, in which Jesus said, "I am come that they might have life and have it more abundantly". The object of the Mission, or "Crusade", as Dr. Banks calls it, was to show that the acquisition of this "more abundant life" is not a mere pious ideal, but a practical possibility, attainable through faith and prayer. The Missioner did not merely preach this message; he showed how it may be realized.

The morning session was not so much a service as a personally directed instruction in "Vital Christianity". Those who are honestly seeking this more vital kind of religion were earnestly invited to attend these morning classes.

"The More Abundant Life" was taught principally from the writing of St. John, especially his Gospel. At the evening sessions the miracles recorded by St. John were discussed, and were shown that these miracles were actual demonstrations by our Lord of how the more abundant life may be received. The Healing Message of the Gospel was sustained throughout the week, and special healing services were held. The missioner made clear that Christ intended that the more abundant life was meant for the body as well as for the soul.

The Rev. W. W. Memminger, D. D.,

rector of All Saints' Church, cordially invites Christians of all names to attend the mission.

Missions.

The Rt. Rev. James M. Maxon, D. D., held a most successful mission in Trinity Church, Miami, through the week preceding February 19. The two services daily were well attended, both by parishioners and by winter visitors. The question box was used freely, and the instructions given in response were definite and stimulating.

During the same week, February 12-19, a mission was held in St. Andrew's Church, Tampa, by the Rt. Rev. Chas. E. Woodcock, D. D., marked by large attendance and deep interest.

South Florida rejoices over the great help given through these two missions, appreciating greatly the visits of these able and devoted Bishops.

Winter Meeting.

The winter meeting of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg was held in St. John's Church, York, Archdeacon Paul S. Atkins presiding. The day began with a celebration of the Holy Communion, at which the Archdeacon was celebrant, assisted by the Rev. Azael Coates. After discussion of the missionaries' reports the meeting was addressed by Mr. A. F. Graves, one of the Headmasters of Yeates School, the diocesan boarding school for boys, and Mrs. J. C. Heiges, of York, Diocesan President of the Girls' Friendly Society. In response to Mrs. Heiges' appeal $500 was pledged towards liquidating the mortgage on Camp Betty Washington, the summer camp of the Girls' Friendly Society in the Diocese of Harrisburg. Mr. Graves outlined plans for the future development of Yeates School, one of which has been the establishment of a Woman's Auxiliary in the diocese for the express purpose of aiding the school financially and to secure pupils. It was the general impression of those present that never in the history of Yeates School has there been such efficient management of the institution in conjunction with high scholastic standards and fine traditions.

Delta, Pa.: Under the direction of Archdeacon Paul S. Atkins, St. David's Church, Delta, Pa., south of York and near the Maryland line, has been reopened under the charge of Richard Atkins as lay reader, assisted by Peter Burgard. Both young men are members of St. John's Parish, York, about thirty miles away, and the Young People's Fellowship of York have volunteered to clean the church and assist in the service.

Mr. Lier is at present serving very successfully as vicar of Epiphany Chapel, and a large number of his people were present at his ordination. The Rev. Mr. Burke was the oldest priest in the Diocese in the order of ordination. He was made a deacon in 1872 and priested in 1873, by Bishop Stevens.

His last Cure was the Vicar of St. Luke's Church, Reading, Pa. He resigned this in 1911 and has since lived in his own house in Reading, assisting the clergy of the city and vicinity as they had need.

Mr. Burke was buried from St. Luke's Church, Reading in Charles Evan's Cemetery on Saturday, March 10, 1928.

Faith.

High on a hillside, bleak and cold,
The trees with patient wisdom bold
Up to the sky their bare boughs hold,

And, mindful of the prayer of these—

God looks down from His heaven, and sees,
And lo, the spring!

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

Vol. 93. RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 24, 1928. No. 12.

"THE FAST THAT I HAVE CHOSE"

1. Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and shew my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins.

2. Yet they seek me daily, and delight to know my ways, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of their God: they ask of me the ordinances of justice; they take delight in approaching to God.

3. Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not? wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge? Behold, in the day of your fast ye find pleasure, and exact all your labours.

4. Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness: ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high.

5. Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord?

6. Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?

7. Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?

8. Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily: and thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward.

9. Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am. If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity;

10. And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noonday;

11. And the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones: and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not.

12. And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places: thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in.

13. If thou turn away thy foot from the sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words:

14. Then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.—Isaiah LVIII.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"To know God is to love our brother."

"What we give gladly God will use gloriously."

"Men who desire to be Spirit-filled must be self-emptied."

Why struggle for peace, when peace was made for us on Calvary?

A man has to learn to see God in little things before He shows His greatness.

It is the burdens we drag and not those we bear that are heavy.

Of little threads our life is spun,
And he spins ill who misses one.
—Matthew Arnold.

It is not seeing one's friends, having them within reach, hearing of and from them, which makes them ours. It is the believing in them, the depending on them, assured that they are good and true to the core, and therefore could not but be good and true toward everybody else, ourselves included.—D. M. Craik.

Truth does not pass through the crucible of knowledge. Truth will not dissolve into the elements at the touch of science. Truth needs faith, such a faith, such surrender as Saul of Tarsus evinced, when the reasons of logic and the ceremonies has vanished like wisps of morning vapor before the ascending sun. Truth comes, when you face the gleaming Presence of the Saviour and commit your soul to Him. Otherwise it will be a dream.—James H. Durham.

"I do not want to belong to a Church of minimums. I want to belong to a Church of maximums—maximum beliefs, maximum duties, maximum sacrifices."—Bishop Crozier.

God would have us remember that He is Lord not only of the sunshine, but of the clouds, and that to trust Him perfectly, instead of regarding them too anxiously, is to prepare to reap the Eternal Harvest.—Liddon.

Forgive the sins I have confessed to Thee.
Forgive the secret sins I do not see,
That which I know not, Father, teach Thou me—
Help me to live.
—C. Maud Battersby.

My house has windows that are wide and high;
I never keep the curtains drawn,
Lest I should miss some glory of the sky,
Some splendor of the breaking dawn.

My heart has windows; the long years have shown
That they must never be shut fast,
Lest I should come to find them ivy grown,
And warm love cold and dead at last.

My soul has windows where God's sun streams in;
They never, never shuttered are
Lest their closed blinds hide in my soul some sin,
And keeps some lovely thing afar.
—Anna Blake Mezquida.

BIBLE LEADERS vs. "PROPAGANDA SHEET" AND SPECIMEN FRUIT FROM A VENERABLE TREE

Writing, in my poor way, for The Southern Churchman, I have always the cheerful assurance of at least one avid and anxious, if not admiring, reader. This is the estimable brother who does the heavy thinking and the resultant editorial scintillations in The New York Churchman. As I write only plain truth and have vast faith in the power of truth to penetrate and percolate through any mental obstinacy, perversity or density, I have strong hope for this brother and his ultimate return to safe, high ground, from the morasses, fogs and barrens in which he wanders.

Holding this hope, let me consider, kindly and calmly, his recent reference to The Southern Churchman and myself, in his issue of March 10. Here it is:

"Langbourne Meade Williams, who purchased control of The Southern Churchman a few months ago that he might turn it into a propaganda sheet for the Fundamentalists, writes a letter to his journal denouncing the Virginia Theological Seminary, 'that well-known training school for ministers whose tragic teaching destroys faith in God'. (It isn't quite clear whether the 'whose' refers to the seminary or to the ministers; probably to both.) Mr. Williams complains because

" 'Mr. Berryman Green turns down my offer to send, free of cost to the seminary, some great learned Bible scholar, partly on the ground that it would be a reflection on his present staff of teachers, as if they claimed to have a corner on Biblical knowledge, and accepts Mr. Coffin. What right has the Virginia Theological Seminary, under the present administration, to expect believers, in the inspiration of the Bible and men of unquestioned faith in God, to contribute further to the support of that institution?'

"Mr. Williams thinks Henry Sloane Coffin an exceedingly dangerous man. It would be interesting to know Mr. Williams' conception of a 'great learned Bible scholar'. In his signed editorials he has constantly referred to himself as 'an unlettered layman'. Would this unlettered layman think himself better qualified than the dean of a medical school to select a lecturer before medical students?"

"Propaganda sheet for the Fundamentalists." The tone of this phrase indicates some kind of vague, confused notion of the "Fundamentalists" as aggressive foes of civilization and society, to be resisted, fought and, if possible, exterminated. The fact is we love and cling to beliefs and habits of thought and life in the way our fathers have lived righteously and traveled home to God triumphantly through generations, and this is "the via Crucis", in which long and splendid lines of saints and heroes have given beauty and glory to history. We persecute nobody. If we prefer to study and try to follow Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul and Peter, James and Isaiah, rather than Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll, Sinclair Lewis, H. E. Fosdick, Karl Reiland, Robert Norwood, Clarence Darrow, David Freidrich Strauss (blasphemous clergyman of a century ago); or Lenin and Trotsky and Gilbert of New York Churchman, we cannot see that we do any harm thereby or menace the public peace or welfare or the progress of the human race. Nations guided and governed by the principles of the Christian religion have made considerable advancement and give promise of more. We Bible believers are not breeding nor training upholders of assassination. We do not send forth oratorical Catilines, or apostles of anarchy, nor propagandists of atheism, natural and invariable associates, begotten by crazed Vanity and born of shallow Folly. The male and female products of the high self-styled high cultivation and "Liberal" teachings of institutions, East and West, in which theories are mistaken for knowledge and speculation, is accepted as education, are frequently imported stock, or, if native stock, they are decadent.

We are unable to discover what comfort in affliction, hope for the hereafter, nor incentive for clean living, benevolence, virtue, prayer, zeal for doing good, are offered us by the variously named, fantastically pied, parti-colored pipers of "advanced" doctrines in exchange for our ancient, Bible faith in the God of our fathers, which we are asked to surrender. Therefore, if in the opinion of the brilliant brother of The New York Churchman, I am making The Southern Churchman mouthpiece and defender of these Bible believers, I feel honored by what seems to be intended as accusation, and am humbly proud in the hope that it will be verified, but we do not wear the collar of any clique of modernists, liberalists, fundamentalists, or Romanists.

Regarding my observations on the Virginia Theological Seminary, the most unlettered layman with ordinary use of his sense and senses, may know the value of theological instruction or teaching, or of ability in practice of medicine by actual results, "Faber fabricando fit", regardless of decisions of deans of faculties, or of long lists of degrees and graduations and publications, such as follow the name of Dr. Coffin, referred to with so much awe. If I see ill or injured patients of a doctor continuing unimproved or retrograding, or the sound becoming ailing under his ministrations, I decide he is not the doctor I want in my family, however profound his learning, or fine his endowments.

Here is an illustration of what I mean: development of a student of the Virginia Theological Seminary, an actual result, fruit of the tree: (From The New York Times, March 11):

"Princeton, N. J., March 11.—Dr. Karl Reiland, of St. George's Episcopal Church, New York, attacked orthodoxy in religion as the worst of small modern inhibitions in his sermon before Princeton undergraduates in Alexander Hall this morning.

" 'Genesis is still the backbone of orthodox religious belief,' he said. 'As long as this is so, it will damage civilization and character. Orthodoxy in religion makes no permanent impression on our souls.

" 'The recitation of the theological creed makes no demand on us except to get up and chatter. We need some religion which is of more practical benefit to us as we exist today, while we are alive, instead of placing so much emphasis upon what happens after we die. Belief in immortality is desirable, but we need to concentrate more upon bettering ourselves and others while we are alive.' "

This so-called Reverend Doctor Reiland was a student at the Virginia Theological Seminary in 1900. Now, will the brother of The New York Church, or Dr. Berryman Green, or Dr. Coffin, tell us if they think he would be an advantageous addition to the faculty of the Seminary?

If not, why not? He has a string of degrees and institutions attended and memberships in Greek letter societies almost as long as Dr. Coffin's.

Twenty-seven years ago, in 1901, taking an order as deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church, Dr. Reiland was asked by the bishop:

"Do you unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments?"

He answered:

"I do believe them."

If he had not so answered, he could not have been advanced to the priesthood, as he was a year later, having served one year "in the field" in Virginia. At his ordination as priest he was asked:

"Are you persuaded that the Holy Scriptures contain all doctrine required as necessary for eternal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ? And are you determined out of the said Scriptures to instruct the people committed to your charge; and to teach nothing as necessary to eternal salvation, but that which you shall be persuaded may be concluded and proved by the Holy Scripture?"

"I am so persuaded and have so determined, by God's Grace."

So answered Dr. Reiland in 1902, in presence of the congregation.

Are we to reach the frightful conclusion that he gave these answers and received the laying on of the bishop's hands with the injunction: "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God," with his tongue in his cheek?

Presumably, he has been, since giving these fundamental answers to distinctly fundamentalist questions, leading his congregation in repeating the Creeds, which he describes now as "chatter", administering the Holy Communion, with all its beautiful, solemn, soul-lifting associations, as a hollow form, tongue in cheek mockery, "making no permanent impressions on our souls". The faith and religion he derides and decries have made through nineteen centuries such permanent impression that thousands of men and women have lived long and splendid lives in their light and other thousands for love of them have endured privation, suffering, humiliation or gone to torture and agonizing death, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to make the sacrifice. The magnificent meekness and patience, the tender love and sublime courage of Christ make no permanent impression on the soaring soul of Dr. Reiland, and he tells a concourse of young men that it is unworthy of their respect or consideration—and thereby gets an eighth of a column in a newspaper.

To a plain-minded, every-day, unlettered layman, it seems an unavoidable conclusion that Dr. Reiland told, under the most solemn and sacred of oaths, a distinct untruth when he was ordained; or that he has changed his opinion. Assuming the latter to be the case, it seems equally true that he should honorably and frankly surrender the office in which he was installed and the privileges to which he was admitted because of his distinct declaration and promises. He looks to my layman eyes to be in the position now of a man who has taken an oath of allegiance to a government and is doing his utmost to destroy it and heap contempt on it, while sharing its privileges and protection and living under its flag—a traitor to God. If that be not treason of the basest, the generally accepted definition of the word "treason" is entirely wrong. Perhaps Mr. Darrow could arrange an array of psycopathic experts to prove the position a noble one; but we fundamentalists who believe in such primal, old-fashioned, orthodox virtues, as truth and honor and loyalty cannot so view it.

Yet, we Bible believers are not at all dismayed by Dr. Reiland, nor by his bolder and franker, or more timid allies. History shows that they represent a type, specimens of which have appeared in every generation—some naturally insurgent and impatient of all law, some incited by restless vanity, craze for novelties or craving for notoriety, full of self-conceit, ignorance and error.

The Church has stood, stands, will stand, and the Gates of Hell cannot prevail against it. It is builded on a rock and all the roar and rant and shrieks and sneers of all the schismatics, infidels, deserters, runagates and traitors, will not shake it.

Faith and love will live. Young men taught that the ministry of our Church is an avocation rather than a vocation, merely a genteel and comfortable line of business, not consecration of self for manly and lovely service to God and man, will come and go, with their flippancies, vanities, heresies, may be conspicuous a little while, and then will disappear, after doing as much harm as their limitations allow. As a plain, unlettered layman, I cannot help noting that most of these high and heavy thinkers, whose minds disdain orthodoxy and the truth, and disclaim their own oaths and promises and the doctrines and ordinances of the Church, find soft berths and cling to them tenaciously. I hear of few of them on the firing lines, out in the poor parishes and small communities, or the mission fields, where work is hard, salaries are scanty and sometimes real dangers are to be faced and destitutions undergone. There the rewards are consciousness of doing glorious good, alleviating misery, rescuing lives, saving souls, and assurance of the approval of the Almighty. The clergy and laity who do the real work of the Church and fulfil its high purposes are the life of the Church. They are heard from very little, except in the annual reports, but they are doing, constantly and splendidly. If The Southern Churchman can speak for and to these, help to strengthen these soldiers of the Cross and expose the fallacies of Dr. Reiland and his kind and the teaching and standards that produce them, it will attain its purpose.

We will hold fast to our belief in Jesus Christ of the Trinity as the only True Shepherd and the Real Comforter and the actual Redeemer of us miserable sinners, by that one oblation of Himself once offered on the Cross as a full and sufficient sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction for the sins of the world. Langbourne M. ## FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart." Psalm 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Canon F. E. Howitt, of Hamilton, Canada:

> "He that spared not his Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"—Romans 8:32.

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

ACCEPTING THE PLAIN INTENT OF SCRIPTURE.

Luther's doctrine of the right of private judgment is not that every one is at liberty to pass what judgment he pleases with respect to spiritual things. There is a fixed and unerring norm which the private Christian is under obligation to follow, as any judge is restrained from arbitrary verdicts by the law that he is sworn to administer.

Says Luther: "Such judging of doctrine must not be according to our own thoughts, or from one's own wisdom, but there must be a fixed, clear rule, according to which to judge; and such a rule is the word of Christ. This alone is the norm and test, as we have often said."—From Jacobs' Martin Luther.

THE SOLIDARITY OF THE CHRISTIAN SYSTEM

By the Right Reverend Warren A. Candler, D. D.

THERE is an inter-dependence between the fundamental principles of the Christian system which constitutes its solidarity as a whole. It is seamless and indivisable like the robe of its dying Lord.

Non-essential matters may be attached to it that are of secondary importance, and that may be ignored, or rejected, without serious consequences to faith or life.

But all the essential truths revealed in the Christian Gospel stand or fall together. If the force of any one of them be impaired the entire structure is weakened.

Christian ethics cannot be long maintained except on the basis of Christian doctrine.

There are moral obligations imposed by Christian truth which cannot be accepted at all, if the truth from which they arise is denied.

Christ lays upon His followers the command to obey Him even at the cost of life itself, saying: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me" (Matthew 16:24). The call to cross-bearing, to crucifixion, for the sake of another is a stern demand which no mere man can require of a fellow man, and to which no sane man will submit at the behest of another man. If Jesus is a mere man and is not divine, He has no right to impose cross-bearing upon any other man; and no one should yield to the imposition of such cruel tyranny. But if Jesus is "Very God", as well as "very man", and, if He voluntarily became a man that by His human life, sufferings, and death, He might make all who receive Him sons of God and partakers of the divine nature, He may justly call each and all men to enter into "the fellowship of His sufferings and be made conformable to His death" (Philippians 3:10).

The duty of cross-bearing for Christ's sake, finds, therefore, its sanction and motive in the essential deity and atoning death of our crucified Lord. The obligation springs from His supernatural character and saving power; and all the principles of Christian ethics derive their binding authority from the same source. Without the divine Christ there is no such thing as Christian duty.

He Himself taught this in the Sermon on the Mount. Men, who deny His deity, often cry: "Let us go back to the Sermon on the Mount and the simplicity of the teachings of Jesus." But they forget that when they go back to the Sermon on the Mount they will meet the Preacher on the Mount, and that He will be enforcing His wondrous words of light and life on this wise: "Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock: and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand: and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it" (Matthew 7:24-27).

When He uttered those sayings no more than thirty years had passed since He was born at Bethlehem. Could a mere man of any age, and far less a youth of only thirty years, thus declare that the destiny of human souls would be determined by obedience or disobedience to His sayings, without exhibiting the most monstrous egotism and calling down upon His head the execrations of mankind? But it is recorded that "when Jesus had ended these sayings the people were astonished at His doctrine", and not repelled by His teachings; "for He taught them as one having authority" (Matthew 7:28 and 29).

A man who rejects the doctrine of the deity of Jesus will not find comfort for his doubting soul by going to the Sermon on the Mount. It will drive him to the divine Saviour on Mount Calvary or deepen the darkness of his doubt.

The doctrines of Scriptural Christianity depend upon one another, even as its ethical principles rest on its doctrinal teachings.

There can be no reasonable belief in the deity of Jesus apart from faith in His enduring Incarnation. The dogma that deity came to Him by moral development, or the notion that it occupied His humanity from His baptism to His death and then abandoned it as cast-off instrumentality no longer needed or desired, are fantastic theories of ancient heretics revived in recent years as "progressive orthodoxy". His human nature was not phantom, nor was it the transient habitation of the divine. His was a true and abiding Incarnation; but its reality cannot be maintained if His Virgin Birth and bodily resurrection be denied. Those tenets are not non-essential speculations, but unshakable and indispensable facts. They who reject them, and persist in their rejection must at last deny the Incarnation. This is made quite clear in the book entitled, "Creed Or No Creed?", the able work of the Rev. Charles Harris, D. D., a learned clergyman of the Church of England. He says:

> "At the present moment modernists are upon the horns of a dilemma, from which they can only escape by ceasing to be Modernists. In the near future a momentous option will be forced—it is even now being forced—upon them. Either they will have to take their belief in the Incarnation seriously, in which case they will have to give up their principle that miracles are incredible; or else they will have to take their principle of the incredibility of miracles seriously, in which case they will have to deny the Incarnation, and sever the last link that still binds them to Historic Christianity.
> "Already the Liberal Protestantism of the Continent has made its choice. It has rejected the Incarnation. A generation ago the movement in Germany passed through precisely the same phase that it is now passing through in England. In the late eighties, and with more insistence in the nineties, the German Liberals demanded permission to understand the clauses of the Apostles' Creed, which affirm the Virgin Birth and Resurrection of Jesus, in the 'symbolic' sense advocated by English Modernists. Many of the German leaders maintained, in the same manner as their English followers, that the granting of this demand would strengthen, not weaken, the Church's hold upon the doctrine of the Incarnation. The permission was granted, and we now see the result. Today in the Prussian State Church Unitarianism is the dominant creed. Can any reasonable person doubt that, the attitude toward the miraculous of German Protestantism and English Modernism being the same, the granting of this permission in England would have the same deplorable result that it has already had in Germany?"

The warning which Dr. Harris thus gives to the Liberalists of England, is equally applicable to the Latitudinarians of America.

Men cannot pick and choose among the doctrines of Christianity, rejecting all that is not acceptable to the carnal reason, without losing at least their hold upon all.

Siberian travelers, pursued by packs of hungry wolves, sometimes adopt the unwise expedient of casting out portions of their stock of food, hoping thereby to arrest the pursuit of the ravenous beasts and thus escape. But when they have thus drawn after them the voracious horde, they themselves are devoured when all their supply of food has been exhausted. In like manner a man who, to appease doubts, casts out first one Christian truth and then another, in the end is the victim of insatiable infidelity.

The Person of Christ is at the center of the Christian system, and by Him it is solidified into an indivisible whole. The rationalism which seeks to disintegrate the doctrinal basis of the Christian religion at last attacks the Christ Himself.

So Bishop Charles John Ellicott showed in his "Christus Comprobator" many years ago. Discussing the corrosive criticism of the rationalists, the great Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol predicted the outcome of it which has now come to pass. He said:

> "The same spirit that has found irreconcilable difficulties in the supernatural element of the Old Testament will ultimately challenge the evidence on which the Incarnation rests. And the more so as all the age-long testimonies of the Old Testament, all the foreshadowings of all the promises that were greeted from afar, all the sure words of prophecy, will have been explained away; and there will remain nothing save two narratives, which, it will be said, bear so patently the traces of illusion, or, at the least, of an idealism expressing itself under the guise of alleged facts, that the doctrine of the Word become flesh, the doctrine which is the hope, light and life of the universe will be surrendered to the last demands of what will have now become not a distressed, but a ruined faith. When that blessed doctrine is surrendered, the total eclipse of faith will have commenced and the shadows of the great darkness will be fast sweeping over the forlorn and desolate soul."

DAILY NOTES ON THE SCRIPTURE PORTIONS

By the Reverend W. G. Scroggie, D. D.

THE SCRIPTURE UNION.

Sunday, March 25—St. John 14:1-14.

Subject-Title—Questions and Answers.

THE MESSAGE.

I said yesterday that the First Discourse in this division of John's Gospel is dialogue (13:31 to 14:31). Let us mark this in fuller detail. First Dialogue: Peter and Jesus (13:36, to 14:4). Peter's Inquiry: "Where art Thou going, and why cannot I follow Thee now?" Jesus' Reply: "There are discipline and design in my departure." The discipline we glanced at yesterday: the design is revealed today. Christ went "to prepare a place" for us. How did He do this? By, as Man, opening Heaven for believing men. The "mansions" are in the "house". The former word is used of stations on a great road, where travelers found refreshment, so that here are the ideas of repose and progress. Further, Christ in going had in view His coming again. Second Dialogue: Thomas and Jesus (14:5-7). Thomas' Inquiry "Not knowing the goal, how can we know the way?" Jesus' Reply: "The Father is the Goal, and I am the Way." Here the true Course, and Creed and Character are brought to light: Christ the Way to Walk; the Truth to Trust; and the Life to Live. Truth, in the first place, is not something to know, but something to be; it is not a dogma, but a life. Christ plainly declares His eternal oneness with the Father, that is, His own Deity (7). Third Dialogue: Philip and Jesus (14:8-21). Philip's Inquiry: "Shall we not be contended if Thou wilt shew us the Father?" Jesus' Reply: "I am the revelation of the Father, and am ever with you, the power of life and of service." Verses 8-11 treat of the objective manifestation of God without the disciples; their idea. Verses 12-21 tell of the subjective manifestation of God within them; Jesus' revelation. With reference to the latter—(a) By virtue of the disciples' relation to Christ, they will carry on His work after His departure (12-14). What are the "greater works"? It is possible? Are you doing them?

Monday, March 26—St. John 14:15-31.

Subject-Title—Promise and Precept.

THE MESSAGE.

We here carry on the latter part of yesterday's message. (b) Christ is about to leave His disciples, but He will make provision for them during His absence (15-17). Ponder carefully these great words. Mark two things. First, the Trinity in verse 16. "I" "the Father", "Comforter". As otherwhere, Christ, without hesitation, associates Himself with the Father and the Spirit in a way that can only mean that He too is God. Incidentally, here is evidence of the Personality of the Spirit. Second, observe what is said about the Spirit, not only in verse 17, but throughout these chapters (14-16). Distinguish "with", and "in" verse 17: "with" characterizes the previous dispensation; and "in", the present age. (c) The Master promises to come back to His own (18-21). The R. V. has rightly, "I come to you" as also in verse 3. This means, not only the Second Advent, but also in resurrection days, at Pentecost, and at other times. He teaches the disciples that obedience is the true expression of love. Now comes, The Fourth Dialogue: Jude and Jesus (14: 22-31). Jude's Inquiry: "What is the principle of Thy self-revelation?" Jesus' Reply: The conditions, mode, and promise of that revelation are detailed. There are here three paragraphs. 22-24. Christ emphasises the truth just approached (21), that in order to receive Divine communications men must both love and obey. 25-27. He then fore-intimates the New Testament: the Gospels, "will bring all things to your remembrance": the Epistles, "teach you all things": and the Apocalypse, "things to come" (16:13): and He promises to His disciples His abiding peace. 28-31. Once more Christ tells of His coming departure, and the effect of it. A closing word—"let us go home" (31). He goes with us, and we with Him.

Subject-Title—The Fruitfulness and Friendship.

THE MESSAGE.

There is inestimable treasure in these few verses. What multitudes have drunk at this crystal spring! Our portion is in two parts: 1. Life and Fruitfulness (1-8), and 2. Love and Friendship (9-16). Life and Fruitfulness. Two things are assumed: first, that there can be no fruitfulness where there is no life; and second, that where there is life there is always some measure of fruitfulness. To these should be added the further thought that fruitfulness has reference, not to service, but to character. We are taught also that there are degrees of fruitfulness; "fruit", "more fruit", "much fruit" (2, 53, or, according to the synoptists, "thirtyfold, sixtyfold, an hundredfold". How much fruit are you bearing? that is, how like Christ are you becoming? The victorious life is one, not of struggle, but of rest; it is an abiding. The branch does not struggle to abide in the vine, but being vitally related to it, it just abides, and partaking of the nourishment of the root, without a struggle brings forth fruit. Is that your experience? Love and Friendship. Here is an entirely new ethic! Friendship with Christ and fellowship with Christians is conditional upon obedience to a command—to love. Only in the realm of things Divine is love a duty. We may be God's children without being His friends; the one is based on His gift of life to us; the other, upon our grace of love to Him. Are you a friend of God? You cannot have God and the world for friends at the same time. "The friendship of the world is enmity with God." The world hated, and hates, Christ, and therefore will not love you if you are like Him. Do you believe this? Mark in our portion Christ's teaching on Prayer, verses 7, 16. Here is an unlimited promise on a limited condition.

Wednesday, March 28—St. John 15:18-27.

Subject-Title—The Church in the World.

THE MESSAGE.

If in verses 1-11 the subject is The Disciples and Christ, and in 12-17, The Disciples and One Another, in 18-27, it is The Disciples and the World; and we learn of the world's hatred, and the disciples' witness. 1. The Hatred of the World Toward the Disciples (18-25). The keynote here is, "The servant is not greater than his Lord". Once upon a time, at a social function, a lady expressed the opinion that if Jesus came to London today He would not be treated as He was in Jerusalem, but enthusiastically welcomed, and she appealed to Thomas Carlyle for endorsement of her view; whereupon that sage rasped out, "No, Madam, if Christ came to London today they would take Him to Newgate and hang Him". With all the changes which have taken place during the last 1900 years, human nature has not changed; its attitude towards God in Christ is fundamentally the same, though varied in its expression. The expression may change from violence to contempt, but the principle remains the same. 2. The Witness of the Disciples to the World (26-27). The disciples' declaration (27) follows the Spirit's instruction (26). The Christian's witness can be powerful only as it is informed and inspired: mark both these things, and not only the latter. It is to Christ and of Him that both the Spirit and the disciples bear witness. To speak rightly and effectively of Him it is necessary that we be "with Him" (27), and so, know Him. Remember, it is not gramophones that are wanted, but voices. This is a chapter full of sharp contrasts, a feature characteristic of the Apostle John's writings. He draws a clear line of distinction between light and darkness, life and death, right and wrong, Church and world, truth and error, God and Satan. Do you think clearly?

Today's Thought—True To Christ In a Sinful World.

Thursday, March 29—St. John 16:1-15.

Subject-Title—The Spirit in the World and the Church.

THE MESSAGE.

1. The Spirit and the World (1-11). In chapter 15: 18-25, we read of the hatred of the world. Here in verses

1-4a, the subject is continued, and we are shown that its activity is the expression of a false religious zeal. Fancy people ignorant of the Father and the Son imagining that they can "do God service"! Perhaps the outstanding illustration of this is Saul of Tarsus; but still there are numberless people who "have a zeal, but not according to knowledge". The most difficult world to deal with, is the religious world. The Lord then tells the disciples that the mission of the Spirit is conditioned upon His own departure from them (4b-7). It is worth while to mark the Master's reasons for not having before said certain things (4), and for now saying certain things (ch. 14:29). His teaching was, and is, according to the capacity of His disciples to apprehend (12); and this is a fundamental principle of all teaching. When Jesus ascended, His local presence gave way to His omnipresence. That necessity made His departure expedient (7). We have not lost but gained by His going from the world as to bodily presence. In verses 8-11 is detailed the Spirit's mission in the world (a wonderful paragraph). The next is verse 8, and the exposition of it 9-11. These are the three great things—Sin, Righteousness, Judgment, and mark—judgment past, not to come. The second passage is on, (2) The Spirit and the Church (12-15). These verses anticipate not only a revelation, but also a record. "The same trust which leads us to believe that the Apostles were guided into the Truth, leads us also to believe that by the providential leading of the Spirit they were so guided as to present it in such a way that it might remain in a permanent form" (Westcott).

Today's Thought—What a Comfort To Have the Comforter.

Friday, March 30—St. John 16:16-33.

Subject-Title—Last Words.

THE MESSAGE.

There now draws to a close the Lord's last discourse to the inner circle of His disciples. He tells them that when He departs they will stand in quite a new relation to Him, and this puzzled them (16-18). He further tells them that a time of sorrow is at hand, to be followed by joy, the joy to come out of the sorrow (19-22). Nowhere are Christians led to expect immunity from sorrow in this world, but neither does the N. T. teach that sorrow and joy are mutually exclusive; that at any given time we have either the one or the other. On the contrary it teaches that joy is transfigured sorrow (20); that neither can exist without the other. It was in this week of Christ's most poignant sorrow that He talked most about His joy. Have you noticed that? Mark His references to joy in these two last discourses. The Apostle Paul had caught His Master's meaning when he said, "sorrowful, yet always rejoicing". Next, Jesus speaks to His Apostles about the future (23-28). "That day," referred to in verse 23, began at Pentecost, and will close when Christ returns, it has lasted already nearly 2,000 years. Mark the two words (Greek) translated "ask" in verse 23. "Ye shall ask Me nothing", means that there would no longer be any need to ask Him any questions: verse 19 shows this, where the same word is used. But "whatsoever ye shall ask the Father", refers to prayer. After a confession from the disciples (29-30), Jesus speaks a final word of warning and assurance (31-33). Think of it. In the deep shadow of the Cross, He says to this handful of men, "Cheer up, I have conquered". There is nothing to compare with this in all history. Have you cheered up? Are you living in His victory?

Subjejct-Title—Intercession.

THE MESSAGE.

Relative to the disciples, in 13:1-30, we have Introduction of the Light to them: in 13:31 to 16:33, Impartation of the Light to them; and now, in 17, Intercession for the Light in them. It would not be seemly to attempt too acute an analysis of any true prayer, least of all this one. The out-pouring of the soul of the Redeemer is for our worshipful contemplation rather than for critical analysis. Nevertheless, we may discern here certain movements of thought. Having regard for the subjects of the prayer, observe, 1. Christ's Prayer for Himself (1-5). 2, Christ's Prayer for His Disciples (6-19). 3, Christ's Prayer for the whole Church (20-26). And having regard for the substance of the Prayer, mark these great notes: (a) Revelation (1-5). (b) Preservation (6-16). (c) Sanctification (17-19). (d) Unification (20-23). (e) Glorification (24-26). The Revelation of the past and future glory of the redeeming Son makes possible the individual Preservation and Sanctification of those whom He has redeemed. These individual blessings enjoyed would find expression in spiritual Unity throughout the whole Church, and this will issue finally in the Glorification of all who have been so divinely enlightened and loved. This is the Lord's Prayer: that in Matthew 6, is the Disciples' Prayer. Trace these dominating words in this Prayer: Father, Glorify, Kept, Word, Pray, Even as (so), Sent, One, Know, Name, Loved. Observe in this Prayer the clear-cut distinction which is made between the Church and the World; between believers and unbelievers. Love is essentially self-forgetful and sacrificial, and so giving is a dominating note throughout. There is much talk today about Church Union. What is of vastly greater importance, is Christian Unity. Is Christ's prayer being answered in you?

A LAYMAN'S THOUGHTS

W. H. Randolph

Who owns the Church, anyway? The Bishops, Priests and Deacons, or the laymen? Have we erected a Frankenstein in our institutional Church which the laymen can no longer control? Are our leaders chosen by ourselves for our purposes or for their own? Who supplies the money for our Seminaries and church buildings? And was it not specified in the gift for what this money was to be used? Did leaders or followers make possible the successful separation of the Protestants from Rome? Did leaders or followers make successful the great Methodist movement? Why cannot the laymen send lay delegates to the next General Convention to tell the Bishops, Priests and Deacons where they get off?

The layman is not intolerant of any other layman's point of view, however much he may differ with it, for he gives him the credit for honesty of belief. But the layman is entirely intolerant of the Bishop, Priest or Deacon who is honest enough, as he says, to express his honest opinion in public, but is at the same time dishonest enough to hold on to his pay envelope supplied by those whom he is supposed to serve, while stabbing in the back their most cherished beliefs.

If the Bishop, Priest or Deacon believes he owns a higher allegiance than to those he serves, by all manner of means he should be allowed the privilege of his belief, and he will be respected for his belief just so soon, and only so soon, as he gives up his job and goes to work on his own to put his belief over.

Modernistic thought—Where does it come from? Fundamentalism—Where does it come from? The layman considers the source, and prefers to put his faith in what is called Revelation—which may be superstition, but, at best, speaks with authority and affords comfort and a satisfying cause for decency and purpose in living, and has done so for thousands of years. At its worst, no one can ever charge Bible revelation with having hindered the development of the individual or the race.

And what of modernistic thought? Whence comes it? Individual speculation—Speculation versus Revelation—How can the intelligent layman hesitate in his choice? My answer is, he does not, and I believe that an instructed body of laymen sent to the General Convention, instructed to speak as the laymen think and believe, instructed to act legally if possible, illegally if otherwise, but instructed to act in the matter of modernistic innovations, instructed to read the riot act to the Bishops, Priests and Deacons, would have the effect of consolidating the expression of individual layman belief throughout the land, and eventually, if not immediately, restoring to the Bishops, Priests and Deacons a proper conception of their function in our Church.

Rebellion on the part of the laymen—Well, they have rebelled before. The history of the Episcopal Church in America is not one to be uniformly proud of. There seems to be something inherent in it that gives its Bishops, Priests and Deacons an over conception of their importance to the salvation of the layman. The huge growth of other Protestant denominations should have taught them a lesson. Wise men learn from experience. Have our Bishops, Priests and Deacons done so? It is not so many years back to the days of the Church as Bishop Meade found it. It has grown since. Why? Because Bishop Meade and his successors believed in Revelation or in Speculation? Did they voice the aspirations of the Soul of the laymen or the gratification of his intellect?

As a layman, I believe I am as important in the scheme of things as any Bishop, Priest, or Deacon. I know that I am one of a vastly more numerous class, and I believe that I am uttering the feelings of my class. All that we want the modernistic Bishops, Priests and Deacons to do is to get out, after which they can speculate to their hearts' content. It is true, we believe that, when they get the layman's point of view from being laymen for a while, they will accept revealed religion as the layman accepts it.

Do more men go to hear sermons or to attend Bible classes?

TOLERANCE AND INTOLERANCE

Walter L. Lingle

A GREAT deal is being said in the newspapers these days about religious tolerance. My daily paper today carried a front page article in which John W. Davis, former candidate for the presidency, was exhorting Protestants to exercise tolerance towards Jews and Catholics. Another front page article told of a dinner which was held in Richmond and to which one hundred and fifty Protestants, one hundred and fifty Jews, and one hundred and fifty Catholics were invited. The object of the meeting was to cultivate good will and tolerance. The Governor of the State made them an address on the subject. On the editorial page there was a long editorial exhorting us to tolerance. This one paper gives but a sample of the many articles which are being published on tolerance and intolerance. The gist of all these articles is that the Protestants of America at this time are exceedingly guilty of intolerance towards Jews and Catholics, but especially towards Catholics.

What Is Tolerance?

It strikes me that there is a lot of loose and foolish talking and writing these days on the subject of tolerance. Perhaps it is done for political effect, I do not know of any other reason why it should be done. What do they mean by tolerance? They seem to mean that everybody must consider one religion just as good and just as true as another. These writers do not seem to leave any room for deep and abiding religious convictions. To them tolerance means full approval.

I have just looked up the definition of the word tolerance in an unabridged dictionary. Here is the definition I found: "Allowance of that which is not wholly approved, especially allowances of religious opinions and modes of worship contrary to or different from those of the Established Church or belief; recognition of the right of private judgment, especially as to religious matters."

If the foregoing is anything like a correct definition then I am sure that I do not know any Protestants who are intolerant towards Jews or Catholics. We believe that the Jewish religion is fatally defective in that it leaves Christ out. We believe that the Roman Catholic Church has added many things in its government, in its doctrines, and in its worship which are not found in the Holy Scriptures, and that it has departed a long way from New Testament Christianity. At the same time we believe that the Jews and Catholics have the full right to worship God according to their own convictions, with no one to molest or to make them afraid. As an actual fact they are exercising this right to the fullest. They have their synagogues, churches and cathedrals all over the land and worship in them from week to week with the same freedom that Protestants have. I do not know of a Protestant anywhere who would in any way limit this freedom.

Prejudice.

I admit that there is at times a prejudice against the Jews; but if you will take the pains to analyze it, you will probably discover that it is social, commercial, or racial, and not religious. The strongest prejudice against the Jews among Gentiles is generally among those Gentiles who do not profess to be Christians, and not among those who are Christians. This would indicate that it is not a religious prejudice. It must be admitted that some of the Jewish people have social, commercial and racial customs which are different from the Gentiles around them, and the prejudice rises on this account and not because of their religion.

When we say that Christians exercise the fullest tolerance towards the Jews in the exercise of their religion, this, of course, does not mean that we believe the Jewish religion without Christ is as good as Christianity with Christ at its very center. If a Christian minister does not invite a Jewish rabbi to preach in his church, it does not mean that the minister is guilty of intolerance. It means that he has the conviction that he would not be loyal to Jesus Christ if he were to invite into his pulpit one who denies Him. There is a world of difference between Judaism and Christianity. The Christian minister can not minimize that difference and at the same time be loyal to Jesus Christ. Yet the Christian can be utterly friendly to the Jews and recognize that in our free land they have the full right to worship God according to their own convictions.

No Intolerance.

Nor do I know any one who is intolerant towards a Roman Catholic, because of his religion. Protestants are continually thrown with Catholics in the business and social world and there is no distinction made. Personally I have had some very close friends who were Catholics. I believe that there are many Catholics who are devout Christians. Of course, that does not mean that Protestants approve of all the doctrines and practices of the Roman Catholic Church. The very name Protestant was given to us, because the leaders of the Reformation strongly protested against many of the doctrines and practices of the Catholic Church.

Roman Catholic Views.

While Protestants believe that there are many Catholics who are devout Christians and who will be saved, the Catholics do not take any such charitable view of Protestants. The Pope in his recent encyclical made it perfectly clear that he does not believe that there is any salvation outside the Roman Catholic Church. I have in my hand a book published by John Joseph McVey, of Philadelphia, entitled, "A Manual of Christian Doctrine". It was written by a Catholic seminary professor, and has upon it the imprimatur of Arthur J. Scanlan, the censor, and Archbishop D. J. Dougherty, of Philadelphia. It is intended as a manual of religious instruction for Catholic high schools, academies and colleges. It was copyrighted in 1919 and my copy, which was printed in 1926, belongs to the forty-seventh edition. I give all of this data to show something of the authority of the book and of its large circulation. Forty-seven editions in seven years is a remarkable record. A great many of their young people must be studying it. Let us see what they are being taught about Protestants.

Question: "What is the Catholic Church?" This question refers to the Catholic Church mentioned in the Apostles' Creed.

Answer: "The Catholic Church is the society of all those who, being baptized, profess the faith of Christ, and are governed by their lawful pastors under one visible head, the Pope."

Question: "Why is it necessary to belong to the church to be saved?"

Answer: "Because salvation outside the Church is just as impossible as salvation without Christ."

Question: "Who do not belong to the Church?"

Answer: "Infidels, heretics, schismatics, ex-communicates and apostates do not belong to the Church."

Question: "Who are heretics?"

Answer: "Heretics are such as, although baptized, reject one or more articles taught by the Church, as Protestants."

Remember that the word Church used above always refers to the Roman Catholic Church, and you will see that Roman Catholic boys and girls are being taught that it is impossible for Protestants to be saved. By the way, this book has five hundred and seventy-one pages of questions and answers about the beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church. If you want a pretty full statement of all their beliefs you will find it in this book.

In spite of the fact that Catholics are teaching their children that all Protestants are going to be lost, Protestants have recognized their right of private judgment, even about Protestants, and their right to hold their own religious views and to worship according to those views.

Should Protestants Vote for a Catholic?

What is all this talk concerning intolerance about, then? It has arisen simply because many Protestants hesitate to vote for a Roman Catholic for President of the United States. They do not hesitate because of his religious views, but because of the political views of the Roman Catholic Church. Let us turn again to the book referred to above, a book which is being taught to our American boys and girls on such a large scale. Please remember that when the expression "the Church" is used it always refers to the Roman Catholic Church.

Question: "What more should the State do than respect the rights and liberty of the Church?"

Answer: "The State should also aid, protect and defend the Church."

Question: "What, then, is the principal obligation of the heads of States?"

Answer: "Their principal obligation is to practice the Catholic religion themselves, and, as they are in power to protect and defend it."

Question: "Has the State the right and duty to proscribe schism or heresy?" Remember in a previous question that we saw that Protestants are heretics.

Answer: "Yes, it has the right and duty to do so, both for the good of the nation, and for that of the faithful themselves; for religious unity is the principal foundation of social unity."

Question: "When may the State tolerate dissenting worships?" Remember that all Protestants are dissenters.

Answer: "When the worships have acquired a sort of legal existence consecrated by time and accorded by treaties or covenants."

Question: "May the State separate itself from the Church?"

Answer: "No, because it may not withdraw from the supreme rule of Christ."

Question: "What name is given to the doctrine that the State has neither the right nor the duty to be united to the Church to protect it?"

Answer: "The doctrine is called Liberalism. It is founded principally on the fact that modern society rests on liberty of conscience and of worship, on liberty of speech and of the press." Take away the liberty of conscience, of worship, of speech, and of the press, and how much liberty would we have left?

Protestants hesitate to vote for Catholics for high office, not because of their religion, but because they hold these political views, and because they are teaching them to their children and because the Roman Catholic Church has always claimed political and civil power and has always exercised it, whenever it has been possible. It is not religious intolerance, which makes a Protestant hesitate to vote for Catholics for high office, but it is the political creed of the Roman Church. If the Roman Catholic Church will renounce all its claims to political and civil power, the problem will be solved. In the meantime, if Protestants hesitate to vote for Catholics, because Catholics hold and teach their children a political creed which is un-American and which is opposed to liberty of conscience, liberty of worship, liberty of speech, and liberty of the press, it is neither just nor honest to accuse Protestants of religious intolerance.—Reprinted from The Presbyterian of the South.

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES

Prepared by J. T. Bougher.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

LESSON—No. 27.

TOPIC—Types in the Scripture (1 Cor. 10:11).

A type in the Holy Scripture is something which foreshadows that which is still to come. Types may consist of persons, animals, ceremonies, events, structures, colors, or works of nature, etc., and afford an interesting study, as an evidence of the unerring accuracy of the sacred Word.

The principal types are to be found in the first five books of the Old Testament, while their fulfillment appears in the New Testament, thus beautifully connecting the different Dispensations of time, and displaying the unchanging character of our God. Some types are to be found near the surface, while others are of such depth as being discerned only through extended knowledge of the great "doctrines" of the Bible, and of the "type" as well.

In fact, it is only in proportion to our knowledge of the wonderful works of God all about us, as well as the customs of the Holy Land in which the Bible was written that we enter into the marvelous depth of the Holy Word. Especially is this true with respect to the parables used by our Lord when He sought to emphasize an important truth.

It is for this reason that certain parts of the Scripture is of special interest to some, yet uninteresting to others. For example, "The Bright and Morning Star", as one of many names of our Saviour may have no attraction to the average reader, but when we know something of "the Morning Star" we grasp the name with intense interest. As pilgrims of the night we should know that this star shines brightest, when the night is darkest, and which is just before the dawn. The night of sin now sweeping over the world is indeed dark, and to the "believers" our Lord is becoming increasingly precious. He is their "Bright and Morning Star", a token of the coming morn, when the Sun of righteousness shall arise, with healing in His wings, and all shadows flee away.

Below are a few of the principal types which are of special interest as we compare the characteristics of the type with that which it symbolizes. (*Some have a double application.)

1. Types of the Holy Spirit; Oil, Water, Fire, Wind, Dove.
2. Types of Christ; The Ark, Joseph, Lamb, Rock, Fountain, The Sun, The Tabernacle and Furnishings, Jonah.*
3. Types of the "Bride of Christ": Rebekah, Ruth, The Moon.
4. Types of Israel: Fig-tree, Jonah*, Olive-tree.
5. Types of the approaching Judgment: The Flood, The Plagues.
6. Types of Sin: Leprosy, Leaven.
7. Types of "Believers": The Stars, The Branches, Fruit.

In fact, after we have come to know our Bible, and know Him, whom to know aright is Life Eternal, we may discern all about us, unending reminders of this King of Kings and Lord of Lords, and His marvelous love for a lost world. We trust that many are using the "Plain Bible Studies", to learn more and more of Him before whom, some day, "every knee shall bow".

HISTORIC PERIODS OF FREDERICKSBURG.

Mrs. Vivian Minor Fleming.

Historic Period No. 3.—1714-1716.

Governor Spottswood—Germanna—The Iron Works—Knights of the Golden Horseshoe.

From the building of the fort and the settling of the two hundred soldiers and their families in 1681 up to the coming of Governor Spottswood there is no information available to us.

Governor Spottswood is a most interesting personage. He came to Virginia in 1710 and brought with him the Writ of Habeas Corpus, so greatly desired by the colonists. He was one of the most energetic, patriotic and far-seeing statesman that ever ruled Virginia. He had a distinguished ancestry and had fought with Marlborough. He established a school for Christianizing the Indians and donated one thousand pounds to a college for that purpose. Governor Spottswood first established postoffices in Virginia and was afterwards Deputy Postmaster-General of the Colonies.

Of the settlement of Germanna, Governor Spottswood writes: "I have placed there near the Rapidan a number of Protestant Germans, built them a fort, furnished it with two pieces of cannon and some ammunition, which will awe the straggling parties of Northern Indians and be a good barrier to all that part of the country." These Germans were from Musen, where they had been iron-workers, invited over by De Graffenried. They landed at Tappahannock. James Weaver, grandson of the emigrant, writes: "They packed their provisions from Fredericksburg on their heads all the first year of their occupancy," showing that Fredericksburg, at that time the Leaseland, was the trading point for that part of the country. They worked the iron mines with some success, and Governor Spottswood was deeply interested in pushing this, the first iron industry of the Colonies. This gave him the name of the "Tubal Cain of America".

Judge Brooke says, in his narrative, that Governor Spottswood made five thousand pounds a year with his iron works.

When Governor Spottswood retired from Williamsburg he came to Germanna and built himself a castle, where Colonel Byrd visited him in 1732. He was one of the ancestors of General Lee. From his wife (Butler Brayne), through her second marriage, with the Rev. John Thompson, are descended some of the oldest families of Fredericksburg.

The episode of the "Knights of the Golden Horseshoe", as well as the iron mines of Germanna, shows Governor Spottswood as a man of vision.

In 1716, accompanied by John Fontane (whose complete diary is in Captain Quinn's History of Fredericksburg), Robert Beverley, the historian, Col. Robertson, Dr. Robertson, Taylor, Todd, Mason, Austin, Smith, Captain Clowder and Brooke, the ancestor of Judge Francis T. Brooke and Governor Brooke, four Indians and two small companies of rangers—about fifty in all. They had with them provisions, large numbers of riding and pack horses and an abundant supply of liquors, Virginia red wine, white wine, Irish Usequebaugh, two sorts of rum, Champagne, cherry, punch, cider, etc. They, with Governor Spottswood, started from Williamsburg on August 20, 1716, stopped at Austin Smith's in Fredericksburg and dined on the twenty-fourth, and left Germanna on the twenty-fifth. They drank his Majesty's health on the summit of the Blue Ridge, went on to the Shenandoah, which they called the Euphrates, and got back to Germanna on the fifteenth of September.

For the expedition a multitude of horse shoes had to be provided, which were not needed in the low country around Williamsburg, upon which account the Governor, on their return, presented each of his companions with a golden horseshoe set in jewels, with the inscription "Sic Juvat Transcendere Montes".

THE ORBIT OF EXISTENCE

William Tyler Olcott

(Kindly written for The Southern Churchman by the author of "A Field Book of the Stars", "In Star Land With a Three Inch Telescope", "Star Lore of All Ages", and other accepted popular astronomical authorities.)

"To whatever worlds He carries our souls when they pass out of these imprisoning bodies, in those worlds these souls of ours shall find themselves part of the same great Temple; for it belongs not to this earth alone. There can be no end of the universe where God is, to which that growing Temple does not reach—the Temple of a creation to be wrought at last into a perfect utterance of God by a perfect obedience to God."—Phillips Brooks.

In all ages of the world's history, man has speculated on his future existence. The subject of the immortality of the soul has held man's attention, consideration, and thought, since first he gazed upon the firmament. The present he has been sure of, the future he has been eager to grasp.

The primitive people of prehistoric times doubtless believed in a future life. The savages and barbarians of a later period we know were instinctively assured of a life hereafter. Their Happy Hunting Ground, their Nirvana, are synonymous with the Heaven the Christian now regards as his future abode. All theologies and religions have bestowed on mankind the hope and assurance of immortality. In this hope man has greeted death with a smile, regarding it merely a stepping-stone to birth, the birth of a new life.

When we consider life as an entity, we realize that it is composed of three states of existence, the Past, Present and Future. It is an amazing fact that in this latter day man has ignored, for the most part, the importance of the former state, the significance of the Past.

Surely, if we consider the reality of a future life, logic forces the conclusion of the actuality of a past life. The past and future are equidistant from the present, and of equal and logical reality.

Considering, then, Life as a continuity, and of what we have the assurance of reason, in a world that is teeming with all that is reasonable, we see these three states of being equally real, and equal in every and all respects and particulars.

We have lately come to have a higher respect for orbital systems than formerly. Copernicus opened man's eyes to the true conception of the solar system, a central sun with planets encircling it. Now modern Science senses in two widely divergent and signally important phenomena, like systems.

Few astronomers doubt that time will reveal a deviation in the straight lines which the sun now travels in the direction of the constellation Lyra, at the rate of twelve miles a second, and that when a divergence from this path is noted, it will be found to conform to the characteristics of a circle or eclipse.

This will, if true, be also true of every star in the Universe, and man will then survey one thousand million suns, speeding with incredible rapidity on circular orbits of amplitude far beyond his comprehension. Nothing ever presented to the mind of man transcends in majesty, sublimity, wonder, and awe, the contemplation of this flight of whirling gigantic suns.

Again, the electronic theory, lately developed, indicates that the atoms of matter are but miniature solar systems, consisting of a central sun surrounded by its satellites, the electrons.

To sum up, our solar system is composed of a central sun, with planets revolving about it. Our earth, one of these planets, is the abode of the present. Every living organism is dependent on the central sun for its existence. For them it is the life-giving power, if not the source of life, it is the servant of that Power, fulfilling His will, and functioning in accordance with His design to promote the well being of the living.

The nucleus, or proton, is the central sun of the electrons. Without the proton the electrons would cease to exist. God actuates, governs, and controls the activities of the proton as He does our sun.

Consider, now, the celestial bodies, the myriad suns that stud the Universe. Their reason for being can only be identical with that of our sun, which is like unto them. Our sun sustains and perpetuates life here. The distant suns beyond, foster and promote life on other planets there.

God designed the suns. God created the atoms. In each case they represent the fountain heads of life that animate and nourish their offsprings, the planets and electrons.

Thus, in the superlative of the celestial and terrestrial creations, in the very elements of matter, in all we sense from birth to death, we see one design manifested, one purpose revealed, one motion emphasized, the orbital.

Considering the fact that this particular type of motion is the prime factor, the universal natural phenomenon, the paramount consideration in our contemplation of life here, it is logical and reasonable to suppose that it plays an all-important part in the great universal scheme of life in all its tenses. This emphasis, placed on one type of motion in all-revealed natural phenomena, should claim the attention that emphasis receives in the world of expression and thought.

The facts we emphasize are those we wish to stress and call the attention of others to, those that have a special significance, those which are all important. It is, therefore, logical to conclude that this emphasis placed on orbital motion is not a chance phenomenon, but one designed to reveal the most important truth in life. Orbital motion is the most significant of all natural laws and phenomena. It lies at the very heart of life, at the very root of existence. Let us express this deduction in terms of time.

Infinity and eternity are qualities impossible, it is said, for the human mind to comprehend, but is this really true, if we consider time and life as moving and actuating on a circular orbit?

Time is admitted by all to be flowing uniformly in one direction. Strangely enough, its direction of flight has generally been considered to be a straight line. It is perfectly logical to suppose that it flows in a circle, and if this is true, eternity is understandable, and the orbit of time becomes the orbit of existence.

Time, some one has said is but "articulated eternity". Ever onward, ever upward, each state of existence a step up to meet the succeeding period of being, advancing steadily along the closed circle of Time, from a dark initial state of chaotic imperfection to a divinely ordained, and glorious state of sublime and exalted perfection.

ROMANIZING THE CHURCH

IN order to prove the truth of this serious charge, let us here compare certain teachings of the Protestant Episcopal Church with those of the Anglo-Catholics.

THE SACRAMENTS.

Protestant Episcopal Teachings.

(From the Articles of Religion, Prayer Book, pp. 557-566.)
Art. XXV. Of the Sacrament.

". . . . There are two sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.

Those five commonly called Sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction, are not to be counted for Sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures. . . . ." (Prayer Book, pp. 562-63.)

Anglo-Catholic Teachings.

". . . . . there are Seven Sacraments ordained by Christ in His Church, namely, Holy Baptism, the Holy Eucharist, Confirmation, Penance, Holy Order, Holy Matrimony, Holy Unction." (From the "Seven Sacraments", by the Rev. S. C. Hughson, O. H. C., Chairman of the Catholic Congress, p. 8.)

"Its (the Catholic Congress') purpose is to propagate and defend the religion of the Incarnation of God the Son, as that religion is made available for men through the seven Christ-ordained Sacraments of the Holy Catholic Church." (From the letter-head of the Catholic Congress.)

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

(The Roman Catholic Church teaches that in celebrating the mass, or Communion, the priest by his blessing changes the bread and wine into the flesh and blood of Christ and also sacrifices Christ anew, as He was sacrificed on the Cross.)

Protestant Episcopal Teachings.

Art. XXVIII. Of the Lord's Supper.

"Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of Bread and Wine) in the Supper of the Lord cannot be proved by Holy Writ; but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions. . . . . .

"The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." (Prayer Book, p. 564.)

Art. XXXI. Of the One Oblation of Christ finished upon the Cross.

"The Offering of Christ once made is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction, for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin, but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifice of Masses, in the which it was commonly said, that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits."

Anglo-Catholic Teachings.

"In the tremendous moment, when, through the words and acts of the priest, the Bread and Wine become the Body and Blood of God, we too stand on Calvary." (From the "Seven Sacraments", by the Rev. S. C. Hughson, O. H. C., Chairman of the Catholic Congress, p. 41.)

"The Sacrifice of the Mass is the same as that of the Cross."

"The Lord Jesus Christ, who offered Himself upon the Cross, is offered upon the altar."

"Where there is no Mass, there is no Church."

"It is not necessary to speak at any length of the Solemn Mass in the Cathedral. This offering of the Holy Sacrifice, with all the beauty and glory of holiness, was, of course, the central feature of the whole Congress." (From the Introduction to a volume entitled, "The Second Catholic Congress", Addresses and Papers, p. 15.)

The above comparison proves that Anglo-Catholic teachings are expressly condemned, repudiated, or forbidden by the Articles of Religion, which are a part of the constitution of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

This is one of the reasons why the Anglo-Catholic party has determined to abolish the Articles of Religion. Under their leadership the last General Convention of the Church voted to suppress this statement of our faith. To become effective this action must be ratified by the next General Convention which meets in the fall of 1928. If you wish to preserve the Protestant Episcopal Church, elect to the Diocesan Convention in the spring of 1928 genuine Episcopalians, who will choose Protestant delegates to the General Convention pledged to defeat this subversive plan.

WHEN A VOW IS NOT A VOW.

By teaching forbidden doctrines to their trustful congregations The Anglo-Catholic clergy habitually and cynically break their ordination vows. In order to prove the truth of this second serious charge, let us turn once more to the Prayer Book, this time to the ordination services.

When a deacon is ordained priest, he takes two solemn pledges.

First, he promises "always so to minister the Doctrine and Sacraments, and the Discipline of Christ, as the Lord hath commanded, and as this Church hath received the same, according to the Commandments of God; . . . ."

Second, he promises "with all faithful diligence, to banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's word; . . . . . ". (Prayer Book, p. 518.)

When a priest is consecrated bishop, he confirms the second pledge in identical language, promising once more "with all faithful diligence, to banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrines contrary to God's Word; . . . . " (Prayer Book, p. 527.)

The Anglo-Catholic clergy, however, do not "banish and drive away from the Church all erroneous and strange doctrines". On the contrary, they steadily use their best endeavors to introduce them into the Church, which fact is proved above. Through their efforts there are now over three hundred Episcopal parishes in which Roman Catholic masses are said in direct violation of the constitution of the Church. There are many more in which a close approach to the mass is made and into which other Roman usages are being introduced, as fast as the clergy are able and dare to act in the face of lay opposition.

In the secular world harsh epithets, perhaps not seemly here, are applied to men who make solemn pledges and deliberately break them, not once, but hundreds of times. Such vows are comparable to the ever famous treaty neutralizing Belgium, which the Chancellor of the German Empire declared to be a "scrap of paper".

CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM COMPARE NOTES: By H. F. Rall and S. S. Cohon. The Macmillan Company. Price $2.

Understanding is one of the leading qualities characterizing a happier world. The book, "Christianity and Judaism Compare Notes", has as its major purpose the furtherance of this understanding between two religious groups, the relations between which have not always been dominated by a spirit of tolerance. The motive of Professor Rall and Professor Cohon is distinctly commendable.

The task of presenting an adequate description of Christianity is a difficult one, for the numerous differences among the divisions tend to obscure the basic points. Professor Rall, who holds the chair of systematic theology at Garrett Biblical Institute, occupies the best of vantage points from which to see through the various expressions of the simple concepts of Christianity. This he does, not forgetting the significant characteristics of our religion in the specialized forms known to Christian laymen. Professor Rall is writing primarily to interpret Christianity to those who are not Christians as effectively as possible.

This interpretation of Christianity he undertakes in three steps: (1) A description of the Christian conviction, which includes our beliefs regarding the meaning of this world and the nature of our God; (2) A statement of the Christian way of living as determined by the Christian conviction regarding the world and God; (3) A description of the hope which is inspired by the Christian idea of our relation to the higher world. Using this classification of his material, Professor Rall tells first of the importance of doctrine and of creeds in the various forms of Christianity, in which are contained the Christian conviction regarding the world and God. Then he describes our relation to God, to our fellow men, to the world, and to ourselves, as constituting the Christian way of living, the expression in life of our convictions. Lastly he presents the principle of individual salvation, of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth, and of the life to come, as the elements of the Christian hope.

For a short presentation of the characteristics of Christianity, Professor Rall has done very well. He would have been more clear and accordingly more convincing, however, if he had made his minor theses stand out, to a greater extent than they did, from the attendant material which he introduced as evidence for his conclusions.

Professor Cohon used a more simple way to explain Judaism, and while he seemed to tell less than did Professor Rall, he accomplished his object of giving to his Christian reader a broad concept of Judaism.

A brief, historical background of direct relevance was given, introductory to a presentation of the place of faith and reason in Judaism. He emphasized the importance of the latter, of man's ability to apply his intelligence in the determination of truth. In this philosophical attitude, however, he states that there is some difference of opinion, as evidenced in the contention of a leader in Jewish thought, "all the books written by the philosophers 'should be burned in the public place in their presence'|".

The minor importance of dogma in Judaism was described, but the fact of separate sects and of various creeds was stated. The development of Reform Judaism during the past century is given considerable attention. Orthodox Judaism had remained unprogressive for so long that many of its adherents broke away. Reform Judaism "made it possible for the scientifically trained Jew to be intellectually honest in his Judaism". Isaac Disraeli, father of the statesman, is reported to have said, "Had these changes been introduced at an earlier period, neither I nor my family would have seceded from the Jewish community".

Professor Cohon's description of Judiasm is highly informatory and interesting. It is easily read in spite of the frequent reference to Hebraic words having meaning solely to his Jewish readers. Christians, to further their understanding of Judaism, would do well to read this brief exposition.

THE WORST TRAGEDY.

Mr. Editor:

Allow me to congratulate you upon the issue of The Southern Churchman of January 21. It is an excellent paper full of good things, especially the leading editorial, the article on the Virgin Birth and the letter by Josiah R. Ellis. What is written in those items is so everlastingly true that none of them can be successfully denied. The drift of all of our seminaries away from the evangelical doctrine is, to my mind, the worst tragedy occurring in our beloved Church.

ENGLISH PRAYER BOOK CONTROVERSY.

Mr. Editor:

The exigencies of the present English Prayer Book controversy would hardly seem to justify the statements attributed to the Bishop of North Texas, on January 15, at Abilene, as reported in your issue of February 18.

First, the Bishop is quoted as saying: "It seems to many Americans that the House of Commons, representing as it does the masses of the people who through taxation and otherwise are the real support of the Church of England (even though many of them are non-conformists), detected in some of the proposed changes in the Prayer Book a tendency to repudiate the Protestant position of the Church of England and bring back into use some of the distinctly Roman doctrines and ceremonies which had been explicitly repudiated at the time of the Reformation."

Now the Church of England is not, nor never has been supported "by taxation". For an American authority on this point permit me to refer to President Abbott Lawrence Lowell of Harvard University, in his work, "The Government of England", Vol. 2, pp. 367, 379, 377. For English authority, such men as Professor E. A. Freeman, Lord Selborne and William E. Gladstone, all Churchmen, and Dr. James Martineau, a Unitarian, unite in agreeing that, "the Church endowments, including tithes, arose . . . by voluntary gifts, . . . (and) so stand upon the same footing with the income of Dissenters' trusts". Says Dr. Martineau: "The popular nonconformist conception of the Church of England as a . . . State-endowed institution . . . mixes up historical error and illusory theory into one huge prejudice, in which all accurate distinction is lost."

Second, the Bishop is also quoted as saying that "the laity of the Church of England, represented in the House of Commons, objected to the proposed revision of the English Prayer Book", etc., etc.

It is well known, as reported in even the secular press, that the vast majority of Churchmen in the House of Commons voted for the proposed book, and it is today favored by the bulk of members of the Church of England, laity as well as clergy. One New York daily paper stated that had only Churchmen been permitted to vote, the House of Commons would have given a majority of thirty for the book. Furthermore, one of the ablest speeches in favor of the measure was made by a Labor member, Mr. Dunnico, a Baptist minister of twenty-five years' standing, who said he could find nothing in the new book subversive of the doctrines of the Church of England.

When these facts are so easily ascertained, why hold up Hindus and Free-thinkers in the House of Commons as saviours of the Church of England, and accuse as traitors to her doctrine and worship such men as the venerable Archbishop of Canterbury, who have given the best of their lives in her service and ministry?

COMPANION, GUIDE, FRIEND.

Mr. Editor:

I enclose check to pay for my subscription to your valued paper. I may be somewhat late in remitting at times, as at present, but please don't stop coming. I simply couldn't do without you, and I hope to have you for companion, guide and friend for the rest of my life. I am also enclosing the petition, signed, that formed the back of your issue of February 25. I am more happy than words can tell to see from a recent issue of the New York Times that there is to be an organized and a widespread effort to prevent the change and mutilation of our beloved Prayer Book.

TOO GOOD TO PASS BY.

Mr. Editor:

In passing the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, a great old church on the public highway, where the teeming masses go on their way back and forth, one reads on the large bulletin board a very suggestive and appealing invitation to enter the doors of this old sanctuary. It was too good to pass by and so I copied it and now it offers its loving welcome to strangers and others who pass my own church door. As there seems to be no copyright involved, I take the liberty of passing it on to other parsons who might be interested. I understand that the Rev. Dr. Morris, long of the Brazilian Missions, now associated with the Rev. Dr. Phillips, is the author. Here it is:

"To all who mourn and need comfort; to all who are weary and need rest; to all who are friendless and need friends; to all who are homeless and need sheltering love; to all who pray and to all who do not, but ought; to all who sin and need a Saviour, and to whomsoever will . . . This Church opens wide its doors and makes a place, and in the Name of Jesus Christ says:

"Welcome!"

"DON'T PLAY IT NO MORE."

Mr. Editor:

And this year, it appears on the mite-boxes!
I refer to that bit of verse which starts off:

"Christ has no hands but our hands to do His work today.
He has no feet but our feet to lead men in His way . . ."

Why on earth should this thing be used so much—and mostly on official publications? Everything can be said against it. There is nothing in its favor.

Are we not taught that Christ rose from the dead on the first Easter morn? Are we not told that the tomb was found empty? Where, then, was His Body?

Christ, Himself, gives the answer, when He says to doubting Thomas: "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing."

I suppose, speaking in defence of the verse, one would say, "It throws the responsibility on us humans. We are to do the work, today"!

Yes, but why? Certainly not, for a Christ who does not exist! For if that Christ "has no hands but our hands, etc." then He has no Resurrection Body. If He has no such Body, what assurance is there that we humans shall have? And "If Christ be not risen from the dead, then is our faith but vain, and we are the most miserable of men. Let us eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die".

Not only that, but what of Christ's plain statement, "My Father worketh, and I work"? How much more inspiring (if inspiration is what we are after) to feel that "We are fellow-workers with Him", not isolated employees of a Being who must, this Lent, appear to our Sunday-school children to be a helpless cripple!

There is a popular "comedy team" which goes by the name of "Two Black Crows". One of them plays "Annie Laurie" for the other. "Boy, that's good!" is the reply. But (as the musician starts up again) "Don't play it no more"!

So, please, dear National Council, with this poem. Let's not use it any more. It's blatant heresy.

KEEP THE ARTICLES.

Mr. Editor:

The Living Church has begun to purr over the Thirty-nine Articles, particularly the twenty-eighth, which is "repugnant" to transubstantiation, the pet of The Living Church and its astute editor, even Reservation. It purrs now! No objection theologically to this article. Why, no! Even Rome's best is against transubstantiation (how it licks its chops when it can lug in Rome, which, alas! since the Pope's last encyclical it must view at a distance or approach on its knees). No one then objects to its theology but its grammar! and rhetoric! how can one stand that?

So it must be rewritten so as to be rightly interpreted, but not yet. Now, its grammar is bad, its pedagogy is worse, and one sentence contains seventy-five words! Think of it! Difficult to parse, hence it must be rewritten. Then The Living Church and its noisy minority backed by the weak-kneed brethren, will get in its perfect work.

Just for enrichment they said about the changes in the Prayer Book. Read Dr. McCraedy's article and see what they gave us. With meticulous precision they have even changed words that apparently stood in the way of their onward march to Rome. And the same would happen here: let them get a chance at the Articles and they would either be omitted altogether or so changed as to be unrecognizable.

So they say, Let's rewrite it, not on account of its theology, but of its awkwardness of expression, bad grammar, etc. Then when the right to rewrite has been given the theology will at once be objectionable and The Living Church, with its noisy minority, will either throw this Article along with the others out of the Prayer Book, or change the trend Romeward, as has been the case in every change made in the Prayer Book.

Keep the Articles in the Prayer Book, where they rightfully belong!

Josiah R. Ellis.

"WISDOM."

Mr. Editor:

Allow me to express my warm appreciation of Mr. Alfred B. Williams' masterly article, "Wisdom", in your issue of twenty-eighth of January.

Simple-minded Christians know far too little of that hydra-headed monster—anti-Christian propaganda.

It is well-known that any popular lecturer gathers much more material on his subject than he actually gives in public. Why? Because he wants only those facts which will best support his thesis. Those which don't he scraps, or mentions only to dismiss or ridicule. Popular Science nowadays reeks with theories, bolstered up with a few hand-picked facts out of many times their number ignored as inconveniently destructive of the said theories.

The seed-bed of most anti-Christian theories was, and is, German. The Professors of this nation have built up a baseless reputation for immense research and massive learning—a bubble which sadly needs the needle, for it is the outcome of the Prussian drill-sergeant system. In German Universities it is briefly this.

A Professor, let us say of Botany, first maps out his subject into divisions such as—External plant structure, internal, nerve-system, life functions and processes, classification and so on. Next, he divides his class into an equal number of groups, and assigns to each, one of his subject-divisions for special study and research. Each member of a group reports regularly to the Professor on that section of his field sub-let to him. Now comes in the Professor, selecting the facts which square with his theories—and he would not be a German Professor if he had not theories already evolved out of his inner consciousness. He ignores facts inconvenient for the theories in whatever volume he puts forth.

In this way he kills three birds with one stone—achieves an outside name for immense research; credit for a sweeping yet minute mastery of a whole field; and an imposing array of facts to support his theories, while the far greater multitude of facts which are against them, like so many Cinderellas, are driven to the dust and ashes of oblivion.

And now I trust I may be allowed to make one comment on your article, "Victory in the Church of England", as I have not seen it noted elsewhere, viz.: the markedly non-democratic constitution of the English Church Assembly, to which Parliament delegated years ago many matters of internal development. The Church Assembly, then framed by the Bishops, designedly nullified as far as possible the due and effective voice of the congregations by the system of their representation adopted.

Thus, the decisions of the Church Assembly, even were

CHRISTCHURCH SCHOOL.

Building and Endowment Fund.

Headmaster of Christchurch School.

HE boys of Christchurch School in oldest Virginia (thirty miles north of Jamestown) form a distinct group, coming from homes of tradition and culture though ofttimes of slender resources. Some day you may look into their glowing faces and realize the full satisfaction of having been their benefactor in an hour of real stress.

Their School, alone in all Tidewater Virginia, and with but seven years of struggling history, of course, lacks the loyal alumni of established position and wealth who, for older schools and colleges, care so generally for expanding growth. Its cause for the present must be the care of others.

Five marks of the Schools are noteworthy:

1. It re-occupies the earliest field of Anglo-Saxon civilization in America.

2. It has in its Headmaster, the Rev. Dr. William Page Dame, a really great leader of boys.

3. It has set up high standards of Christian character and scholastic attainment in a rural simplicity of life.

4. It has overtaxed its present capacity to house sixty boys of select promise, with a long waiting list for next session.

And the fifth mark of the School, its very low cost ($600 covers all School charges), can be maintained in one way only, by doubling the present enrollment; and the necessary building program costing $120,000, is now ready for immediate execution.

Half the required sum is in sight, though conditioned largely on completion of the whole unified program in time for next session's use.

Work on construction should start within ten days. Sixty thousand dollars is still to be subscribed.

Dormitory units for five to twenty boys—$5,000 to $20,000.

Full accommodation for one boy—$1,000.

Furnishings per boy—$100.

Gifts may be made memorials. Subscriptions (for payment at convenience) may be sent to the Dean, the Mayo Memorial Church House, 110 West Franklin Street, Richmond, Virginia.

Checks may be made payable to Christchurch School Extension Fund.

Visualizing with keen sympathy the full emergency so briefly outlined, will you share with others in promptly meeting it?

Faithfully yours,

Edmund L. Woodward.

THE STRANGER AND HIS FRIEND.

A poor wayfaring man of grief
  Hath often crossed me on my way,
Who cried so humbly for relief
  That I could never answer "Nay".
I had not power to ask His name,
Whither He went, or whence He came;
Yet there was something in His eye
That won my love—I knew not why.
Once when my scanty meal was spread,
He entered. Not a word He spake.
Just perishing for want of bread,
  I gave Him all; He blessed it, brake,
And ate; but gave me part again,
Mine was an angel's portion then;
For while I fed with eager haste,
That crust was manna to my taste.

I spied Him where a fountain burst
  Clear from the rock; His strength was gone;
The heedless water mocked His thirst;
  He heard it, saw it hurrying on.
I ran to raise the sufferer up;
Thrice from the stream He drained my cup,
Dipped, and returned it running o'er—
I drank, and never thirsted more.

'Twas night; the floods were out—it blew
  A winter hurricane aloof;
I heard His voice abroad, and flew
  To bid Him welcome to my roof;
I warmed, I clothed, I cheered my guest—
Laid Him on my own couch to rest;
Then made the earth my bed, and seemed
In Eden's garden while I dreamed.

Stripped, wounded, beaten nigh to death,
  I found Him by the highway side;
I roused His pulse, brought back His breath,
  Revived His spirit and supplied
Wine, oil refreshment; He was healed.
I had, myself, a wound concealed—
But from that hour forgot the smart,
And peace bound up my broken heart.

In prison I saw Him next, condemned
  To meet a traitor's doom at morn;
The tide of lying tongues I stemmed,
  And honored Him midst shame and scorn.
My friendship's utmost zeal to try,
He asked if I for Him would die:
The flesh was weak, my blood ran chill,
But the free spirit cried, "I will".

Then in a moment, to my view,
  The stranger darted from disguise;
The tokens in His hands I knew—
  My Saviour stood before mine eyes.
He spake; and my poor name He named—

"Of Me thou hast not been ashamed;
These deeds shall thy memorial be;
Fear not; thou didst them unto me".
—James Montgomery.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

they unanimous, could not faithfully represent the vast body of believers. This is seen by the fact that opposition to the changes grew stronger as it left the House of Bishops, descending to the House of Clergy, and coming finally to the House of Laymen. But the emasculated laity expressed itself at last, in the far more democratic House of Commons, and not in the hereditary House of Lords.

ASTONISHED.

Mr. Editor:

It's a long ways since our University days together and our paths have rarely met. I read The Southern Churchman regularly, and I am much edified by your stand for "the good ole time religion". Doctrinal matters do not interest me much, but I am astonished at the insolence of the so-called intellectuals who offer a crumb of speculation here and another there, and ask me to accept it in lieu of the great revelation of the scheme of things as contained in the Bible. If theology is a science, and if science is organized knowledge, then the sporadic attempt to answer with a theory the question, "How can these things be"? does not appeal even to my mind, much less my heart and soul.

I don't know whether you care to use the enclosed or not—that's up to you. I count quite a number of clergymen in my family and I believe that they would endorse what I say. They certainly by their lives intimated that I believe as they did.

W. H. Randolph.

A FRIEND.

Mr. Editor:

I have been a subscriber for years. When the Rev. Meade Clarke was Editor he gave the Church Periodical Club reduced rates, and it has been under my care ever since. The club numbers twenty subscribers; I notify each one when it is time to renew and collect, so The Southern Churchman has no trouble whatever; don't you think that shows interest? My sister subscribes and as that comes to my home, my copy goes to my sister-in-law, in Madison, Conn.; therefore, my name does not appear on the list of subscribers. The paper is excellent and I would not be without it. I think there should be more news from the Diocese of Virginia. Subscribers outside the diocese want it and I have missed Virginia News when away from home. Sometimes there is no news at all, as in a recent number. Pardon this comment, as it's the only suggestion that could be made for improvement.

"ALMOST NIL"?

Mr. Editor:

Dr. Morehouse says in today's (March 17) Churchman that "everybody knows that they (the Thirty-nine Articles) are misleading, . . . and that their teaching value today is almost nil". (Black mine.)

"Everybody!" I do not know it, and many thousands of the Protestant Episcopal Church do not know it. I think of the Vicar of Cheltenham's lately saying that "nobody believes Genesis 11:23", which millions believe as well as I.

"Almost nil!" That is what the Anglo-Catholic would fain make the Articles, or entirely "nil", especially those which protest against Roman error.

Rome stands firmly by the Council of Trent; let us imitate her firmness, standing by the Articles in the Prayer Book, not "side-tracked", as my old comrade of the Rockbridge Battery wittily put it (Dr. Kinloch Nelson) long ago, in General Convention, even though Mr. Morehouse kindly offers to publish them apart for any who want them.

But such publication, I think, will never be needed: for the great body of the laity, at least (as in English) are still firm against Roman error.

CRYING OUT FOR A VOICE.

Mr. Editor:

I cannot tell you what the comfort is that the stand of The Southern Churchman is giving me. As the daughter of a South Carolina Evangelical clergyman, now dead for many years, I have been crying out for a voice from his Church. It is speaking to me through The Southern Churchman. The sermons are my special help. Thank you for that one, "The Supper of the Lord and The Real Presence", which you published January 28, 1928.

RESOLUTION.

Saint Mark's Rectory, Lake City, Minn.

Whereas, At the session of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, held at New Orleans, La., in October, 1925, a resolution was tentatively passed providing for the abrogation of the Articles of Religion, and which resolution will be finally acted upon at the session of the General Convention of the Church, to be held at Washington, D. C., in October, 1928, be it

Resolved, By the Vestry of St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal Church, at Lake City, Minn., in meeting assembled on this twenty-seventh day of February, 1928:

(1) That the Vestry of said Church is opposed to the abrogation of the Articles of Religion and to any action on the part of the General Convention which would in any manner alter the status of said Articles of Religion as now fixed and provided by Article X of the Constitution of the Church.

(2) That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of the General Convention and be generally published in Church periodicals.

This is to certify that the above is a true and exact copy of the resolution passed on twenty-seventh day of February, 1928, at a regular meeting of the Vestry of St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal Church of Lake City, Minn.

Resignation of Bishop Kinsolving of Brazil.

The Presiding Bishop has received the resignation of the Rt. Rev. Lucien Lee Kinsolving, S. T. D., Missionary Bishop of Southern Brazil, to be effective as of last January 6, the twenty-ninth anniversary of his consecration. The resignation will come before the House of Bishops at General Convention in October and a successor will presumably be elected at that time. The Presiding Bishop has appointed the suffragan, Bishop Thomas, as bishop in charge of the district, pending action by the House of Bishops. Ill health has necessitated the resignation. Bishop Kinsolving has been in the United States during the past year and is not able to return to the field he has served for nearly forty years (he went there in 1889) and to the work which is in so large measure his own unique creation.

Bishop Kinsolving was one of the "Bishops consecrated in America for foreign Churches". The Brazilian Episcopal Church elected him as its bishop in 1898 and sent him to the United States for his consecration. The House of Bishops then also elected him. In 1907 the Brazilian Church became a missionary district of the American Church; Bishop Kinsolving was duly elected first missionary bishop, and thus has the distinction of being three times elected bishop of the same field. He and the Rev. Dr. James W. Morris started the work which now has an additional bishop, the Rt. Rev. W. M. M. Thomas, D. D., elected suffragan in 1925, six foreign clergy, seventeen Brazilian priests, six Brazilian deacons, nine candidates for Holy Orders, sixteen lay-readers other than candidates, an average of two hundred and ninety-five confirmations a year, and more than three thousand communicants.

Bishop Kinsolving's firm belief that self-support should keep pace with the growth of the work, the training of Brazilian clergy in the Porto Alegre Theological School, and of boys in the Southern Cross School, the faithful struggling with poor equipment and the healthy growth of many congregations, the rapidly developing work among Japanese, and the opportunities opening out before the work, have all been told many times. Possibly the most easily available account of the early years and the development of the Southern Brazil district is in No. VI of the Handbooks on the Missions of the Episcopal Church, 927. (Bookstore, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, 40 cents.)

Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook.

It gives us much pleasure to announce that Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook of Washington, D. C., has accepted the position of Field Worker recently tendered him by the National Commission on Evangelism.

Dr. Glazebrook is the son of the Rev. Dr. Otis A. Glazebrook, who for many years was rector of St. John's Church, Elizabeth, N. J., and who is now serving as U. S. Consul at Nice.

Dr. Glazebrook is one of the most prominent physicians of Washington, and has for many years held the position of Chief Surgeon of the Washington Street Railway Company.

Owing to his deep interest in Evangelism, and especially Lay Evangelism, he has given much of his spare time to such work for many years, and when the National Commission was seeking laymen to serve in the Bishops' Crusade, Dr. Glazebrook was naturally one of the first men selected and was assigned as the Lay Crusader to the Diocese of Virginia, where he made a profound impression on those who heard him. Since the close of the Crusade, he has given much time to the follow-up work of the movement in his own and other dioceses and has been instrumental in interesting many other laymen in the cause of Lay Evangelism.

Dr. Glazebrook possesses a most pleasing personality and is a speaker of unusual ability and, while he has been in the full-time work of the Commission but a few weeks, has already shown his eminent fitness for the important work assigned to him.

His engagements are being arranged by Bishop Darst, Chairman of the National Commission on Evangelism, 506 Southern Building, Wilmington, N. C., and it is hoped that this talented, gifted layman, who has at such a financial sacrifice, devoted his life to the cause of Lay Evangelism, may be widely used throughout the Church.

National Commission on Evangelism,

Chairman.

The Coming General Convention.

The triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, to convene in the City of Washington, October 10, will continue in session until the twenty-seventh. For several reasons, it is expected to be outstanding and historic. It will be the first convention to sit in the great National Cathedral of the Church and the second to be held in the Diocese of Washington since the creation of that diocese, in 1895, the previous convention held there having been in 1898.

Story of the Diocese of Washington.

In connection with the meeting of the General Convention of the Church, to convene at the City of Washington in October, the Washington Star publishes the story of the creation of the Diocese of Washington, in 1895. The diocese includes the District of Columbia and the counties of Charles and St. Mary's, in Maryland. It was created by the efforts and at the suggestion of Bishop Paret, who found the Diocese of Maryland, then including Washington and the District, too large for one bishop, yearly visitations to each of the churches and parishes keeping him away from home three-fourths of each year. An apparently insurmountable obstacle was the lack of funds to provide for two bishops and diocesan organizations, but this was overcome at the very moment when prospects seemed hopeless by receipt of a legacy of Eversfield F. Keerl, which amounted to about $100,000, was bequeathed unconditionally to the Diocese of Maryland and supplied precisely the sum needed, the Maryland diocese agreeing promptly and generously, to share the benefaction with the new diocese.

The Diocese of Maryland included, in 1895, a total of one hundred and sixty-two clergymen, one hundred and forty organized parishes and 29,918 communicants. The two dioceses, including the same territory formerly occupied by the one, have two hundred and thirty-one clergymen, two hundred and thirty-six parishes, 55,341 communicants, the increase being sixty-nine clergymen, ninety-six parishes and 25,431 communicants.

The two Maryland counties attached to the new diocese were left with it, because they had been long part of the Convocation of Washington.

Great Gifts From Women of the Church.

The Washington, D. C., Star publishes the following:

Women of the Episcopal Church are preparing to make two large monetary offerings at the opening service of the General Convention at Washington Cathedral on October 10.

The United Thank Offering, which it is anticipated will reach $1,000,000 and represents a three-year collection, in addition to other offerings, will be used for extra missionary work of the church. A corporate gift of $100,000 will be presented at the same time and will go for the support of these six mission fields: St. Agnes School, Kyoto, Japan; St. Timothy's Hospital, Cape Mount, Liberia; Holy Trinity Cathedral, Port-au-Prince, Haiti; Church of the Resurrection, Baguio, Philippine Islands; St. Mark's Mission, Nenana, Alaska, and the Church of the Nazarene, Livramento, Brazil. Both these offerings are from women all over the world and denote a triennial effort.

With this auspicious start, the women of the Church will be represented during the General Convention by the triennial session of the Woman's Auxiliary. There will be mission exhibits and each society will give demonstrations of its work. Among these will be the Girls' Friendly Society, the Daughters of the King, the Church Periodical Club, as well as a number of lesser guilds, societies and leagues of the church.

The Church Periodical Club will present its work in dramatic form and Washington parishes are rehearsing scenes depicting various phases of their activities. While this preparation is going forward in the Capital various meetings are being held in different parts of the globe to further the offerings of the women of the Church. At the last General Convention, held at New Orleans in 1925, the women honored the Most Rev. Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, formerly Presiding Bishop of the Church, by applying the $100,000 gift for a furlough house in New York and for training girls for Church work and for a colored school at Raleigh, N. C.

American Church Institute for Negroes.

The great meeting held in Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 12, for the American Church Institute for Negroes, was such an enthusiastic demonstration of good will between the white and colored races that its influence should go a long away. On the stage with Bishop Manning, who presided, were Bishop Murray, Bishop Lloyd, Bishop Shipman, Dr. Patton, Mr. Battle, Field Secretary for the Institute, three principals of schools, the Rev. Mr. Gould, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Blanton, and the Rev. Alvin Russell, vice-principal of St. Paul's, a few guests, the Institute sextet, and one hundred and twenty men, women and boys, vested, from Negro choirs.

After Bishop Shipman's invocation, Bishop Manning asked his people to undertake a definite piece of Advance Work in contributing toward the sum needed in the Advance Work Program, for the Institute schools. Perhaps his most striking remark was that the first two baptisms he ever had were for two colored babies, the first class he confirmed were colored people, the first church he consecrated and the first parish house he dedicated were each for colored congregations, and the first bishop at whose consecration he assisted was a colored bishop. This, together with the fact that New York Diocese is said to have more colored people connected with the Episcopal Church than any other diocese, North or South, "is really a colored diocese", qualified him, he thought to preside over that meeting!

Bishop Murray spoke next, and could not have made a more delightful speech, commenting on the tremendous achievements of Bishop Manning's seven years as bishop, and commending the great value of the Church's work for Negroes.

Mr. Wallace Battle won everybody's admiration and applause by his picturesque speech. He reported the recent gift made by a colored woman of the Diocese of New York, who withholds her name. She is a domestic servant and came to the office of the Institute to give more than half of her life-long savings, a gift of ten thousand dollars!

Dr. Patton was thoroughly himself, which is always enough to say to those who know him, and for those unfortunates who do not, no description is quite adequate. Some reasons he gave for his long continued interest in the Negroes are that with them education has never become separated from religion, they have not been affected by modern repudiation of religion, their sense of humor is quick and keen, and they are very able to adapt themselves to changing conditions for their own good.

The motion picture showing the activities of the schools made vivid to the audience the work that is carried on for some seven thousand young Negro men and girls every year. (The winter enrollment is over 3,000, and the summer schools have still more.)

No part of the long program was more beautiful than the presentation, by Mr. Hunt, of Fort Valley, of a big Bible, given to Bishop Manning for the Cathedral by the students and teachers of the Institute schools. None of the gifts for it had been more than fifty cents, and many of them were in pennies.

One reason the meeting was rather long was because the audience could not hear enough of the singing of spirituals by the Institute sextet.

Bishop Lloyd closed the meeting with a benediction.

Reports Religion Scarce in College.

The following is a summary of President Wilkins' speech delivered at a three-day conference at Princeton University as reported by the New York Times:

The typical college undergraduates—eight hundred out of every group of one thousand—has too much to do, both of work and amusement, to consider religion other than something that "isn't done" in college. He spends a good part of his waking hours in study.

He spends many more in athletics, dramatics, working for publications, or in fraternity affairs. He goes every week to a dance, a game and a movie. He spends hours in talking, about everything from fraternities to college politics, college scandals, jobs and women.

Such was the picture of four-fifths of the usual undergraduate body presented here tonight by President Ernest H. Wilkins, of Oberlin College, who made the first speech of a symposium on the state of religion among college men. He spoke in Proctor Hall, following an address of welcome extended to two hundred university college Presidents, professors and headmasters by John Grier Hibben, President of Princeton University. The two hundred educators held a three-day conference.

Dr. Wilkins called his statement "a purely objective survey, without criticism and without recommendation".

"In a typical modern college body of one thousand men," he said, "about one hundred might fairly be said to be religiously minded; rather more than eight hundred would not ordinarily be much concerned about religion—their attitudes varying from subliminal acquiescence to subliminal distrust; and a residuum would consider themselves to have dispensed with religion."

Dr. Wilkins put the attitude of the average student this way:

"Religion is all right—it used to mean a good deal—there's something in it, all right—but it simply isn't done in college. Chapel is a bore. I don't think much of the Y. M. C. A. bunch. And science has proved that a lot of it is all wrong, anyhow. Did you hear what the Sociology Professor said?"

Beneath this attitude, however, Dr. Wilkins professed to see "an undercurrent of unselfish desire to do things that are worth while". He said he had "increased confidence in their native idealism".

Refraining from attempting a "composite picture" of the two hundred religiously minded in his typical group, Dr. Wilkins turned to those who had "dispensed with religion".

"For the most part," he said, "they are of one or the other of two types: those who prefer the way of physical and mental vice, and those who throw over religion as a matter of mental excitement, or, as they think, of mental honesty."

President Wilkins said college youth was facing religious questions with a frankness born of the new logic, and of the general slackening of authoritarianism. He said that students considered "poverty, oppression, graft, crime, war", and then were liable to ask, "Isn't Christianity a failure"?

Speaking of chapel, Dr. Wilkins said:

"If it is compulsory it creates an underlying sense that there is something not quite right about a thing that has to be artificially maintained. Yet this sense is readily overcome whenever the speaker is ready to talk squarely of the very problems of which I have been speaking."

Martyn L. Keeler, a senior at Yale, saw the key to the trouble with religion in the colleges in "the administrative attitude".

"We are all interested in sincerity," he said, "and we can scarcely be expected to believe in a chapel service promoted and conducted by a Faculty which we know in the class room as irreverent or even blasphemous."

He asked that college chapel "tackle modern problems". He said "smart instructions" often put too many new ideas more or less indiscriminately into "minds that are often too wide open".

Bible Conference in Richmond.

A Bible Conference under the auspices of the Church Witness to the Life of Faith, was held in All Saints' Church, Richmond, Va., March 11-18. Services were held at 5 P. M. and 8 P. M., with two speakers at night. Addresses were made by the Rev. Earle Lier, the Rev. Kenneth Mackenzie, Mr. James H. McConkey, the Rev. J. J. D. Hall, the Rev. Canon Osborne Troop and the Rev. Canon F. E. Howitt. The latter two speakers were present for the whole week and their ministry in Richmond has permanently enriched many and left abiding spiritual impressions. It is doubtful if Richmond has ever had a series of services with such a wealth of evangelical teaching. It was easy to take knowledge of the conference speakers that they had been with Jesus. Apart from the marvelous grasp of Scripture and ability clearly and forcefully to impart the pure doctrines of the Christian Faith, the power of the messages was felt in that like Chaucer's good man of religion, it was true of each speaker "first he wrought and afterward he taught". Ministers and prominent laymen of other churches came to the services and along with all who attended went away grateful for the blessing received.

Aside from the stated services parlor meetings were held for Bible study, and eternity alone will reveal the good that was done.

The old Gospel in its simplicity and power and glory was unfolded and illumined to the satisfying of many hungry hearts. There is a crying need for just such teaching and it is hoped that similar gatherings will be held in other cities.

International Interdenominational.

The International Interdenominational Day of Prayer for Missions was observed in Alexandria, Va., on Friday, February 24. The meeting was held at the George Mason Hotel at 10:30 A. M., and at Anne Lee Home for the Aged at 3 P. M. These meetings were sponsored by the Missionary Federation of Alexandria and vicinity, and this year were lead by the women of the Baptist church. There was a capacity gathering in the large banquet room of the hotel. Mrs. Sowers, wife of the Rev. John S. Sowers, of Del Ray Baptist Church, led the Morning Service in the most beautiful and impressive manner. There were over two hundred present, some from distant churches. The organizations taking part were as follows. First Baptist, Temple Baptist, Del Ray Baptist, Del Ray Methodist, Free Methodist M. E. Church, South, Presbyterian, Methodist Protestant, Immanuel Lutheran, and Episcopal churches: Christ, Immanuel, Braddock, Grace, St. Paul's, Olivet Chapel, Pohick and Theological Seminary. The offering of $17.17 will be divided between home and foreign mission boards. The afternoon service, held at Anne Lee Home, was led by Mrs. Norman Williamson, First Baptist, and was well attended by representatives of many churches, and gave great pleasure and comfort to the shut-ins at the Home. These services have become an annual event and each year are sponsored by the missionary leaders of one of the Protestant churches. Next year the Presbyterian church will lead. The Missionary Federation of Alexandria has three purposes for its being. First, to arrange annually for the Day of Prayer for Missions. Second, to arrange for Prayer Service at Anne Lee Home for the Aged on each Friday in the year. Third, to bring about good fellowship and cooperation among the followers of our Lord, that His Kingdom may come and His will be done on earth as it may please Him, and that He, working through us, may bring it about more speedily. The officers of the Federation are: Mrs. William M. Rearden, President, M. E. Church, South; Mrs. Louis Evans, Vice-President, First Baptist; Mrs. J. C. Winterwerp, Intercessor, Grace Episcopal, and Mrs. George T. Klipstein, Secretary, St. Paul's Episcopal; Mrs. Earnest Delaney, Assistant Secretary, Presbyterian Church. The work is growing in interest. Last year there were fourteen churches which cooperated in the work, and this year there were sixteen.

Rev. V. J. Steffan Visits State Penitentiary.

The Rev. V. J. Steffan, Presbyterian minister, and visiting evangelist of the V. J. Steffan Prison Association, was in Richmond Sunday, March 18, and delivered a stirring address to the convicts at the State Penitentiary. At the close of his talk, Mr. Steffan called on the men, who from that time on were going to try and lead a new life following Jesus Christ, to rise to their feet. About fifty out of the five hundred white and colored men in the assemblage, responded.

Again he called to their feet those who were already trying to follow Jesus Christ, and another fifty rose.

Mr. Steffan is peculiarly fitted for this great work of going from city to city trying to reclaim the lost in the penitentiaries, for he himself is an exconvict, and thus can meet the men on their own ground.

Mr. Steffan is supported by a faith organization, known as the V. J. Steffan Prison Association, Incorporated, with an office at 804 Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

Church School Lenten Plans.

It has been the custom in the diocese for the Church Schools to compete in their Lenten offerings, banners being offered to the school having the largest per capita offering, the largest increase, etc. This year no banners will be offered at all and the only competition will be against previous records. Last Lent the Church Schools reported at the Presentation Service after Easter the sum of $19,899.91. This year the goal has been set at $22,000 by Bishop Murray.

Another change in the plan is a definite objective for the offerings. Half will go for the Arapahoes in St. Michael's Mission of the Wind River Reservation, Wyoming; the other half for kindergarten work in Japan.

On the Sunday preceding Lent a great Pageant of Inspiration was presented in the Lyric Theatre, in which at least 200 participated—clergy, teachers, doctors, nurses and children. The Pageant presented the eight fields, where the Church carries her mission: China, Japan, Liberia, Latin-America, Indians, Alaskans (Eskimos), Mountaineers and Immigrants, while one group represented the workers in all these fields. Some 1,600 people viewed the Pageant.

The presentation was under the direction of the Rev. Roger A. Walke. An address was delivered by a Japanese clergyman, the Rev. Takaharu Takamatsu, D. D.

Portrait of Rector Presented Emmanuel.

A portrait of the Rev. Hugh Birckhead, D. D., rector of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, has recently been completed by Mr. Thomas Corner. The plan was instigated and carried through by a committee of the congregation under the chairmanship of Mr. Daniel R. Randall. The portrait was presented to the rector at a special reception held in the Great Hall of the Parish House on Monday, March 12. The rector then presented the portrait to the parish. The portraits of two former rectors, Dr. Eccleston and Bishop Randolph, have also been presented and all will hang in the Great Hall.

Meeting of the Younger Women of the Auxiliary.

A meeting of the younger women of the Diocese of Atlanta who are interested in the work of the Auxiliary was held Saturday and Sunday, March 10 and 11, at St. Philip's Cathedral, Atlanta.

In spite of the rain, ninety-six young women attended this meeting which started with a dinner served by the Cathedral Branch of the Auxiliary.

Mrs. T. H. Johnston, wife of the Dean, welcomed the girls to the Cathedral.

Mrs. Henry Davis, Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary, spoke to the girls.

Miss Enid Kelly, President of the Cathedral Auxiliary, extended our greetings to the guests.

Mrs. John Talmadge, Jr., U. T. O. Custodian of the Diocese, spoke of the work of her group at Athens and of the vast accomplishments since they had added the work of the Auxiliary to their Guild plans.

Mrs. D. D. Taber, U. T. O. Field Worker, then verbally carried the girls to 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, introducing them to the various departments of the Mission House. She told also of her visit to Fort Defiance, Ariz., of Miss Katty and her work, and of the joy brought by groups who follow the specifications of the Supply Box Chairman.

She told of the work which the United Thank Offering made possible, and then turned the meeting into a conference by asking the girls questions concerning the work of the Auxiliary by each department. She was so intensely interesting that the girls were reluctant to leave.

The meeting closed with Corporate Communion Sunday morning at 8 A. M., Dean T. H. Johnston, celebrant.

Mrs. Allan V. Gray was appointed by Mrs. Davis to be in complete charge of all arrangements.

Children's Chapel.

Plans for a chapel for children on the main floor of Washington Cathedral were made public March 17, with the announcement by Arthur W. Thompson, member of the executive committee for the Cathedral, that Roland L. Taylor, of Philadelphia, had contributed $50,000 for its construction.

The new chapel will be known as the Children's Chapel and will be located close to the heart of the Cathedral fabric in the salient which marks the intersection of the choir and south transept. It will be used for special services for children, religious exercises of the pupils of the Cathedral schools, classes in Bible study, and instruction of confirmation classes, it was said.

Although it is customary in many Cathedrals to designate certain parts of the fabric as children's corners or children's arches, only one other Cathedral is known to have set apart an entire chapel for the use of children, the Washington Cathedral authorities declared in connection with the announcement.

The chapel has been conceived as a distinct unit and will have an architectural character especially appropriate to its meaning and purposes. Its architectural style will be of a slightly later type of the fourteenth century English gothic than other portions of the edifice at the same level. This is expected to provide a pleasing contrast with the choir and transept aisles from which the chapel will be entered.

According to present plans, provision will be made in furnishing the chapel for small chairs, a small pipe organ and for a table for the display of children's books and pictures, as well as an altar, clergy chairs, lectern, communion rail and credence table. The chapel is an integral part of the next step in the Cathedral building program which provides for the completion of the choir and crossing, and the construction of the north and south transepts. The raising of adequate funds for this work is the immediate objective of the present campaign in behalf of the great church structure.

Colonel Gordon Makes Bequest to Boys' Home.

Announcement was made in Richmond on January 28 that Colonel John W. Gordon, prominent fire insurance man and Confederate veteran, who died suddenly at his home in that city the early part of January, left an estate of $335,875.

The will, which was probated on January 27, provides for a bequest of $6,000 to the Theological Seminary in Virginia at Alexandria for the establishment of a scholarship in memory of Colonel Gordon's only son, John W. Gordon, Jr., who was drowned twenty years ago near Richmond.

Colonel Gordon also left $25,000 to the Home for Boys at Covington. Part of this amount is to go toward the maintenance of the Jack Gordon Cottage already established there.

The Confederate Memorial Literary Society and the Confederate Memorial Institute were left $2,500 each. A similar amount was bequeathed to the Blue Ridge Industrial School at Dyke in the Diocese of Virginia.

At the semi-annual meeting of the trustees of the Boys' Home, Inc., Covington, Va., held in St. Paul's Parish House, Richmond, on January 23, the following minute was adopted:

"It is keenly realized by the members of the Board that Colonel John W. Gordon, who as a faithful Christian soldier fought a good fight, finished his course, kept the faith, has passed to the higher field of service. His life had steadily grown in strength, depth and expanding interest and service, until, ever ascending, he, like his Lord, passed out of sight into the heavens.

"He will be greatly missed by the Boys' Home, its trustees, its officers, its boys. His abiding friendship and his ever generous support have been a valued and blessed asset. The house which he has given as a home for the little boys in sacred memory of his son will be, through the passing years, a token of his unfailing interest. His works do follow him; therefore, be it "Resolved, That the Board of Trustees of the Boys' Home, Inc., place on record its profound appreciation of the highly valued service that Colonel John W. Gordon has rendered this institution and her boys.

"That, we, its members, rejoice with his family in his noble life and splendid Christian service, and render gratitude to God for the blessing of it.

"That we express to the members of his family our heartfelt sympathy in their bereavement and commend them to our Heavenly Father's divine consolation."—The Southwestern Episcopalian.

Bishop Darst and Mr. Glenn Visit Church at University.

Bishop Cheshire, Bishop Darst and the Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, visited the Chapel of the Cross at the University of North Carolina between February 24 and 29. Bishop Cheshire was called home unexpectedly Saturday evening.

The parish vestry met the visitors at the rectory Saturday evening. Sunday morning Bishop Darst preached to a crowded congregation. Mr. Glenn preached at the evening service and afterwards led a conference on the ministry for twenty-two interested men who gathered in the parish house.

Monday morning Bishop Darst spoke to the students in the college chapel on "The Vocation of the Ministry". Later on in the day, the Bishop visited the new Duke University site in Durham. At night an informal reception was held in the parish house. The Bishop left Tuesday morning. Mr. Glenn stayed until Wednesday, interviewing students, and at night meeting with the student vestry.

Both the parish and the University were deeply impressed by Bishop Darst and Mr. Glenn, and look forward to the time when they can return.

Preaching Mission.

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, D. D., of Richmond, Va., conducted a most successful preaching mission in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, the week of March 11-17. Services were held morning and evening at the Good Shepherd, and a mid-day service at the Snyder Memorial Methodist Church down-town. Dr. Montague drew large congregations, and the mission was most profitable to the parish and community.

Instead of a brick building as at first contemplated, the Church of the Good Shepherd will build with stone, matching its present parish-house. When the Church building is finished the chapel of the parish house, which has been used for the regular services, will be available as an auditorium, and seating about eight hundred will give this parish one of the best auditoriums the riverside section of Jacksonville for plays, lectures, etc. Working out the plans of the new church building has taken considerable time, but the congregation feel that they are now going to have one of the handsomest houses of worship in the South.

Church School Institute—South Bend District.

Dramatization of principles contained in "The Pupil" by Weigle, formed the program for the sixth and final monthly meeting of the Church School Institute of the South Bend District, held at St. John's, Elkhart, Sunday, March 11.

As a help in assembling the conclusions of the course, charts for each period of child life had been made showing characteristics, activities, and religion. After a discussion of these charts, Elkhart children presented "The Christian Seasons", an attractive little pageant.

During the evening session, Elkhart teachers staged an unruly class followed by an exhibition of the same class after the teacher had informed herself on principles of teaching and pupil psychology by Weigle.

Mishawaka pupils dramatized the characteristics of a child who had been governed by autocratic parents.

South Bend young people gave a one-act play, "The Vacillating Parent", in which a weak-willed parent was helped by a Sunday-school teacher, who gave her "The Pupil" to study. In each of these three dramatizations, helpful teaching points were brought out.

Election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows: Mrs. D. J. Weimer, South Bend, President; Mr. Glenn Sawyer, Elkhart, Vice-President; Mrs. D. J. Campbell, Mishawaka, Secretary, and Miss Wilson, Elkhart, Treasurer.

The Lenten Season, certainly in the See City, in respect to church attendance and fellowship in Christian activities, has been more than usually in evidence, and the harvest, in a deepened consciousness of spiritual values, should be correspondingly enriched. The noon-day services have drawn large congregations representing all bodies of Christians, and the addresses have been as interesting in substance as varied in topics. Led by Bishop Woodcock on the two opening days, the successive speakers following have been: the Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, of Texas; the Rt. Rev. I. P. Johnson, of Colorado; the Rev. S. S. Marquis, of Michigan; the Rt. Rev. C. P. Anderson, of Chicago, and the Rt. Rev. F. F. Johnson, of Missouri.

The Woman's Auxiliary has held its usual united meetings each Friday afternoon, well sustained in interest and attendance, with encouraging reports from all branches busied with missionary allotments, and in the attainment of financial returns, as pledged. As for many years, the meetings have been followed by a united parish service, at which the respective noon-day speaker has been the preacher.

Two Valuable Parochial Missions have been conducted under widely known leaders: at St. Thomas', the Rev. W. E.

Collect for Fifth Sunday in Lent.

We beseech Thee, Almighty God, mercifully to look upon Thy people; that by Thy great goodness they may be governed and preserved evermore, both in body and soul, through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Collect for Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

The Lenten Truth.

Sweet is the story of the manger cradle,
And of the empty tomb:
The Christmas gladness and the joy of Easter
Dispell life's deepest gloom.

But precious, also, is the Gospel record
Of a mysterious strife,
Where subtle and satanic strength beleaguered,
That one unsullied Life.

Those many days when He, our Saviour, tarried
There in the wilderness;
We bring our fears, our struggles, our temptations,
And leave them there with His.

He suffered, being tempted, and we also
Gain strength to battle out;
Out of His pain and faintness, what strange comfort
And peace for us are born!

The sympathy of Christ in our temptations—
This is the Lenten truth;
Let not the Lenten sadness overshadow
Its dear and joyous ruth!

For ever and forever, where are struggle,
And faith, and outstretched hands,
There, pitiful, triumphant, living, loving,
The tempted Jesus stands.

Ah, that this comfort of our Lord's own presence,
Before, beside, within,
Might make us stronger, swifter, purer, surer
Of conquest over sin!

Mandy Judson Clementine Threat Wade.

S. W.

Mandy Judson Clementine Threat Wade—that is her name as she taught it to us in the nursery. We called her then, as now, "Aunt Clem", and called her pretty often. She affirms that she has always lived and associated with "white folks" and that she has been a part of our family ever since as a slave pickaniny she sat in a high chair and swayed a fly fan over the dining room table. She and my father "was chillun together" and he is now in his seventy-sixth year. Until two years ago she lived on the old plantation, having served our family in every capacity from that of mammy and cook to the chief entertainer of our guests. Indeed, one attraction to which many of our friends looked forward in visiting us was the unique conversation of Aunt Clem.

Home has never been quite the same to me since she moved too far away to be present at our reunion. The Christmas vacation there is not so full of laughter and cheer as it used to be and I truly feel that our home circle is incomplete. She was very loath to leave the old place, but the "chillun" who were "doing well" in Wes' Virginia kep' beggin' her to come to them, and Uncle Jack, her husband, was too feeble to make a crop any more. So she consented to go, facing the situation hopefully, as her habit is, with the determination to make the best of it.

In spite of her lengthy name, the bearer is very short of stature, though she really isn't so small around, and the short and familiar Clem seems a more fitting appellation. She always looks like a bag with a string tied in the middle, partly because even in midsummer she always wears the heaviest kind of woolen clothes. These, she insists, once saved her life when she was attacked by a mad dog and, furthermore, she would die of pneumonia or the "lacabugasis" if she discarded any of them. Now her children attire her outwardly in silk and all sorts of finery (she always had a weakness for silk), but underneath are her heavy woolen garments, as of old, and underneath, too, is the same true heart of gold.

I can't quite forget a bitter pang of jealousy that lingers with me from the days of childhood. She always claimed my older sister as her child, though she was too generous not to take me somewhat into her heart after my black mammy died. Then she would exclaim: "Dey's both my chillun. I jes' lets Miss Sue keep 'em here 'cause she kin better feed an' clothe an' ejucate 'em then I kin."

She had had sufficient experience with children to understand their ailments, for she had brought up thirteen of her own, had raised four grandchildren, and has since assumed responsibility for several of the fourth generation. In her attempts to name them all after her "white folks" she almost exhausted all the names in the family connection. A veritable Mrs. Wiggs! I don't know whether she kept adding water to the soup, but there was always room in her cabin and in her heart for one more child, and, strange to say, the food and clothes always went around.

Perhaps it was her universal love for children that always made us feel it a great privilege to go to Aunt Clem's house. She always gave us something to eat and if any of her flowers were in bloom—she loved flowers—we went home laden with bouquets. It seems to me that her spirit must always hover about that cabin and in the purple lilacs and the old-fashioned roses that still bloom about the doorway.

Once when some relatives were visiting in my home she invited us all to her house to supper. The table was set under a big oak tree in the front yard and was laden with all the good things she could possibly get together. There were great dishes of brown fried chicken, hot biscuits that came from the oven every few minutes, at least three kinds of preserves, two kinds of cake, and as the climax of the menu ice cream made wholly from pure cream which she must have been saving for a week!

She is generous to a fault, if such a thing be possible. Once when she was reproved for sending canned fruit to a city friend she said, "Umph! I'd 'vide my las' crus' o' br'ad wid Mars Callie"! And she would.

Well do I remember the jars of boiled custard she sent me when I had mumps. To my father she often sent hot ash cakes, while for mother she made sweet potato pudding, and for sister there was delicious cherry pie. She still remembers us with gifts at Christmas time, and when my sister was married she sent her two wedding presents, collect. A few weeks ago she sent my father by express six tremendous apples in a heavy wooden box. What if the charges did make them cost a small fortune? Their value couldn't be estimated in money.

As for money, she never has any. She always leaves on the kitchen table or the dairy shelf whatever money happens to come into her possession, and that which she does not lose, she promptly gives away.

She is not in the slightest degree anxious about those material things for which most of us are constantly striving. She believes in a literal interpretation of "Why take ye thought for tomorrow? Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof".

Her philosophy of life is noteworthy. Once when she had been away from home for several weeks, Uncle Jack met her at the station and, with tears streaming down his cheeks, related how the barn had burned and with it had gone her buggy—her cherished buggy that she had been paying for in little installments for months past. When he had finished the tragic story she replied, "Hush dat cryin', Jack! De Lawd give and de Lawd took away. You'se still got a roof over yer head an' you'se got Clem. Now I don't wan' no mo' o' dat cryin' around me."

Some one once asked her if she was happy, to which she answered, "Happy? I reckon I is! When I kin jes' set in my do' an' see my garden growin' an' call up all my chic'ens round me, ain' nobody no happier 'en Clem".

She is now bending every effort to educate the grandchild, Bertha, who is in her care. Bertha is attending high school and taking music lessons, hoping to become a music teacher. Aunt Clem "hires her out" in the afternoons, for she says, "She'll never make nothin' of herself if she walks de streets".

This is the day of the new Negro; we need not expect to find Mandy Judson Clementine Threat Wades in the new order. We of the South are too prone "to cling to an idle age and a musty page". We can best pay tribute to these noble representatives of the past by carefully working out our proper relations with their descendants. Mandy Judson Clementine Threat Wade has made her worthy contribution. Her name stands synonymous with strongest friendship, truest loyalty and most unselfish service that transcend the bounds of race and color. These qualities have been transmitted to her descendents, but they must be developed and directed. To us she throws the torch. Will we break faith with her posterity? It is ours to adjust ourselves to modern conditions; ours to see that justice is afforded the new Negro, that he be given an opportunity to develop these nobler qualities which are an undeniable possession of the race.

A Triple Star.

I know that religion, science, and art are all jealous of each other, because each of them claim, in a sense, to cover the whole field, that is, to interpret all experience from its own point of view. Philosophy tries to mediate between them, and the task has so far been beyond its powers. Some of the new philosophies undermine the authority of science, as some of the older systems undermined the authority of religion.

Complete reconciliation is not in sight; but there is no reason for hostility, which reacts unfavorably upon our whole view of life. For the eternal Values are not entirely separate from each other; they are, if my view be correct, a triple star, the attributes under which the one Supreme Being has revealed to us His nature and His will; and we shall be harmoniously developed men in proportion as we can make our own something of what the saint, the scientist, and the artist respectively find in their experience of life.

Religion has in the past tried to coerce the irreligious, by garish promises and terrifying threats—both promises and threats being offered in grossly materialistic language. When these promises and threats lose their cogency it secularized itself further and announced that its object was to promote a comfortable organization of society. These irreligious appeals have failed; the irreligious no longer care for the menaces or promises of the Church, and they have no respect for the priest in politics.

But the religious appeal is in no way weakened. Now, as always, the soul of man lives by admiration, hope, and love; and when these are fused in homage to the unseen but ever-present Being, the "Value of Values", as a medieval thinker called him, who exists unchanged behind the flux of phenomena, the appropriate reaction, worship, is set up, and the human spirit sets forth again "on its adventure brave and new", less hampered than formerly, by the fragments of obsolete science and philosophy which the new knowledge has helped us to discard.—Dean Inge.

"I Have Tried So Hard To Do Right."

These were the last words of Grover Cleveland, the ninetieth anniversary of whose birth was recently celebrated. No more characteristic last words were ever uttered; they summed up his whole life from his boyhood in the Presbyterian manse at Caldwell, N. J., until his election as Mayor of Buffalo in 1881, as Governor of New York in 1882, as President of the United States in 1884 and again in 1892, and then on to his death in 1908. He was a man of conscience all compact, who held righteousness the one law of the world. A prominent man in public life who knew him intimately through all his years of political stress and strain said of him: "He was the honestest man I ever knew." He was a man greater than his party or than all parties and once he saw the light of duty no influence or power could deflect him from it. Yet he was singularly kind and gentle, especially with children. Three articles in Scribner's by three intimate friends throw much light into his inner life and character. One of the most significant tributes to him is the fact that the coachman who drove the family carriage to the cemetery could hardly see the street and road for his tears. Every year the anniversary of his birth is celebrated in the Presbyterian manse, now the memorial house in Caldwell, N. J., where he received his Presbyterian faith and training, from which he never departed. With the passing years he grows greater and is more justly appreciated by men of all party lines and religious faiths.—Presbyterian Banner.

Winter.

Green mistletoe!
Oh, I remember now
A dell of snow,
Frost on the bough;
None there but I;
Snow, snow, and a wintry sky.

None there but I,
And footprints one by one,
Zigzaggedly,
Where I had to run;
Where shrill and powdery
A robin sat in the tree.

And he whistled sweet;
And in the crusted snow
With snow-clubbed feet
Jigged to and fro,
Till, from the day,
The rose-light ebbed away.

And the robins flew
Into the air, the air,
The white mist through;
And small and rare
The night-frost fell
Into the calm and misty dell.

And the dusk gathered low,
And the silver moon and stars
On the frozen snow
Drew taper bars,
Kindled winking fires
In the hooded briers.

And the sprawling Bear
Growled deep in the sky;
And Orion's hair
Streamed sparkling by;
But the North sighed low,
"Snow, snow, more snow"!

—Walter de la Mare.

The Saving Touch.

There was no virtue in the garment. Jesus wore. There was virtue in Him. Their faith in Him expressed itself in their belief that if they could but touch His garment they would be healed. Such faith may be called ignorant, superstitious, anything you please. None the less Jesus honored it and blessed those who had it. It is not the perfection of knowledge as to His nature, however desirable such knowledge may be; it is not exact knowledge, however important that may be, that brings the blessing. It is the touch of faith that saves.—Southern Christian Advocate.

More Scared Than Hurt.

John Jebb was an Englishman who spent much of his life in seeking his fortune in the wilder parts of North America. At one time he was interested in some mines in the Rocky Mountains, and spent at least one winter there in a log cabin. Being out one day in bad weather he found himself obliged to seek shelter for the night in a deserted mining village. In the middle of it, as he remembered, there was a cabin that still had a roof. Toward that he made his way, a matter of much difficulty, as the snow was very deep.

He noticed that a trail of some kind crossed the smooth belt of snow which defined the main street, but it was too dark to see clearly and he was too tired to think or care much about it. A few yards farther on it occurred again, however, and stooping down he tried to look at it. He could make out nothing, and he bent lower and carefully felt it. There could be no mistake then; it was a bear's track, sure enough, and a big one.

Jebb pushed on faster to the old cabin, now in sight, wondering what could have brought the brute out a good month ahead of time. Once inside the cabin he thought, with a fire started and a few logs against the door, he should have nothing to fear from the bear.

Again and again he saw the tracks dimly as he hurried along, and reaching the hut threw off his snow shoes and slid down the snow bank to the door, which still hung on its rawhide hinges.

There he paused. The ground was simply padded over with tracks, and while in the act of stretching out his hand toward the door he fancied he heard a slight sound within. Then it flashed through his mind that the mystery of the tracks was solved. The old bear had "holed up" in the cabin. Jebb stood motionless and listened. Everything was silent as the grave.

Noiseless he unsheathed his knife and took the blade between his teeth; noiselessly he freed his revolver and ran his fingers over the points of the bullets. A full minute had elapsed since he had heard the sound from inside. He took out three or four wax matches and was ready for the worst.

He was in for a desperate fight, in which the chances were that he would go under; but if he tried to retreat, the brute would rush after him. Besides, he was cold, tired and savage, and possessed by a sort of indignation that, with the whole mountain to choose from, the bear should have taken the particular cabin in which he himself had resolved to spend the night.

He was so angry, in fact, that he would almost as soon fight as not, and he decided that the best plan would be to strike a bunch of matches, kick open the door and shoot while the glint of the light was in the bear's eyes, trusting to his knife to do the rest.

He struck his matches on a piece of rusty iron nailed across the door, kicked it in, and was in the act of pulling the trigger when, as the light flamed up, instead of the green sparks of a bear's eyes, he saw the muzzle of a rifle pointing straight at him. Instinctively he jerked aside as the wind, whistling round the cabin, blew out the matches, and from the darkness of the hut a scared voice said:

"Don't shoot, stranger; don't shoot! I thought you was a bear!"

"And I thought you were another," said Jebb. "A nice five minutes you have given me! Who are you, anyway? And what are you doing here?"

He was an old prospector, it turned out, who had struck a lead of gold in the gulch in the autumn, and fearing some of the men might get ahead of him had taken up his winter quarters in the ruined hut, in order to get to work at the earliest moment in the spring. He finished his story by begging Jebb not to tell anything of his location and prospects, as he despised a crowd.

"All right," said Jebb, "if you'll tell me how you came to make bear tracks."

"Oh, that's easy," was the reply. "Ever since I got my feet frozen two years ago they're mighty liable to freeze again, so I cut up the gunny sack I toted my traps here in, wound it round my toes and padded about that way. I reckon it would look like bear tracks."

The Garden That Awoke.

Once upon a time there was a garden that was asleep. All winter long the trees had been bare. The birds had been away. The little tinkling fountain that had played and sung for so many happy days was quiet and still.

"The garden is not pretty any more. Perhaps it never will be pretty again," said the children who used to run in and out of it at play. And they did not come to the garden. They thought the garden was too fast asleep to ever wake up again.

One day something happened. A little brown bird that had flown a long distance stopped on the tip-top of a tree in the fast asleep garden. He had a secret from the heavenly Father to sing. He sang it to the hard brown branch of the tree on which he rested. This was the secret:

"It's coming, it's coming,
I'm sure; I know.
I'll fly and sing
If you'll burst and grow."

His song was so sweet that the branch suddenly felt the warm sap filling its heart. It burst open and sent out many fluttering leaf fingers. They waved in the wind just as the leaves had fluttered and waved the year before. The wind in the tree made the branch sing the heavenly Father's secret. This is what the branch all covered with green leaves, sang:

"It's coming, it's coming,
I'm sure; I know.
My leaves shall wave
If your grass will grow."

Deep down in the ground the sleeping roots of the grass heard. They awoke and sent their slim green little arms up through the bare ground. And the grasses stretched and reached and rustled. They told the secret that they had heard to the yellow daffodils that dreamed beside them under the ground. This is what the grasses told the sleeping daffodils:

"It's coming, it's coming,
I'm sure; I know.
The grass shall rise
If you'll bud and blow."

The yellow daffodils that slept down under the ground heard the sweet rustling song of the grasses. They decided to push themselves up through the earth to see what was happening. And when they did, they saw the new green leaves and the bright green grasses. So they all decided to put on their yellow bonnets. They were very beautiful bonnets indeed, all trimmed with ruffles. They decided they would tell the secret to the fountain. This is what the daffodils in their yellow bonnets said to the fountain:

"It's coming, it's coming,
We're sure; we know.
We'll bud and bloom,
If you'll tinkle low."

The fountain had been sleeping very soundly indeed. But when it heard the calling of the daffodils, it sent one drop of water as clear as crystal up into the sunlight. Then it let the drop tinkle down to the stone basin again. Then it began its soft, beautiful song. It sent another drop of water up into the sunlight and then another and another. Soon there was a whole shower of drops, as clear as crystal, tinkling into the basin and making sweet music.

"Oh, see the garden! The garden is pretty again," cried the children, opening the gate and running in. "What has happened to the garden?" they asked.

"We have a secret. Shall we tell the children?" sang the little brown bird in the tree. And the tree asked the new green grass, and the new green grass asked the yellow daffodils. Then the yellow daffodils asked the tinkling fountain, and the fountain said, "Yes".

So they told the children the secret from the heavenly Father about the garden.

"Spring has come," everything in the garden said, "and the heavenly Father sends love to you."—From, "The Way of the Gate".

The Baked Shoes.

A little girl was one day left at home alone while her mother went out to work. It was a very wet day, and the child wondered what she could do to make it cosy for her mother when she came home. Then she thought how splendid it would be to have a nice, dry, warm pair of shoes ready for her to put on. So she ran and put her mother's shoes in the oven. When mother returned, her little daughter ran in much glee to fetch her the warm shoes; but when she came to open the oven door, there they were, burnt to a cinder! But mother was not angry. She understood all that the child intended to do for her, and just picked up the little one in her arms and kissed her. God understands what we try to do for Him, even though it is sometimes a failure; and, provided we do our best, we shall assuredly hear Him say to us, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant".—King's Business.

Be done with saying what you do no believe, and find in your soul the divinest, truest thing in which you do believe and work that out. Be the noblest man that your present faith, poor, and weak and imperfect as it is, can make you to be. So, and so only as you take the next step forward, on your stand strong where you are now, so only as you think the curtain will draw back, and there will be revealed to you what lies beyond.—Phillips Brooks.

Deaths

RANDOLPH HARRISON.

A Tribute.

In the present day of decadent literature, which is prone to depict American business men as hypocrites and fools to the finer things of life, such a career as that of RANDOLPH HARRISON, of Lynchburg, is a standing rebuke. His recent passing called forth one of the most remarkable outpourings of editorial praise and personal tribute that has ever been accorded a member of the Old Dominion Bar.

Born of an old Virginia family of proud and distinguished lineage, Mr. Harrison elected to devote his life and large measure of talents to his own State, in spite of many attractive offers that came from centers of wealth like New York.

His life was one peculiar in the present age for its unswerving devotion to the service of family, friends and fellowman. Although he handled some of the most important legal business that arose in his and other States, it may truthfully be said that no word was ever uttered against either his personal or professional integrity. Many a needy litigant had the benefit of his wide grasp and deep study of the law for a pittance of its value.

Mr. Harrison studied his profession at the University of Virginia, which has nurtured so many of Virginia's eminent sons, at a time when the opportunity was usually available even to the best blood of the old South, only by dint of hard previous labor. Of such was his career. Equally arduous was his ascent to the top rank of his profession, and to the last it was sustained in noble and unmarred fashion. He died at last like a soldier at his post of duty in his Lynchburg office.

Faithfulness was the keynote of his life, and from its standard he never deviated. His career, as unblemished on its personal side as it was distinguished professionally may be held up to the youth of Virginia as one of the foremost models it could elect as a practical ideal of conduct. For the bereaved and desolated family will remain the memory of his life of service and undeviating devotion. The State at large as well as his professional brethren will mourn his loss, by His passion we may be brought unto

"The strife is o'er, the battle done,
The victory of life is won;
The song of triumph has begun,
Alleluia."

G. TAYLOE GWATHMEY.
A Tribute.

It is not often that any community sustains such a loss as this community has sustained in the death of the late G. TAYLOE GWATHMEY. Mr. Gwathmey's personality was such that he would inevitably have been a leader in any association of men in which he might have taken part. Throughout his whole life he had so lived among us here in Norfolk, and had touched our lives at so many points, that the news of his death brought a sense of personal bereavement not only to a host of friends, but to the public generally.

Soon after graduating from the Virginia Military Institute, Mr. Gwathmey became Assistant City Engineer of this city under the late Mr. W. T. Brooke. If Mr. Brooke were living he could tell how keenly he regretted losing Mr. Gwathmey's services when, a few years later, the latter decided to pursue the study of the law at the University of Virginia. Returning to Norfolk from the University, Mr. Gwathmey at once began the practice of his profession. Success came to him quickly, but, better than this, from the very first his lofty character, his high sense of right, his absolute fairness and his unflinching courage made their impression upon the whole community as well as upon his fellow members of the bar. Almost as a matter of course he became an outstanding figure in the political life of the city. For many years he was a member of the City Council and gave without stint his talent and time to the city. Only those who served and worked with him can know what a faithful and influential member he was. The progressive element in the Democratic party, of which he was the recognized leader, supported him for Mayor, but he was defeated for the nomination by the late James G. Riddick.

About fifteen years ago he moved his residence from Norfolk to the suburb known as Algonquin Park, then in Norfolk county. He soon became as influential in the affairs of the county as he had been in those of the city. Upon the death of the late Alvah H. Martin he was appointed by the Circuit Court to the important office of clerk of that court. He served out the unexpired term of Mr. Martin, and was, at the time of his death, just about to enter upon a new term to which he had recently been elected.

Until his removal to Algonquin Park, Mr. Gwathmey had been a devoted member of Christ Church, and was for many years its vestryman. At the time of his death he was senior warden of the Church of the Good Shepherd at Meadowbrook.

He married in 1901 Miss Margaret Cabell Smith, of Charlottesville, who, with four sons, Cabell G. Gwathmey, of Los Angeles, Cal.; G. Tayloe Gwathmey, Jr., and Edward S. Gwathmey, students at the University of Virginia, and Lomax Gwathmey, a student at Virginia Military Institute, survives him.

He was gentle and devoted in his home life. In his personal relations and friendships he was the soul of honor and loyalty. Charitable in his views of his fellowmen, he rarely criticized even his opponents. It was in his nature to see his fellowmen and their actions in the most favorable light. Years ago it was the good fortune of the writer to be closely associated with him, and he values today the lessons in fairness and considerateness towards others which he learned from him.

Life to those of us who remain can never be quite the same after the loss of such a man. We shall miss him more and more as the years go by.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

Bentley; at Grace Church, the Rev. McVeigh Harrison, O. H. C.

Among Organizations, the Y. P. S. L., and the G. F. S., have been notably active, and a reorganized branch of St. Andrew's Brotherhood is reported by St. Mark's Parish, the Rev. J. H. Brown, rector.

Notwithstanding the Death of the much loved minister-in-charge, the Rev. A. E. Gorter, work in the Missions at Grahamton and Garnettsville, is being actively continued, as also at Emmanuel Mission, Louisville, in the absence of the Rev. B. F. Roller, confined at his home in West Virginia by illness. In addition to his large field of labor along other lines, Mr. John D. Alexander, Diocesan Executive Secretary, is doing most helpful and efficient service in such mission calls as lay-reader, throughout the diocese.

Mrs. Sallie Gazlay Hamilton.

On March 7, after prolonged illness heroically borne, one of the most valued members of the Cathedral, Mrs. Sallie Gazlay Hamilton, entered the joys of eternal rest. Of rare richness of gifts, both spiritual and mental, rich and rare, likewise, were here opportunities and her gifts of service. Widely known as editor for many years of Cathedral Notes, Custodian of the Thank Offering Book, prominent in many organizations, both parochial and diocesan, unceasingly she served her Church and Master with consuming zeal, making her name, not less than her beauty of character, one to be long and lovingly remembered.

Rt. Rev. W. R. Starley, D. D., Bishop.

The Church Mission of Help.

"The Church Mission of Help of the Diocese of Newark, the only non-Roman Catholic organization in New Jersey attempting protective work for girls." This statement heads one of the pages of the folder which the Church Mission of Help of the Diocese of Newark has issued recently for publicity purposes and as an appeal for funds to carry on their work. The organization helped more than five hundred girls during 1927, most of whom were under eighteen years of age. The folder in short, to-the-point sentences, describes the different methods of reaching and aiding these girls. Under the heading, "What is Thought Of It"? appear two letters of commendation—one from Dr. James S. Plant, Psychiatrist and Director of the Essex County Juvenile Clinic, and another from Miss Helen M. Wilde, Case Supervisor in the State Department of Institutions and Agencies. Miss Wilde says: "We consider the Church Mission of Help our best ally in rehabilitation of girls who have been paroled from the State Home for Girls."

The little poem below was written by one of the girls who has been helped by the Church Mission of Help of the Diocese of Newark:

Often we read of that far-off day
When the needy one by the roadside lay,
And a certain Samaritan passed that way,
And succored him.

Still they falter and stumble and bleeding lie,
And still there are many who pass them by,
But the Samaritan's spirit still hears their cry
And comforts them.

In darkened places midst sordid things
There is the glint of angel's wings.
A helping hand and some sad heart sings
And hopes again.

The Board of Managers of the Church Mission of Help of the Diocese of Newark has for Honorary Chairmen, the Rt. Rev. Wilson R. Stearly, Bishop, and the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, Executive Secretary. The Rev. Charles L. Gomph, rector of Grace Church, Newark, is Chairman of the Board; the Very Rev. Arthur Dumper, Dean of Trinity Cathedral, Newark, and Mrs. John W. Howell are Vice-Chairmen; Mrs. John J. Bridges is Secretary, and Mrs. George W. Bond, Jr., is Treasurer. Other members of the Board follow: Mrs. Charles Ashmun, Mr. Arthur Barlow, Mrs. Zachariah Belcher, the Rev. Edwin S. Carson, Mr. Lewis R. Conklin, Mrs. Ludolph H. Conklin, the Rev. Edgar Cook, Mrs. G. H. Danforth, Mrs. Emil Diebitsch, the Rev. Augustine Elmendorf, Mrs. E. E. Estler, Mrs. Thomas Haight, Mrs. B. F. Hart, Jr., Mrs. L. L. Lewis, the Rev. A. R. McWilliams, the Rev. D., of Drew Theological Seminary.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. George F. Cameron, recently of Ayden, N. C., arrived in Charleston on March 15, to assume rectorship of Christ Church Parish, in the northwestern section of that city. The pulpit has been vacant, except for occasional supplies, since the summer of 1927, when the Rev. Roderick H. Jackson, the rector, resigned to engage in mission work in Japan.

The new rector was accompanied by Mrs. Cameron and their three children. Although a young man, he is known as a faithful, energetic worker and an able preacher and he was welcomed eagerly and cordially by his new congregation.

The Rev. E. H. Merriman, who has been the most recent supply at Christ Church, where he made a fine impression, has returned to his regular post at Monteagle, Tenn.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

New Parish Hall.

Bishop Page officiated Monday, February 20, at the opening of a new parish hall at St. Peter's, Hillsdale. Since its foundation, seventy-five years ago, this old parish has lacked facilities for religious education and social intercourse, such as are now provided by the new plant, which includes an assembly room, a choir room, a kindergarten room, a chapel and an office.

Congregations to Sing.

A list of twenty hymns and five chants has been sent by Bishop Page to all the choir directors and clergy of the diocese, with the suggestion that they be taught to the congregations. Together with this has been reprinted the similar list sent out last Lent, with the hope that the congregations of the diocese will gradually become possessed of a body of knowledge of Church music which will be immensely useful as a means of expression at many gatherings.

Young People's Work.

Mobilization of the youth of the diocese is the object announced by the Rev. R. B. Kimber, chairman of the newly-appointed commission on Young People's Work. The diocese is divided into eleven regions for the purpose, and in each region conferences will be held for a study of the various problems which confront young people in their relationships with the Church. The other members of the Commission are: The Rev. Messrs. H. J. Pearson, O. E. Berkeley, J. S. Ditchburn, J. F. Sant, Messrs. I. C. Johnson, Wm. Hill, Osgood Hart, Francis Smith, Miss Mae Rector and Miss Marty Smith. The work is under the general direction of Mr. I. C. Johnson, Director of Boys' Work in the Diocese. Mr. Johnson has prepared an interesting and suggestive bulletin containing suggestions and programs for the great variety of young people's groups at work in the diocese.

The Society of St. Johnland.

The Society of Saint Johnland held its annual meeting on January 19, in the directors' room of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, 49 Wall St., New York. The newly-elected officers of the Society are: Robert W. B. Elliott, President; the Rt. Rev. Ernest M. Stires, D. D., George F. Canfield, the Rev. H. Percy Silver, D. D., Vice-Presidents; Charles S. Butler, Secretary; Henry McC. Bangs, Treasurer.

Other members of the Board of Trustees are: the Rev. William Garth, of Islip, Long Island; the Rev. Henry Mottet, D. D., George E. Chisholm, Rogers H. Bacon, Robert L. Harrison, Robert B. Dodson, the Rev. E. Russell Bowie, Harry Forsyth, Edwin Gould, George E. Foleys.

A number of important subjects were discussed, among them being the plans for a new home for old men at Saint Johnland. The present home, Saint John's Inn, being more than fifty years old and having outgrown its usefulness for this purpose, can be remodeled into a house suitable for children for which it is badly needed. The sum of $30,000 has already been raised, but $30,000 more is needed in order to finance the construction of the new building. The Auxiliary of Women, of which Mrs. Walter Keese Earle is President, and Mrs. Robert W. B. Elliott, financial secretary, has done fine work in gathering funds for the new undertaking and it is hoped that the many friends of the Society will cooperate with them in raising the balance needed without, of course, endangering the regular gifts for current expenses so necessary to the life of this splendid work, which cares for nearly two hundred children and old people.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Bishop.

Cornerstone Laid.

Bishop Garland, March 10, officiated at the laying of the cornerstone of the first unit of a new parish house for St. George's Missions, East Venango and Edgemont Streets, Philadelphia, of which the Rev. A. H. Hord is the minister-in-charge. The ceremonies began at three o'clock and included an open-air processional from the church to the parish house site in which the Bishop, the clergy of the Diocese, and the choir and clubs and guilds of the mission participated. The first unit of St. George's parish house is another of the results of the diocesan campaign for missions and institutions started in December of 1926, when communicants of the Episcopal Church subscribed more than $2,000,000 to a five-year program for some forty missions and ten institutions of the church in the diocese. During 1927 nearly $700,000 was allocated for buildings. Plans for the completed parish house at St. George's call for a building occupying ground space of approximately one hundred by thirty feet.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Bishop.

Million Dollar Memorial to the Late Bishop Lines.

Plans for the establishment of a $1,000,000 Endowment Fund as a memorial to the late Bishop Lines were announced at a meeting of the Diocese of Newark in St. Luke's Parish House, Montclair, on Saturday afternoon, March 3. The income from the fund will be devoted to the support of the Episcopate and missionary activities of the diocese. The fund will be known as the Bishop Lines Memorial Endowment for the Diocese of Newark.

Each parish was represented at the meeting by its rector and three laymen and all voiced enthusiastic approval of the form which the memorial is to take, as well as the plan of campaign. Among those who spoke in behalf of the project were: Bishop Stearly, successor to Bishop Lines, and Chairman of the meeting; Dean Emery, Esq., Henry T. Stetson, Esq., and the Very Rev. Arthur Dumper, D. D., Dean of Trinity Cathedral.

Messages of endorsement and good wishes for success were read from the Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D., President Angell, of Yale University, and others.

Out of the profound sense of loss felt by the people of the Diocese of Newark, following the death of Bishop Lines on October 24 of last year, there has grown an insistent demand for a fitting memorial to commemorate his life of service and achievement.

Various suggestions were carefully considered by a committee formed for this purpose, as to the form of the Memorial, and it has been unanimously agreed by Bishop Stearly, the Memorial Committee, and the Standing Committee of the Diocese that no more appropriate plan could be found than the establishment on a great scale of a fund which Bishop Lines himself had inaugurated.

For many years, Bishop Lines had worked tirelessly for the establishment of an Episcopal Fund, then planned as $100,000. As far back as 1907 he had personally contributed to it the sum of $1,000 and at every convention of the diocese, he had urged its support and increase.

The principal of the Million Dollar Endowment will be held in perpetual trust and invested in accordance with the restrictions and regulations of the State of New Jersey, by the Trustees of the Episcopal Fund and Diocesan properties. The income, in perpetuity, will be administered by the Bishop and the Finance and Advisory Board of the Diocese. Thus the Memorial will go on through ages to come, yielding a constant income to strengthen and expand the work of the diocese to which Bishop Lines gave the best years of his life.

A Campaign Committee was appointed by Bishop Stearly, consisting of the rector and one layman from each parish. This Committee will conduct the campaign throughout the Diocese. Work has already begun on preliminary activities, and a series of district meetings is being planned to begin at once. At these meetings, the plan of campaign will be presented to the Vestries of each church so that all may be ready for intensive period from April 27 to May 8, when calls will be made on every Episcopalian in the Diocese.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Stires to Preach at Albee's Theatre.

Bishop Stires will be the first preacher at the noon-day Lenten services to be held again this year at Albee's Theatre, Brooklyn. The series will begin Tuesday, March 20, and will be held daily except Sunday and Monday for three weeks, ending on Saturday of Holy Week. Last year's attendance was very good, and it is hoped that even larger numbers will be brought together this year. The hour is 11:30 to 12:15.

Memorial Window to Dr. Alsop.

A window in memory of the late Rev. Reese F. Alsop, D. D., was dedicated Sunday, March 11, in St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, of which he was rector from 1886 to 1906. Because of his prominence in the General Convention and in the Board of Missions, Dr. Alsop was something of a national figure in the Church. The theme of the window now dedicated to his memory is, most appropriately, a missionary one. The design shows Christ proclaiming the Gospel to men of many nations. It is located behind the font, and in the gallery above the font. It was given by Mrs. Alsop and Dr. Alsop's children. The present rector, the Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, expresses the hope that the window will both keep fresh the memory of Dr. Alsop and also help to carry on the ideal of missionary devotion, which Dr. Alsop did much to inculcate in the parish.

Church of the Redeemer Has Seventy-fifth Anniversary.

The Church of the Redeemer, Brooklyn, will celebrate its "diamond jubilee" on Sunday, May 6, and for several days thereafter. On the anniversary the Rt. Rev. Sidney Catlin Partridge, Bishop of West Missouri, who lived in the parish as a boy, will be the preacher. Other plans are to be announced.

Incidentally, we understand that the Rev. Thomas J. Lacey, Ph. D., rector of this parish, has not, up to this date, received any reply to the letter which he lately sent the Pope respectfully but firmly declining the gracious invitation extended by His Holiness in a recent encyclical letter to Dr. Lacey and others to join the Church of Rome.

Annual Service, Church Mission of Help.

The annual service for the Church Mission of Help in this diocese will be held in Grace Church, Brooklyn Heights, on Sunday morning, March 25. The Rev. George P. Atwater, D. D., rector of the parish, will preach. This is in accordance with the request of the National Council of the Church Mission of Help, for a day of concerted prayer for this work.

After his resignation, which takes effect October 1, Mr. Morgan plans to devote his time visiting among the members of the Maryland Branch of the Shut-In Society, of which Mrs. Morgan is President and he is Chaplain.

The Rev. Samuel Hunting, Sayre, formerly assistant of St. Paul's, Kenwood, Chicago, has accepted a call to be rector of St. Mary's Church, Williamsport, Pa., and minister-in-charge of the Church of Our Saviour, Montoursville, Pa., three miles distant. Address, April 1, 908 Almond Street, Williamsport, Pa.

The Rev. Charles W. Hinton, rector of St. John's of Lattingtown, who has been abroad, is expected back for Good Friday.

The Rev. William A. Sparks, rector of St. John's, Far Rockaway, since 1911, has resigned, and after Easter will become rector of St. James' Church, Painesville, Ohio.

The Rev. Harry T. Morrell, rector of the Church of the Atonement, Brooklyn, has resigned, and, after Easter, will be rector of Christ Church, Sag Harbor, Long Island.

DEATHS.

The Rev. John Francis Coleman, rector of Christ Church, Pulaski, Va., entered into eternal rest on the evening of Thursday, March 15, 1928, and was buried at Covington, Va., on Saturday, the seventeenth. Although quite active, he had not enjoyed perfect health for a year or more. In January he entered a hospital in Richmond for examination and treatment and for a time it was hoped it might be possible to build up his strength and perform an operation that would prove beneficial, but he gradually grew weaker and remained a patient in the hospital until the end came.

INSPIRED SCRIPTURE

II Peter 1:16-21

16. For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eyewitnesses of his majesty.

17. For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

18. And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount.

19. We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the daystar arise in your hearts:

20. Knowing this first, that no prophecy of Scripture is of any private interpretation.

21. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Answered prayer urges us on to larger petitions.

"The best translation of the Bible is its translation into life."

No man can ever know God who has not learned to lean upon Him.—Rev. Wm. Porkess.

"If the devil," says Dean Inge, "invented partisan labels—and I think he must have done so—it was one of the cleverest tricks he ever played."

Our Lord was never so deeply united to His Father as at the moment of His bitter cry from the Cross; because then, even unto death, His will was at one with the Father's.—Selected.

"Every lie is a greater loss within than any gain that can come from without."

This would be a sorry world if God had left us out of His plans the way we leave Him out of ours.

Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how oft
  His love had gathered thee beneath its wings;
And thou wouldst not; Love crucified aloft
  On Calvary, enthroned the King of Kings.
—Katharine Lee Bates.

I will follow the upward road today,
  I will keep my face to the light,
I will think high thoughts as I go my way,
  I will do what I know is right.
I will look for the flowers by the side of the road,
  I will laugh and love and be strong,
I will try to lighten another's load,
  This day as I fare along.
—Selected.

We can pray best for people whom we know and for whom we have done something; into whose lives we have entered so that we feel their needs. There is a way of standing off from people and praying for them or sending them charity that seems to be a cheap and easy means of discharging our obligations to them. But such prayers and substitutes for personal sympathy and help do not mean much with us and still less with God. We must reach helping hands to people and then we can pray for them.—Exchange.

There is truth in the blessed Book that they who trust in the Lord shall be protected and shall be blessed, and shall be lifted up and held in the highest point of health that is for their highest good and the welfare of others. It is not that all will get well, because it would not be best for everybody to have perfect health. If you take two people who are sick, one of whom is truly trusting in the living God, while the other cares little or nothing for Him, other things being equal, the one trusting in God will get well in one half the time that the other does. It is a well understood fact that a large proportion of the best work in the world, Christian work, is done by invalids.—Henry Foster.

For The Southern Churchman.

"Let This Cup Pass."

Gene Scott Wright.

Dear Lord, 'tis strange how many say
  That Thou didst shrink from mortal pain,
And from the cross wouldst turn away,
  As though the sacrifice were vain.

That Thou the piercing nails didst fear,
  The anguish of the crucified,
The cruel thrust of Roman spear—
  That "not so have the martyrs died".

No! In the garden cool and dim,
Thy lofty spirit stooped to take
The awful weight of human sin,
  Which crushed to earth, but could not break.

"Let this cup pass"—that Life divine
  Imprisoned in a human frame,
Could falter not: but Son of Man,
  As well as Son of God Thy name.

"Let this cup pass"—the whole world's sin
  Thy shuddering spirit ill could bear.
Eternal purity must win
  For man his rescue from despair.

"Let this cup pass"—Thy Father God
  Knew what to Thee could mean such loss—
The hideous blackness of that load—
  He knew Thou didst not fear the Cross.

WATCH!!

"FOR IN SUCH AN HOUR AS YE THINK NOT THE SON OF MAN COMETH"

Of all the countless myriads of people who have lived on this earth, who through the long procession of centuries and ages and the many thousand of succeeding generations since the dim beginnings of our knowledge have been born and have lived and laughed and wept and died, it has been given to but One in human form to say at the last, "It is finished". To each of the others who have gone, who are going day by day, to all the countless myriads who are to live and die hereafter, death has come, comes and will come leaving something uncompleted, some desire unsatisfied, some ambition ungratified, some task not done, some hope unfulfilled. Millions of men and women have taken their own lives, never once because life was full, every one because something wanted was denied, some longing disappointed, some purpose apparently was impossible, some dream vanished, some burden too heavy or some danger too deadly.

To the never slumbering, all seeing eyes which have known the stories and the secrets of all the lives that have been lived, what a pitiful pile of endless and unvarying incompleteness it must be!

Even for us who know but the outward aspects and the visible lives of those about us, nothing is more pathetic, nothing moves us more deeply, brings tears to the eyes and sharp pangs of sorrow to the heart, more suddenly or surely than what we see and understand that the dead have left unfinished. It may be but a toy left by a child wearied with play and gone to rest forever, or called away and answering no more to any voice calling here, however loved or however passionate and yearning the calling. It may be a book or a story that somebody was reading and will not read again, a letter left to which the signature never will be written. It may be some bit of a woman's needlework on which patient fingers plied busily at the bidding of a fond heart, fingers clasped and cold and still now and heart beat and feeling, whether for sorrow or gladness, for love or longing, stilled. It may be the most trivial or the largest work of a man, young and eager, middle-aged and at his full strength or old and knowing his end near but yet looking forward, planning, working and thinking for a future he might not see. These actual things, these results and evidences of the work of hands and minds which have ceased from working and have left their tasks to remain unfinished always, have been taken from the purposes that busied them, which were so familiar and so dear to us and now are so distant, so absolutely removed from us, smite and sting and hurt sorely. Yet, so will it be with each of us when our times come and we go, never to return, to be seen and known no more by those to whom we are familiar presently to be but lingering memories and, presently again, to be forgotten utterly in this world as those who knew us follow us, one by one, year by year, until the last of them has gone hence and a new and strange generation comes to laugh and weep with somebody else. Each of us will leave something unfinished, something we want to do not done, that we want to see not seen, that we want to know not known, some longing unfulfilled, some labor reluctantly and unexpectedly dropped. It may be the strongest purpose we have known, the thing most ardently desired. As the child lays away its plaything, intending to return, and goes to sleep and then sleeps white and wan and never to wake, or is interrupted not to go back again, so shall we. We must leave our playthings, our tasks, our toils, our dreams and purposes alike—and go.

What a tremendous, a terrific, a vivid contrast between the two who were satisfied and felt their lives complete! One poor, friendless, deserted, despised, spit upon, enduring the long agony of crucifixion, bowing His head at the last and gasping, "It is finished", because He had lighted the world and redeemed the countless, teeming generations of mankind. The other saying unto himself, because his enlarged barns were overflowing, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry". Fool! That night was his soul required of him by God—his sordid, selfish, gross and silly soul—and he was borne forth, lifeless and stark, his ease scarcely tasted, his laughing represented only by the fixed and ghastly grin of death, his palate never to know the flavor of the food or the aroma of the wine; his heirs to quarrel over his crammed barns and wide possessions. Have we not seen or read of it many times in our lives, this worst of all unfinished lives, regarding its little successes as completion and consummation, looking, perhaps, to a reaping of indolence and sensuality and laughter from a sowing of labor and alertness and sharp and hard grinding of the faces of the poor; with no thought of the Power that gives and knows and sees and reckons exactly and requires?

None of us ever finish our lives, but so much depends, in the memories we leave here and in the reckoning and accounting we must face hereafter, on what it is we are trying to finish and do. For with the good, the kindly, the innocent that death interrupts, much evil, too, is interrupted and left unfinished—and maybe much prevented. What horrors this child, taken away, might have grown to; what crimes this man, cut down, may have been considering, what wrong and disaster this woman, gone to her grave, might have been capable of causing, are mysteries beyond our knowing. But we may know that the results here, and we may humbly hope and steadfastly believe that the consequences hereafter, shall depend on our trying, on the direction of our honest purpose and faithful endeavor. Concerning the hereafter, the strongest evidence of it to reason and common knowledge and instinct, apart from all teaching and inspiration, seems to us to be the incompleteness of here. If there is nothing beyond, why should the impulse to strive and to do and to reach out and do yet more, even when we are very old and have done much, live and stir within us irresistibly? Why do suggestions of echoes of harmonies we can not grasp or hold come to our souls at moments and then elude us, like music very distant, unless the full burst and beauty and glory of it is somewhere awaiting our coming? Why are our souls permitted fleeting glimpses of beauty and light which our tongues may not tell, our pens may not write, our brushes may not paint and our chisels may not carve, unless the beauty and light really are, but beyond our present grasping and comprehension?

Thinking so—believing so—knowing so—that there is a hereafter to be lived and a Judge to be faced and reckoned with, that, as all others have been, as all must be, as others daily are around us, we must presently be taken with what we are doing unfinished, it is for us to consider what we shall be called away in the act of doing, what it is we will lay aside in the weariness of the final weariness or be interrupted in for the interruption which shall be endless.

Thinking so—believing so—knowing so—fearing so—how shall we be called away with our purpose unfulfilled, our work unfinished, as may happen at any moment to any of us writing or reading these words? Shall it be as with the fool voluntary, the example of selfish and groveling sensuality? Be it kept in mind that there is eating and drinking apart from flesh, fish, fowl and vegetable, lust beside the honest and natural desire, that the intellectual appetite may be gross and insistent as the demands of the stomach, that the aesthetic palate may crave delicate wines, that the mind may revel in vile orgies told beautifully between the honest mechanic's ornamental bindings as they may have been danced beautifully in the old groves of desolated and degraded Greece. What book will we leave unfinished, with our mark in it, where we finished the chapter? What letter will we leave lying, half finished? What work will we leave not completed, for a memorial of us here and a testimony for us there, and would we dare ask to complete it there? What purpose unfulfilled, what desire unrealized? When the time comes, what work will we be doing, or trying to do? Will it be for sordid selfishness or slothful ease, for good or for evil, for kindly loving, gentle service to the world or humanity or somebody?

The time may be now. What are we doing or thinking or intending now? Cut down today, what memorial would we leave here and what credentials would we carry over yonder? And as it is today it may be when the time does come, as come it must.

These be thoughts worthy of some little thought, neighbors. What is our unfinished work just now?

THE SURRENDERED LIFE---IN CHRIST

Reverend Frank Cox

STUDIES IN EPHESIANS.
By the Rev. Duncan Thomas.

Eph. 1:3-5.—God has blessed us with every spiritual blessing that heaven contains, and all that is summed up and given to us in and through Christ. That was no mere sudden and strange and isolated impulse on the part of God, but was the fulfillment of a plan conceived before the world was made. God in the counsels of eternity planned the creation of the world and man—that is, us—had something definite in mind for which He would make us. He knew that all men would sin; then why did He select you and me? Because of some outstanding holiness or other worth that He foresaw in us? Nay, what we were had nothing to do with the choice. While we were yet sinners even, God gave His Son for us.

He chose us not "because we were", but in order "that we should be". What then is the purpose for which God chose us before He created the world? What is the thing that He so desires of us? "Holiness." Let us not be afraid of the word, and especially not of the experience. The word refers to that which is set apart—and that is what "chose" refers to. He picked us out and set us apart. But that which is set apart by God for Himself should be like Him. So the word takes on added meaning, of that which is like God. He chose us to be, not because we were, but to be like Himself.

How much like Him? How holy does He expect us to be? Here's a rare man whom his neighbors think is blameless in his life. Is that the measure of the holiness that God expects of us? Of course He does expect that we glorify Him before others and be not a stumbling block. But we know that his wife may see faults in him which his neighbors do not. Suppose, however, that even his wife with her intimate knowledge of him can find no fault in him. Would that satisfy God as to his holiness? Ah! the man himself knows what even his wife may not realize, of thought, feeling, desire or motive. But suppose that even his own heart does not accuse him? "All hearts are open, all desires known, and no secrets are hid" from Him; and He chose us in order that we should be holy, not as men, our wives, even our own eyes see us, but "before Him", even in His searching sight; so that as God looks at us He will see that we are without blemish. High? Yes, but He could not be God and be content with less. Holiness is perfected, as the law is fulfilled, "in love". If there is no blemish in love in us as God scrutinizes us, then His heart is satisfied, and nothing less will satisfy Him. If there is any hate or anger, any defect, any lack in our love, He is grieved. He is love, and when His life is really our life in experience then all the emotions and impulses of our being will be love. There will be no place for criticism, resentment, impatience, indifference even—no matter what the provocation. Even if one slaps us in the face (so they did our Lord, who is our life), there will be no flush of resentment (even though quickly suppressed before it reaches our motor impulses), but only a welling up of loving sympathy for such a sinner and desire that he may be snatched out of his pitiful estate and have the love of God shed abroad in his heart too.

For this, God chose us—to show Himself, who is love, to men through His life evidenced in us. So in accordance with this plan, He "predestinated (put your own meaning in that Scriptural word, but do not deviscerate it) us unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ". The word "adopt" in Greek means more than in our common usage. We use it simply of relationship. I adopt a boy, and although that creates a new relationship, yet he may prove to be in fact and life a very unworthy son. But God adopted us, as we have seen, "that we should be holy", that is, worthy sons. We have entered into a new relationship, true; but that occurred when we were "born again". This word means something in addition—to set forth or manifest as sons. That is, we are not only to be sons, but to look and act like sons. When I was in college, I had a chum whose father knew my own father well. One day my friend's father passed through on the train. He looked out of the car window at the crowd of college students and said to his son, "There's Fred Thomas' son". He had never seen me before, yet he picked me out of the crowd because I was my father's son evidently as well as actually. We are to be His sons, and to be evidently His sons, so that as men see us they will know that we are sons of the Father.

One thing note, however, we are not expected to manifest ourselves—we have not the power—but HE sets us forth as sons. He stamps His image upon us, on our lives and in our faces, we cannot do it ourselves. It is "through Jesus Christ". How? If Christ is our life, then the expression of "our life" will be not ours but Christ. We may be perfect in love, when, and only when, He who is Love is loving in and through us. If it is true that "I no longer live, but Christ liveth in me by faith", then all the motions of my life, as I eat, drink, walk and talk, will be "not I, but Christ". So "men will see your good works (yet they are not yours but His) and glorify your Father". They see not you, but Him. They praise not you, but Him. For this He chose us earthen vessels, that the glory might be all God's.

HISTORIC PERIODS OF FREDERICKSBURG. 1608-1861.

Mrs. Vivian Minor Fleming.

Historic Period No. 4—Spotsylvania County—Stafford—Chatham.

In 1634 the House of Burgesses divided the colony of Virginia into eight shires. All this part of Virginia was called Rappahannock on both sides of the river.

In 1692 this shire was divided and lost its name. All on the north side of the river was Richmond County and on the south side was Essex.

The Leaseland was in Essex County until 1720, when a new county was formed—called Spottsylvania, after Governor Spottswood.

St. George's Parish was erected about this same time, and the church building and glebe were not far from Germanna, on a hill west of Mine Run.

Stafford County history I am not familiar with. The nephew of Sir Walter Raleigh, Raleigh Travers, I believe was his name, had a grant of land in Stafford very early, and part of it is still owned by his descendants or connections.

From a brick picked up near the Chatham chimney, stamped 1721, we get approximately the date of that old colonial mansion, which is such a fine example of our early architecture and was built by one of the Fitzhughs. The original colonist by this name was William Fitzhugh, of Westmoreland. He came over in 1670. He was an eminent and successful lawyer and published a book in England on Virginia law. In all things he seemed to have acted with honor and principle. In one of his letters (there is a volume of them in the Historical Society rooms in Richmond) he speaks of being "neither in want nor abundance". But he had the opportunity of acquiring large tracts of land at a low price and left large estates to each of his sons. He was a man of liberality and deep religious convictions. His will is probated in Stafford County, 701.

If Chatham was built as early as the brick indicates it must have been built by William No. 2, whose son, Henry, born in 1706, was the father of William Fitzhugh, whose large hospitality, rare wines, race course, etc., made Chatham famous. He named the place after his friend, the Earl of Chatham.

THE GREATNESS OF OUR RELIGION

Ava L. Wright

(The following is an address delivered to a group of girls in a mission study school in Chattanooga, Tenn.)

I AM going to talk to you young people tonight about the greatness of our religion. Yours is a school of missions, and you know there are people who don't believe in missions. They tell us that other people have their religions and they ask us why we don't leave them alone. They go so far as to say that other religions are as good as ours. For instance, they say that Buddhism which is roughly estimated to have about five hundred million adherents, has some teachings which compare with the highest teachings of Christianity. And so it has—some. For instance, the one new commandment given us by our Lord Jesus Christ was to love God and our fellows; and Buddhism makes much of the spirit of love—but not love for God. Scholars tell us that Buddhism has no God; it never mentions Him nor takes Him into any account whatever. Buddha was just a man seeking perfection for himself and trying to lead others along his road. I read an article the other day, supposed to be authoritative, as it was in one of the best encyclopedias, which said that, contrary to the old opinion that there was no atheist people, scholars were now generally agreed that nations under the Buddhist religion were atheist nations. So I want to talk to you about the greatness of our religion. For one thing we have a great and loving God..

And I take it that a religion is great as it meets the needs of human beings. And the first and deepest need of the soul that Christ touches is forgiveness of sin.

But how do you young people feel about sin? For I notice the longer I observe people there are so many of them who, like the Pharisee in Christ's day, think they are good. People who are raised up in moral, respectable homes, who don't drink or steal or gamble or kill or commit adultery are very complacent about themselves. But when Jesus came, if you will notice in the Sermon on the Mount, He went behind every one of these ancient moral laws to the spirit beneath them. Jesus attacked malice and anger and hate. He attacked the spirit of uncleanness in the human heart that revelled in dirty thoughts. He attacked the ugly spirit of retaliation that impels us to pay back or hit back when any one does us a wrong. He attacked covetousness which still today causes such great unhappiness and discontent. These are the things He laid emphasis on. And these are the sins that no human being escapes. And they cut the soul off from God as truly as do theft and murder. No wonder the Bible says men are lost.

But they don't need to be lost—to be cut off from God; there's a way back; that's what Jesus came to proclaim. He wanted men to know who felt condemned and lost in their sin that the thing wasn't hopeless. He said "the Son of Man is able to forgive sins"; that is, that He is willing to cancel the debt, to remit the penalty or punishment of sin, to restore the sinner to God's favor again.

It's a very simple thing: for all of us know how any good mother or father is willing to forgive an erring child. But here is a thing we must remember about even human forgiveness; parents don't forgive a child who is defiant, who says, "I'll do wrong again if I please". No, and they don't forgive one who merely tries to buy back their favor with a toy or piece of candy or some little service rendered. A good parent's favor is not bought; neither is God's. Men and women have been trying to buy it all the centuries, and some of them have fooled themselves that they have. This explains why many a man whose life is notoriously crooked is a great philanthropist; sometimes, alas, a great contributor to the church; his conscience gets a sop from these gifts. But God has never accepted one. For forgiveness is never bought; it is given. What a parent wants, what God wants is penitence and a resolve—however much it (the child) may afterward fail through weakness—to do right, to go God's way.

And since Jesus proclaimed this great human need of forgiveness and His willingness to forgive, I like to think of the way that He illustrated His power. You remember He said to a man who was brought to Him with palsy, "Son, thy sin be forgiven thee". That raised a protest from the Pharisees. Jesus appeared to them just a man, and it sounded to them blasphemous that a man should forgive sins; only God could do that. Now, how to demonstrate in a concrete way that He could forgive. Well, as we read the story we are bound to infer that the man's illness was the direct result of sin, just as thousands of cases in the hospitals today are from some human excess. Then if he could remit the penalty of sin that was in the man's body, could cure what sin had done to that body, would that convince of His power to remit all other penalty, the destruction of the soul, for instance? If He showed power to heal and restore a body that apparently nobody else had been able to cure, would that convince of His power to heal and restore a soul? He put the problem before them. "Whether is easier," He asked, "to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise and walk? But that ye may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins (then saith He to the sick of the palsy), Arise, take up thy bed and go unto thy house. And he arose and departed to his house". Wonderful the love that stooped so to our incredulity.

"But," you young people now say, "you have pointed out that this forgiveness rests on more than just penitence; it rests on a resolve to do right henceforth, to go His way. But that is just what we are afraid of; we don't know whether we are able to go His way or not; we are weak; we are mighty apt to fall down." We know as J. G. Holland says:

> "We hope and aspire and resolve and trust,
> When morning calls us to life and light
> But our feet grow weary and ere the night
> Our lives are trailing in sordid dust."

What aspiring soul doesn't know this truth? We know our passions—not only the passions of gambling and drink and lust, but also those of discontent, of malice, of sharp temper, oh! sinful habits of a thousand kinds. Many of us can no more control our tongues than the drunkard his drink. Then what's the use of accepting God's gracious forgiveness, and starting over again? Well, the use is this: that this time we start over again with Him. We never did that before; we went in our human strength, in the power of our wills, and because human impulse is stronger than human will we failed. But once our wills are given into God's keeping there is a power to sustain them. Ah, this is the best thing I have ever learned of Christ.

Once when I was a young girl in the early days of my Christian experience, realizing many of the weaknesses of my human nature, I used to start each day with a resolve not to let these failings get the better of me that day. I set my will to the task of being good as I thought God wanted me to be good. But long since have I given up that way of conquering and putting down the weaknesses of my life. Now I kneel on my knees in the morning and pray for strength and help from God. And I trust Him for all the unguarded moments of the day when I am so busy with human concerns that my thought is not consciously bent on Him. I ask Him and I trust Him for help, and He gives it. And this trust is the secret of such peace as I possess.

But Jesus Himself, in one of the great lessons to His disciples just before His death, urged upon them this truth. He said, "I am the vine, ye are the branches. . . . As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye except ye abide in me". A very simple truth: a branch drawing its strength and fruitfulness, even its very life, from the vine; and withered and dried up if it cuts itself off from the source of life, and tries to grow by itself, by its own efforts. I pass this truth on to you as the greatest that I know. To me Christ's offer of help to the weakness of humanity is one of the points where He has deeply met our need.

And then another need He has met: He gives us comfort and understanding.

I take it that every young person in the world goes through a period when he thinks there is not a soul on earth who understands him; and the universal longing at this period of life is for a sympathetic friend. You have difficulties, perplexities, and the greatest boon that earth could give would be a person to whom you could pour out your hearts—a person who wouldn't laugh at you, who wouldn't shut you up by rebuking you, but who would understandingly listen, and then in great kindness talk over the problem with you. But you young people are not the only ones who want this. Some one has said that the way grown men and women go to the psycho-analysta of our day and pay them to hear their troubles and advise with them is best evidence we have that the Roman Church meets a great human need with its confessional. But we Protestants don't have a confessional. We think we have something better. We pour our troubles into the ears of One Who richly understands, because He has been along our human way, and Who comforts and directs us with His own words, infinitely wiser advice than any mere human being can give. I sometimes wonder how many millions of men and women have risen from their knees, or sometimes, in a pressing difficulty, from opening their Bibles just to see what God would speak to them from the open page, and have gone on with new light and strength to help them. The writer well remembers a time in her own life when in deep rebellion and unhappiness at the circumstances of life, which, she thought, put too many duties upon her and left her too little time for her cherished projects, she went in desperate need to the Bible, and the words that spoke to her from the page were these: "Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant; even as the Son of Man—" There was a rebuke in the words without a doubt, but there was no wound. What a human friend would have said to me under the circumstances would either have been a harsh thing, like: "You are selfish; you want your own way; that's what's the matter with you"; or an unwise thing like this: "I wouldn't stand for it; every person has a right to her own life." But Jesus was wiser, and His words were very quiet. He told me that, of course, I knew—"Ye know," He said—how the world estimates greatness; "Princes and they that exercise authority" are counted great. But He was confident that He had a surer estimate of greatness: the permanently great are they who serve, "even as the Son of Man"—In His spirit of love and willingness. Well, deep within me I believed He was right, as I am more and more convinced the longer I live. But I have never forgotten the lesson nor the softening that came with it.

So Christ gives us a Friend—One who understands, to whom we can tell everything, from whom we need hide nothing, and who will advise us wisely and with love.

But there is another supreme need He meets. Shall I say that the greatest thing He does for us is to give us our hope of immortality, and in that one thing to show us our destiny and to fill all our living with purpose. Isn't it true that every soul of us at one deep moment or another cries out with Job, "If a man die shall he live again"? And to be assured, as Job was that "Though worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh I shall see God". Is it not the ultimate triumph of the soul? But for Job that assurance came through a vision of Christ, "I know that my Redeemer liveth". And so it comes for us. No other religion proclaims a leader who died and then triumphed over death in resurrection. Oh! what it means to us to believe in such a One! that as He said He lay down his human life to the one end He should take it again, and made the saying good, so the other saying that we who believe in Him shall never perish, but come forth to eternal life, He will make good also. This faith makes all the difference to our human lives and the way they are lived. We know our destiny. We know the goal we are traveling toward, and the glory of it lightens all the difficulties along the way. And it makes nobility and goodness our purpose and our aim, "that we may have a right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city".

Ah, how great is our religion!

Subject-Title—What Christ Asks For Us.

THE MESSAGE.

We have looked at this momentous chapter in outline, but a thousand readings of it will not allow of our exhausting its spiritual treasures. Take its sentences and its dominating words one by one, and ponder them carefully and prayerfully. Surely in our hearts we often say—"I want that the will of God shall be done in me, but how am I to know what God's will for me is? So far as our lesson is concerned we are not left in doubt, for what Christ asks the Father for us, must be His will for us. For what then, does He ask? 1. It is God's will, first of all, that we be saved (2, 3); and then, that we be kept (11). Christ prays not for our removal from the world, but for our safety in it (15).. 2. Further, it is God's will that we be sanctified (17, 19). It is not enough that we be safeguarded: "this is the will of God, even your sanctification". 3. It is God's will that we be witnesses (20) in order that others may be saved. 4. For this purpose, it is God's will that we all become missionaries (18), that is, sent ones. It does not say how far any one will be sent. If you go to perishing souls in your own city or village you are a missionary. But, obviously, many must go far afield. 5. Again, it is God's will that unity should characterize His Church (22, 23). We hear much in these days of Church Union. What is of vastly more importance is Christian Unity, which only God Himself can make, but which we must keep (Eph. 4.3). 6. Once more, it is God's will that we should love one another, as He has loved us (26). How amazing a possibility! How tragic is our failure! 7. And finally, it is God's will that we spend a blissful eternity with Him in heaven (24., 14:1-4). Is the risen Lord's prayer for you being answered in your experience? There is power in His prayer; but is there purpose in your heart?

Subject-Title—The Betrayal.

THE MESSAGE.

We must pause here again to get the perspective of this "Gospel". It is in three main divisions, with a Prologue (1:1-18), and Epilogue (21). They are: I. The Revelation of the Son to the World as Life (1:19—12:50). II. The Revelation of the Son to the Disciples as Light (13-17). And now we come to III. The Revelation of the Son to the Disciples and the World as Love (18-20). Put these divisions in your Bible margin. The last division is in three parts, which we are to consider for a week, viz.: the Trial, the Tragedy, and the Triumph of Divine Love. First of all then, 1. The Trial of Divine Love (18:1-19:16). Verses 12-14 belong to tomorrow's portion, so we shall not now consider them. Today's portion records The Betrayal (1-11). Things specially noteworthy in these verses are: (a) That Gethsemane was a place often frequented by Jesus and His disciples (1, 2). Take time to let that impress you. (b) That Jesus knew all that was to happen (4). Modern teaching which affirms His fallibility denies that He foreknew. (c) That thrice here, Jesus said, "I am" (5, 6, 8). He had said that before, and Judas at any rate must have discerned the deeper meaning of this reply (cf. 4:26; 6:20; 8:24, 28, 58; 13:19). (d) That Peter, as often before, showed more courage than sense on this occasion (10). That he was not arrested can be accounted for only by the fact that Jesus healed Malchus' ear (Luke). (e) That one who had companied with Jesus for two years at least, had heard His wonderful words, seen His wonderful deeds, and beheld His wonderful life, now betrayed Him! (2) Judas must for ever remain a mystery: he did what can never be repeated, but it is in the power and choice of each of us in some other way to betray Christ. Are you doing this by your refusal to bear witness to Him? By your love of the world? By your neglect of His Word and prayer? In any other way?

Subject-Title—Playing With Justice.

THE MESSAGE.

Following The Betrayal (1-11) are The Trials (18:12 to 19:16); and first of all, 1. The Ecclesiastical Trial (12-27). This was first before Annas (13), and then before Caiaphas (24). Part of this report is peculiar to the Fourth Gospel. Observe that of these sixteen verses, seven are not about the trial of Jesus, but of Peter (15-18, 25-27). Look at this first. Every one who names the Name of Christ is on his trial. If the Master was arraigned it is not likely that the servant will escape. Now where did Peter begin to go wrong? In wishing it to be thought that he had nothing to do with Jesus. Have you ever felt like that in worldly company? That is how we are likely to feel when we voluntarily go into worldly company. Courage and cowardice strangely mingled in Peter. He could draw a sword at the Garden gate, and relieve a man of his ear, and yet in this courtyard he denied his Lord before a young girl. Watch yourself on occasions. Now look at the other trial (12-14, 19-24). How different! Christ was led away by His captors, not because He was helpless, but because He was willing; it was not their fetters which bound Him, but His love. They asked Him of His doctrine and disciples, not to believe, but in order to incriminate. Are your enquiries always honest? Jesus pointed them to His public teaching (20-21). He had not been a schemer behind locked doors, but a Preacher out in the open. These religious humbugs found it easier to strike Christ than to convict Him (22): so do their large posterity.

THE MESSAGE.

2. The Civil Trial (18:28 to 19:16). The scene of this Trial moves to and fro in relation to the Praetorium (28), now being without, and now within. Mark these movements: without (28-32); within (33-38a); without (38b-40); within (19:1-3); without (19:4-7); within (19:8-11); and finally without (19:12-16). Three of these seven sections claim our attention today. (i) First of all we hear Pilate asking the Jews what the charge is (28-32). It is clear that the Jews wanted nothing less than a death sentence, and the pronouncement of that was not in their power (31). How do man's malignity and God's mercy dovetail? (32. cf. 12:32). Two facts must ever be seen together, namely, that Jesus was put to death by men, and that He died voluntarily. (ii) In the second section (33-38a), which is peculiar to this record, Pilate has a private interview with Jesus. Who in this scene is the real King? Then, Jesus stood before Pilate; one day, Pilate will stand before Jesus. God stood before a governor! Of course Pilate did not know this, but it was his business to be just. The truth must prevail (37). Christ Who was the Truth, was born to bear witness to it. Do you know to what end you were born? and for what cause you came into the world? (37). Human life is a plan of God and every one must either frustrate or fulfil that plan. What are you doing? (iii) The third section (38b-40) shows us what a mockery Pilate's justice was. "I find in Him no fault, but—" He used a custom (39) as a sop to his conscience. The choice is between a robber and the Redeemer, and the people do not hesitate (40). What Barabbas are you choosing instead of Christ? Remember, there is always an alternative, but it is always fatal.

Subject-Title—The Cruelty of Hate.

THE MESSAGE.

(iv) The judge is fast becoming the criminal (1-3). Why was Jesus scourged? Why was a crown of thorns put on His brow? Why was He smitten? Why was He mocked? Why? It is clear that Pilate allowed all this in the hope that it would satisfy the Jews and that in this way Jesus would escape the Cross (Luke 23:22). But no malice can make wrong right; we may never do evil that good may come. If Jesus was not guilty, He should not have been punished. When a judge sacrifices the claims of justice to the clamour of the crowd, he has pronounced his own sentence. (v) The previous outrage was inside the Praetorium; this one is outside, before the crowd (4-7). Pilate had tried to save Jesus by cruelty; now he would save Him by an appeal to pity (5). Three times he declared that he found no fault in the Prisoner; his duty then was obvious, he should have pronounced Him "not guilty", and have released Him. Are you playing tricks with your conscience? Christ does not want pity, but fair play. What is to be said about such a verdict as this—"take ye Him and crucify Him: for I find no fault in Him"? Pilate had said, "ye have a custom" (18:39); and now the Jews say, "we have a law" (7). Yes, in the name of custom, law, and of every order and institution, get Truth out of the way: that has been the age-long impulse of the world (vi). Pilate has another private interview with Jesus (8-11). In the first (18:33-38a), he talked about kingship; now he chatters about power. Power, indeed! Pilate seems to have had little of that. (vii) The Governor, who had utter contempt for the Jews, now taunts them (14, 15), but all is at Jesus' expense (12-16). Pilate handed Him over, and they led Him away (16). What a terrible travesty of justice!

Subject-Title—The Saviour Dies.

THE MESSAGE.

In 18:1 to 19:16, we have seen The Trial of Divine Love; now we are to behold The Tragedy of Divine Love (19:17-32). "Beneath an Eastern sky, amid a rabble cry, a Man went forth to die, for me. Thorn-crowned His blessed head, blood-stained His every tread, cross-laden on He sped, for me!" Do you believe that? If so, what difference does your belief make? Contemplate, 1. The Crucifixion (17-22). Jesus was and always is "in the midst" (18). Trace this fact and thought from the Cradle to the Throne. Though Jesus was alone in His death, He did not die alone (18). These men were so near, and yet so far. The title on the cross was written in the language of Religion, Art and Law (20). How prophetic! Pilate became authoritative and firm too late (22). "Too late" are terrible words: you see to it that you are not too late. 2. Foes and Friends (23-27). Christ was never without both. How great the contrast here: cruelty and selfishness, on the one hand (23, 24), and tenderness and self-forgetfulness, on the other hand (25-27). It will be eternally to the credit of these four women (three of them named Mary) that they stood by in this dark hour (25). Are not verses 26, 27, wonderful! This is the third of the Seven Sayings from the Cross. The veil is drawn, but we know how John would tenderly love and care for Mary. Trace the sentence in verse 26, five times. 3. The Work Accomplished (28-30). Here we have sayings five and six. Will you think about them all today? "I Thirst." Is He thirsting still: thirsting for your love and witness; is He? "It is Finished." Read 4:34; 5:36; 17:4; and 18:28. Christ did what He came to do. His death was not a surprise to Him, for He came to die. Finished, Finished. Hallelujah! What a Saviour!

Subject-Title—God Takes Care of Jesus' Body.

THE MESSAGE.

In today's lesson we have two requests. 1. The Request of the Jews (31-37). This had important consequences, the fulfilment of two predictions. It had been foretold that the flow of "blood and water" is to be regarded and although the legs were broken of the two malefactors, Jesus' were not. It had been predicted also that the Jews would look upon Him Whom they had pierced (cf. Zech. 12:10; Rev. 1:7), and this they now do. Westcott thinks that the flow of "blood and water" is to be regarded "as a sign of life in death"; also, he sees in the "blood", a cleansing power, and in the "water", a quickening power; the one referring specially to Christ's work, and the other to the Spirit's work. It is worthy of note that the Evangelist says the first Scripture was then "fulfilled" (36), but his language regarding the second passage safeguards it for a future fulfilment (37). This is an evidence of inspiration. 2. The Request of Joseph of Arimathea (38-42). In verse 25, we saw the devotion of women: here we see how devoted men can be. Joseph and Nicodemus, both disciples of Christ, now lavish upon Him a love which He could have done with while He was alive; but better late than not at all. The story of Nicodemus can be told in three sentences: (a) Desire for Christ (3:1-21); (b) Defence of Christ (7:45-52); (c) Devotion to Christ (39). Mark the progress. A Cross, a Garden, a Tomb, a Body! (41, 42): here ugliness and beauty, death and life meet; but it is the beauty and the life that triumph. Jesus suffered all this for you. Do you love Him? Have you thanked Him? Are you living for Him? Are you?

GOD'S OATH TO DAVID AND THE FUTURE OF PALESTINE

Reverend E. L. Langston, M. A.

Incumbent of Emmanuel Church, Wimbledon.

SIGNIFICANT things have recently been happening in the political world, but none more remarkable than the attitude of the nations towards Palestine and the Jews. The League of Nations has ratified the policy of Great Britain to restore the Jews to Palestine, and Great Britain has been honored by having given to it the Mandate for that country. This fact is big with significance to the Bible student, for we know that "the Lord reigneth", and nothing happens by chance, and He is specially at this time overruling the destinies of His Chosen Race.

To understand the present situation, we must remember two things—(1) that God has a definite plan for world redemption; (2) that that plan is wrapped up in Israel and Palestine. It is of paramount importance, therefore, that we should realize that the predicted destinies of Palestine and all the Israelitish race are absolutely sure and certain; for God has sworn by two unconditional oaths that He will manifest His glory and power, both in the land and in the people of the land. One of these oaths has been well studied by students of prophecy, viz.. God's oath to Abraham, as revealed in Genesis 7:1-3. Therefore, on that oath at present we have nothing to say, but wish rather to draw special attention to the other oath that has not received the study which is due to it, viz., God's oath to David, which is found in 2 Samuel 7.

God's Oath to David.

Israel had been passing through days of great crisis, and at last David had overcome all his enemies, and the country was now at rest. David had rebuilt Jerusalem, and suddenly there came to his mind the thought, "I dwell in an house of cedar, but the Ark of God dwelleth within curtains". Therefore he resolved to build God a House worthy of Jehovah, and Nathan the prophet approved, saying, "Go, do all that is in thine heart; for the Lord is with thee". God's subsequent message to David through Nathan should be very carefully and prayerfully considered:

> Verse 11.—The Lord telleth thee that He will make thee an house.
> Verse 12.—. . . I will set up thy seed after thee.
> Verse 13.—. . . I will stablish the throne of his kingdom for ever.
> Verse 16.—. . . thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: thy throne shall be established for ever.

Whilst David, on the one hand, was concerned about building a House for God, God, on the other hand, gave a definite promise that He would not only build a house unto David, but establish his throne and his kingdom forever.

The question we want to ask is: "Are these promises given by God to David to be taken literally or spiritually?" The prevailing idea is to spiritualize all these predictions and promises, and the result is today we have false ideas of what the Kingdom of God really is. David certainly did not spiritualize them, but he believed that God was going to do just what He had said:

> Verse 25.—Now, O Lord God, the word that Thou hast spoken concerning Thy servant, and concerning his house, establish it for ever, and do as Thou hast said.
> Verse 27.—For Thou, O Lord of hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to Thy servant, saying, I will build thee an house: therefore hath Thy servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto Thee.
> Verse 28.—And now, O Lord God, Thou art that God, and Thy words be true, and Thou hast promised this goodness unto Thy servant.
> Verse 29.—Therefore now let it please thee to bless the house of Thy servant, that it may continue for ever before Thee: for Thou, O Lord God, hast spoken it: and with Thy blessing let the house of Thy servants be blessed for ever.

Was David right in regarding these promises of God as literal? Is David to have a literal earthly throne? Is David's Kingdom going to be established for ever? This is a most important question, in the light of modern views on the Kingdom of God. The word "House" is used over 2,000 times in the Old Testament in exactly the same sense, viz., that of a family. The word "Kingdom" is always used literally in the Old Testament; "Throne" is also always used literally, never once in its modern spiritual sense. Has the "House of David", the "Throne of David", and the "Kingdom of David" been literally established in Jerusalem? No! Then is God going to be true to His oath? Time and again in the dark days of the Monarchy prophets were raised up who reaffirmed this oath to the descendants of the House of David.

Jeremiah 33:14-26:

> 14.—Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will perform that good thing which I have promised unto the house of Israel and to the house of Judah.
> 15.—In those days, and that time, will I cause the Branch of righteousness to grow up unto David; and He shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land.
> 16.—In those days shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely: and this is the name wherewith she shall be called, The Lord our righteousness.
> 17.—For thus saith the Lord: David shall never want a man to sit upon the throne of the house of Israel;
> 18.—Neither shall the priests the Levites want a man before Me to offer burnt offerings, and to kindle meat offerings, and to do sacrifice continually.
> 19.—And the word of the Lord came unto Jerusalem, saying,
> 20.—Thus saith the Lord: If ye can break My covenant of the day, and My covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season;
> 21.—Then may also My covenant be broken with David My servant, that he should not have a son to reign upon his throne; and with the Levites the priests, My ministers.
> 22.—As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, neither the sand of the sea measured: so will I multiply the seed of David My servant, and the Levites that minister unto Me.
> 23.—Moreover the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, saying:
> 24.—Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, saying, The two families which the Lord hath chosen, He hath even cast them off? thus they have despised My people, that they should be no more a nation before them.
> 25.—Thus said the Lord: If My covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth;
> 26.—Then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David My servant, so that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: for I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them.

Psalm 89:3, 4 and 35, 36:

> Verse 3.—I have made a covenant with My chosen, I have sworn unto David My servant,
> Verse 4.—Thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations. Selah.
> Verse 35.—Once have I sworn by My holiness that I will not lie unto David.
> Verse 36.—His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before Me.

The Genealogical Tables.

These promises have nothing whatever to do with the Church or its future glory. They refer to an earthly kingdom that is going to be definitely established here on this earth, and reigned over by David's Greater Son. There is a very remarkable prophecy, in St. Luke 1:32, 33, concerning the Lord Jesus: "The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David: and He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of His kingdom there shall be no end." Surely these words are not meant for a spiritual, but a literal Throne and a literal Kingdom! The Lord Jesus, as the Son of David, is the King of Israel, and there is no other King. The Lord Jesus, as the Son of Abraham, is the Heir of the Covenant of Promise. In St. Matthew's Genealogical Table we have David's line through Solomon; in St. Luke's Genealogical Table, the descendants of David's line through Nathan; in St. Matthew we see the parentage of Joseph; in St. Luke, the parentage of Mary through Nathan. The marriage of Joseph made Jesus the adopted son and legal heir of Joseph. Therefore in the Lord Jesus the royal line of David ceases, and there is no other King of Israel—". . . who shall declare His generation? for He was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of My people was He stricken" (Isaiah 53:8). Dying thus, without generation, He carried the title away with Him. It is a very striking thing to notice that constantly in our Lord's lifetime, and during His ministry, He is designated "the Son of David". Blind Bartimaeus, outside the City of Jerusalem, addresses Him as "the Son of David". On Palm Sunday, as recorded in St. Matthew 21:4, 5, 8 and 9, we read of the triumphal entry: "All this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, Tell ye the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass. . . . And a very great multitude spread their garments in the way; others cut down branches from the trees and strawed them in the way. And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David; Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest".

It is most important to realize that the claim of Jesus to be the Heir of David was known in Jerusalem to be absolutely without a flaw; all acknowledged it; it was not even challenged by the priests who accused Him. They would certainly have done so if it were possible, for up to Christ's death all the Genealogical Tables of the descendants of David were kept in the Temple, and were easily accessible to the people; unfortunately, they are generally thought to have been destroyed with the destruction of Jerusalem and the burning of the Temple in A. D. 70. "The King of the Jews" is, therefore, no empty title. "He came unto His own, and His own received Him not." He proved His title, but He could not take the Throne, and from that day to this He is a rejected King; on the rejection of their Messiah and King the Jewish race were sentenced to partial blindness, and that is their condition to this day. "Having eyes they see not, and ears they hear not." But a day is predicted when this "blindness" is to cease, and their eyes are to be opened, and they are to "look unto Him Whom they have pierced." Then, and not till then, Israel will enter into the fulness of their promised blessing. Then David's Throne and Kingdom will be established.

When is David's Throne to be Set up and His Kingdom to be Established?

The Bible is very clear on this matter; there are especially three sure signs as to the time when God's oath to David is to be literally fulfilled.

(1) The Lord Jesus Christ, David's greater Son, is to come at a period of grave unrest in the world.

In Daniel 2 and 7, we are forewarned that in the last days before the Second Advent of Christ, the whole world is to be in a state of turmoil. These two chapters give us the cause of that turmoil.

In Daniel 2, we have a vision of a great image, foreshadowing the great world-empires of Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome, consisting of gold, silver, brass and iron. The metals in each case from the head to the feet deteriorate in value, but increase in power. Golden Babylon stood for absolute autocracy, the Persian silver, for a limited monarchy, the Grecian brass for a more limited monarchy of military governorship; and on the standard of iron Rome were painted the letters S. P. Q. R. (the initial letters of "The Senate and the Roman People"). That is to say in the last Gentile power the people were associated with government; but special attention is drawn to the toes and feet, which were of iron and burnt clay mixed. The iron representing the strong rule of monarchical authority, the clay representing the uncertain rule of the people. What is more fickle than "Vox Populi"? and what is more brittle than burnt clay?

Daniel 2:43-44.

> And whereas thou savest iron mixed with miry clay they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men, but they shall not cleave one to another even as iron is not mixed with clay. And in the days of these kings, shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces all these kingdoms and it shall stand for ever.

Here is a distinct prediction that when these two elements of government are manifest amongst the nations of the earth, we are to expect the setting up of the Kingdom which shall never be destroyed.

In the light of these revelations we cannot but be profoundly stirred as we see the political developments throughout Europe and America. On all sides we see the development of the clay principles and non-Christian thinking men are frankly puzzled and filled with anxiety as to what the future may bring: but the Christian who believes his Bible knows that "these things must come to pass that the Scriptures might be fulfilled" and are sure indications that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh".

(2) The Return of the JEWS to Palestine.

The second great sign that the coming of the Lord, and the fulfilling of God's oath to David is about to come to pass, is the remarkable restoration of the Jews to Palestine, and Palestine to the Jews.

A few years ago only the ardent student of prophecy believed in the possibility of the Jews being restored to Palestine; the man of the world could not foresee the remarkable developments that have proceeded apace since the end of the war, as a result of the victorious Allies giving facilities to the Jews to go back to their land. But the prophetic Scriptures throughout the whole of the Old Testament predict that Gentile nations would restore the Jews to their land, as a result of the overruling providence of God. For example Isaiah 11:11-12:

> And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set His hand again the second time to recover the remnant of His people which shall be left . . .
> Verse 12.—And He shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth.

Isaiah 49:22:

> Thus said the Lord God behold I will lift up My hand to the Gentiles . . . and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders.

Isaiah 66:20:

> And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations.
> The Lord will have mercy on Jacob and will choose Israel and set them in their own land, and the people (the Gentile nations) shall take them and bring them to their place.

This second sign is being literally fulfilled before our very eyes.

(3) The third sign is as yet unfulfilled, viz., There is to be a great war in Palestine, and the cause of this war is to be the restoration of the Jews to their land.

The details of that war are to be found in Ezekiel 38 and 39. But in Zechariah 14:1-9 we are told that David's greater Son is coming to this earth when:

> Verse 1.—All nations shall be gathered together to Jerusalem to battle.
> Verse 3.—Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations.
> Verse 4.—And His feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives.
> Verse 9.—And the Lord shall be King over all the earth.

From these passages we deduct that this old world is tired and worn out, the Devil for six thousand years or more has held sway over the sons of men; but at the coming of David's greater Son the Devil is to be dethroned and "the god of this age" is to be cast down and bound for a thousand years, and thus the cause of all heart's distress, misery, pain and sickness will be dealt with, and the New Age will be inaugurated: there will then be peace on earth and goodwill among men. Then David's greater Son will reign from Jerusalem, and Abraham's seed, the Jewish race, will be "a blessing in the midst of the earth".

The British Mandate and the L. J. S.

In the meanwhile God has overruled, and given Great Britain a tremendous honour, responsibility and privilege. Let us therefore see to it that while there is time and opportunity that there are sent to the land of Palestine, the very best missionaries the Church of God can produce, that in the city of Jerusalem, and throughout the whole country of Palestine, there may be the very best equipped missionaries and mission stations for preparing the way for the coming of the Lord.

The L. J. S. has been raised up by God to do a great preparation work in many respects like that of John the Baptist of old, to prepare the way for the coming of the King.

May we therefore see that the Society is neither lacking for prayer, men, or means in these difficult though glorious days.

THE ABUSE OF LENT.

(The following from Light and Life by A. Corbett, gives much food for thought and ought to lead to earnest heart-searching in the all too prevailing manner of keeping Lent. —Editor.)

To the regenerate Christian every day is Lent. Jesus sharply rebuked the Jews of His day, for their religious performances which were merely superficial and formalistic. St. Paul also denounced such in vigorous language; writing to the Galatian Church, he says: "Ye observe days and months, and seasons, and years; I am afraid of you lest by any means I have bestowed upon you labor in vain" (Epis. Galatians 55:10, 11). Writing to the Colossian Church, he says: "Let no man judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of a feast day, or a new moon, or a Sabbath day; which are a shadow of things to come" (Epis. Colossians 2:16). It was only when the Church began to degenerate and become immersed in worldliness about the early Fifth Century, that the parsons devised Lent so as to make amends (in their own way), for their past worship of the world and the flesh. The same idea still exists, Church members go to church and inform the Lord that they are "turning to Him with "weeping, fasting and prayer", and then at the same time be longing for the Easter Monday dance and general revelry till the next year again brings its Lent. But as St. Paul says in the Holy Spirit: "It is not the children of the flesh (the earthly minded) who are the children of God" (Epis. Romans 55: 8). Or, as the Rev. Dr. Edersheim states: "So true is it that all attempts at penitence . . . without the Holy Spirit, and regeneration; only tend to entangle man in the snare of self-deception, and fill him with spiritual pride, and still farther increase his alienation from God." But there is still a much more solemn thought. Does it not rather seem a wicked, arrogant, audacious mockery to attempt, or pretend to fast in imitation of Christ's fasting and satanic temptation? To us it seems a satanic intrusion into that awful agony; which the Lord alone endured on behalf of the human race. It is suggestive and instructive, that on the occasion of Christ's sufferings in connection with His sacrificial work He was alone, unseen by human eye; for instance, in the desert during temptation (Mark 1:12); during His prayer in Gethsemane (Matthew 26:35, 36); during His crucifixion (Matthew 27:45).

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart."—Psalm 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by Canon G. Osborne Troop, of Toronto, Canada:

> "And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me."

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

DR. McCRADY ANSWERS MR. ANDERSON.

Mr. Editor:

In your issue of March 10, there appears a letter from Mr. J. Randolph Anderson, criticising my recent article on "Revision and (not "of"—typographical error) the Thirty-Nine Articles; for the injustice done the Prayer Book Commission in connecting them with the proposal to remove the Thirty-Nine Articles from our formularies. I am not aware that I made any such specific charge against the Commission as such, and certainly did not intend doing so, although it is perfectly true that I did say (and now repeat the statement) that the Commission has undoubtedly disregarded the instruction given it in the Resolution of 1913 in reporting a number of matters distinctly involving the doctrinal position of this Church, while the Convention has likewise ignored the provisions of its own Resolution, both (a) in receiving such recommendations of the Commission respecting doctrinal alterations, and (b) in further allowing the consideration of a proposal to remove the Thirty-Nine Articles—a body of official declarations containing nothing but matters of "Faith and Doctrine". I have no intention in the world of charging the Commission itself with more than their share of responsibility in this matter, and if the passage (P. 39) in which I refer to the inconsistencies of both the Commission and the Convention may be somewhat ambiguous in its wording, so that in charging the latter with this particular matter of the Thirty-Nine Articles, I may seem also to have included the former, I cheerfully disavow any such intention. Indeed, I have no need of making such a charge, as I consider the position of the Commission vulnerable enough without charging them further with this additional offense. In short, unless Mr. Anderson is prepared to prove that the Commission, itself, has not recommended any proposals involving the doctrinal teaching of this Church; has not, for example, recommended the many Romanizing alterations proposed for the Communion Office; has not recommended the adoption of a Collect for use at Mortuary Celebrations; has not recommended various prayers for the dead, containing allusions to doctrines specifically condemned by this Church—to say nothing of other matters—it is perfectly clear that my charge is in accord with the facts, and his effort to excuse the Commission cannot be logically justified.

Nor can I see the logic of his further attempt to justify the action of the Convention in disregarding its own Resolution relating to the present Revision. To say that there is nothing "Sacro-Sanct" about the Resolution of 1913; that its adoption "has no binding effect upon the Convention itself", and yet, in the same breath to affirm that it is useless to attack the legality of any of the Commission's proposals "passed on by the Convention" for the reason that "what the Convention has adopted it has adopted", is, to say the least, a little surprising. Did not the Convention also adopt the Resolution of 1913? If so—how can it now be disregarded? "What the Convention has adopted it has adopted!" This kind of argument will not do. There is no gainsaying the fact that the Convention adopted the Resolution of 1913; that that Resolution related to this very Revision now under discussion; that the Resolution has never at any time been formally revoked; or any other Resolution substituted in its stead; and that consequently that Resolution was and is the Resolution under which the present Revision must be carried out if it is to be carried out legally, consistently, and in accordance with Parliamentary Law and Procedure. If the provisions of that Resolution with respect to this Revision are not binding upon the Convention—and if all its solemn assurances adopted at one Session can be as solemnly ignored at the next without even a motion offered for reconsideration, or a word of comment or of explanation given to the Church at large—why, what may not Conventions do? Is it possible that the word of an individual is sacred, but that of a Convention is not? Is a Resolution of the Convention—especially one of so serious a character as the present—a mere scrap of paper? This is not a personal matter, and I have no desire in the world to offend any member either of the Commission or of the Convention (many of whom are intimate friends), but such sweeping alterations in the worship and doctrinal position of this Church as are involved in this Revision are matters of too fundamental and sacred a character to be thus lightly disposed; and whatever the feelings of these gentlemen may be, it must not be forgotten that there are numbers of others in the Church who look with dismay upon this procedure, and whose feelings are entitled to just as much consideration as their own.

WILL THE VIRGINIA SEMINARY REPLY.

Mr. Editor:

As an active worker in the Church, the writer supposes that his right to publicly express his interest in the faith and teachings of the Church may not be questioned. As one whose work has required him to visit many states in the past few years and who, during these visits, has kept in close touch with many Churchmen, both lay and clerical, he further supposes that his observations may not be entirely discounted.

The doctrinal status of our seminaries is everybody's business. The teaching of the Virginia Seminary has been challenged—challenged openly and sincerely. There is no doubt about that. Not on a few occasions, but upon many occasions, the writer, during the past four years, has heard apologies, regrets, and indignations, expressed because of the Seminary's apparent instability and general lack of conviction as to fundamental truth. These expressions have come from both clerical and lay sources; and in several important instances they have come from eminent clergymen—men who are universally recognized as scholars and leaders. Furthermore in almost every instance, they have come from men who love and honor the Seminary. All this has a point, because it indicates that the criticisms were not from popular, idle or vindictive sources; nor were they based upon superficial considerations. They were from men who loved the Church, who understood her doctrines; and who, in troubled times, yearned for a higher loyalty to the Church and her teachings than was emanating from the beloved "Seminary on the Hill".

We asked a certain clergyman, an alumnus of the Seminary (an examining chaplain of a certain diocese) why he did not protest certain Old Testament comments which were contained in the notebook of a senior (this senior had accepted the destructive criticisms as Gospel truth, and was surprised to learn that competent scholarship questioned them). This clergyman's reply was illuminating: "I love the Seminary, and I am living in hope that this sort of criticism is but a passing wave and that a conservative balance will presently prevail, I am afraid that my public protest will injure the hallowed place I love." He went on to state that the question presented further difficulties because the Seminary was not openly admitting any change in its doctrinal attitude. Friendly criticism or discussion was therefore impossible.

Another prominent Churchman said to the writer that when he raised the question of the Seminary's teaching to a member of the faculty, that member's attitude was one of "aloofness", and rather indicated that the faculty would regard as presumptious any questions as to its orthodoxy. The professor's attitude may have been misinterpreted. We hope so. Any Christian teacher should be glad of an opportunity to proclaim his full allegiance to the faith he is employed to teach. It is inconceivable that the Seminary faculty should hide behind such specious utterances as, "We are simply keeping in touch with modern scholarship", or, "The Seminary has always been sound, so please assume that there has been no change in our teaching".

The laity are interested to know what the Seminary is, in fact, teaching. Has the Virginia Seminary unqualifiedly embraced such theological teachings as emanate from Union Seminary, New York? Has it uncompromisingly cast off the doctrines for which it was founded to teach? Has the Virginia Seminary become incapable of producing men who believe in the Virgin Birth, the true Deity of Our Lord, the Atoning Sacrifice of Jesus? Does the Virginia Seminary take the position that it is not its business to produce such men?

CRY FOR HELP.

Mr. Editor:

It is with deep thanksgiving to Almighty God that I am reading your article on "The Falsity of the Theory of Evolution" and modernism.

May I submit to you this letter for publication?

You in the South are standing so true to God and His Word that I send out to you a cry for help that all who love the Lord Jesus Christ may rally in real prayer warfare for us in the North and the West, where the enemy of our souls is making such havoc in the lives of our youth, and particularly the college youth of our nation.

The darkness of heathen lands is, I venture to say, hardly as dark as are some of the conditions in this supposedly Christian nation, where many of our young people do not have the opportunity to hear the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The large majority of them are being taught another Gospel with disastrous results in the lowering of their moral standards.

Some of us who have seen the destination of the modern trend have for several years given ourselves to earnest intercession. The cry of His people has been heard, and a man called of God has been sent by Him to bring our youth out of this gross darkness of despair into the glorious liberty of the children of God. His name is Arthur I. Brown, M. D., C. M., F. R. C. S. E., a Scientist and Scholar of more than national distinction.

Dr. Brown has made a special experimental study of evolution for many years, and has worked under Sir Arthur Keith of London, England, one of the world's greatest authorities on Anthropology, and a recognized leader among evolutionists. Therefore, Dr. Brown knows all the arguments of evolution from this first-hand association with eminent believers in the theory. He has made a prolonged study of Embryology, and written extensively. Even his opponents write: "I do not know any man in America better able than you to discuss the question of evolution."

He is meeting the students and scholars on their own scientific ground and is proving scientifically that the Word of God, scientifically tested, is what it claims to be; and that evolution, Satan's most potent and effective weapon in destroying the Christian faith, is absolutely unreasonable, unscriptural and unscientific.

Wherever he has spoken, scores of young men and women have been saved from sin and despair, as they have become convinced of the truth of God's Word, which liveth and abideth forever, and are brought to love the Lord Jesus Christ, the Living Word, Whom to know is LIFE Eternal.

The doors of our Universities are not open to this eminent Scientist because he believes God's Word about Creation!

One of the professors of a great University said: "It is absolutely impossible to get even a Christian notice posted on the University Bulletin Board. In an institution that purports to be scientific, one would think that ordinary fair-mindedness would demand that the students be allowed to hear both sides of the evolutionary theory, but no matter how great his learning and honors, no one who does not subscribe to evolution is given a hearing. The pagans are in control". Jesus Christ is not wanted.

What about the Churches?

Many of the pulpits are no longer determined to know nothing save Jesus Christ and Him crucified. They are preaching a Gospel of social uplift (self development), of Christian service (self works). The evolutionary barrage has obscured their vision of Him who hath redeemed us unto God by His precious blood.

The Son of Man hath nowhere to lay His head!

Professors and Ministers, some of whom want to stand for the truth of God's Word, have confessed that they dare not come out boldly against evolution, lest they lose their positions.

> The Son of Man is still betrayed for thirty pieces of silver!
> The offense of the Cross has not ceased!

In the South where Dr. Brown was asked to revise the text books on Elementary Biology for the State of Florida, many doors are open to him, but like a true soldier of Jesus Christ, he feels that he is sent to the firing line where the need is acute. It means real persecution and privation, but he counts all things but loss—his large surgical practice and income, worldly honors and comforts—that he may be obedient to the Call of God to use his great talents for this cause. There is no man on this continent as qualified as he to meet its challenge.

With the Bible in one hand, the book of Nature in the other, he is able to explain the marvels of God's Universe in a way that is of absorbing interest to both young and old. Out of his great fund of knowledge, he clarifies with scientific fact the things which many persons have puzzled over for a life time. As the plan of the great Creator of heaven and earth is made plain in His Book, one draws near with holy awe compelled by His everlasting love, until the face of Jesus Christ is revealed and we behold the Living Word, and with joy draw near to Him, crying: "My Lord, and my God."

This excerpt from a letter by one of the students shows what God is doing in the hearts of young people who hear Dr. Brown's message:

"Have you ever been in the place where belief in the Bible was impossible and you even doubted the existence of a God? If you have you can realize the position of a large percentage of the youth of our land . . . the high school, college and university youth who have been swept off their feet by the false teachings of today.

"I was reared in a Christian home with the average church and Sunday-school training, but I did not know God and when I entered college I was swept off my feet completely by the teachings of science and philosophy. And I was not unique in this experience. Of all the young people in my little circle (graduate students in a great university) practically all are avowed atheists and not one believes the Bible. And the tragedy in their lives is appalling. Many times we have gathered together around the fire in the evening and during our discussions of science and philosophy come back again and again to the realization of the futility of Life—how pointless and without purpose it was to us. For how can there be a Purpose without a God?

"Some of these young people, my friends, have stood and are standing now on the verge of suicide, all because they have no faith or belief in God or a Hereafter to hold them steady. When evolution comes in the Bible goes out and with it Jesus Christ and all hope for the future.

"If ever a class of young people needed God, it is the college youth of today. And they are so hard to reach. They have scientific minds and it must be proved to them scientifically that there is a God and that the Bible is His Word. But so few are qualified to give this proof. And the avenues of approach are limited.

"Four weeks ago I heard Dr. Arthur I. Brown lecture on the Word of God. No one could have been in a more rebellious, critical, or unbelieving frame of mind than I, but I came away fully convinced that there was a God and that the Bible was His Word. As the mental barriers were broken down, God put such conviction on my heart I could not sleep or rest at all until with my heart I believed unto salvation and accepted the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ which cleanses from all sin. Oh! the joy and peace and hope this has brought into my life! But with it has come a great burden for all these friends of mine who do not believe—who laugh at the Bible and deny God's very existence. And behind them all is the university youth of which they are only a part. Surely they are worth saving and they are worth a sacrifice if necessary that they may be saved. It is with them in mind that I will write this letter to tell my experience, with the prayer that it will perhaps awaken others to the great need around us and to plead that those of us who have the joy of the Lord in our hearts may stand back of Dr . Brown in his work. God is using him mightily to reach these young people who have been uprooted by the teachings of today. He is a scientist of more than national reputation and he speaks their language and knows the approach to their hearts and minds. I must remember that if I had not heard his message I would still be wandering in the maze of atheism and unbelief.

"How I pray that we may not be lukewarm, but may give of the best that we have to the Master."

Through newspaper articles and meetings in public halls, a large number of students who never enter a Church could be reached, but it takes a large golden key to open these doors.

Do you not want to have a share in this heroic warfare by praying that hearts may be moved by the godless condition of thousands of our young people and that God in His loving bounty may provide the golden key to open a door for Dr. Brown, which no man can shut?

In the fellowship of the Lord Jesus Christ, I am,

Faithfully yours in Him,

Grace W. Kellogg.

WHY SHOULD THE ARTICLES BE OMITTED?

Mr. Editor:

In The Southern Churchman of March 17, Mr. Frederic C. Morehouse stated that he introduced the resolution at the Triennial Convention at New Orleans to remove the Thirty-Nine Articles from the official formularies of the Church, but that the resolution does not propose either the repeal or repudiation of the Articles, but simply that they be omitted from the Prayer Book, and that as a publisher, he would see to it that they should be kept in print.

Why should the Articles be omitted from the Prayer Book? What can be the object of omitting them from the Prayer Book and incur the added expense of printing them elsewhere?

The very fact that the next paragraph of Mr. Morehouse's letter states that the language is old or obsolete and the Articles misleading or misunderstood and their teaching value today is almost nil shows clearly what is intended ultimately.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America exists today because of the promulgation of the Thirty-Nine Articles. They are not only historical, but represent a protest against the manner of living, Ceremonies and Faith of the Roman Church and a great spiritual urge to regain something of the beauty and simplicity of the Primitive Christian Church.

Can Mr. Morehouse, as a Communicant of the Church, that lives today, by reason of the existence and perpetuation of the Thirty-Nine Articles, say: that Articles 8, 19, 20, 22, 25, 28, 30, 31 and 32 contain no teaching?

Let laymen and clergymen, too, read them. Article XX states it is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written.

XXV. There are two Sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, i. e.: Baptism and the Supper of the Lord, not five.

XXXVIII. Transubstantiation in the Lord's Supper cannot be proved by Holy Writ, is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of the Sacrament, etc.

Now, I ask, Mr. Editor, do these articles contain any teaching or not?

Are they written in language that cannot be understood? Are they (these numbered) written in long and involved sentences?

Then, why should there be objection to the fact that the Articles are "established" by the bishops, the clergy and laity?

The Church is itself Established and the Articles that gave Her new life should and must ever remain Established, and in the Book of Common Prayer forming a part thereof.

Had the clergy and laity remained faithful and true to the simple statements set forth in the Articles enumerated here, there would be today unity, brotherly love and affection, not bickerings, misunderstandings, and even talk of division.

Five great men made this nation. They were son's of the Episcopal Church, God forbid that the Church of Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison and Marshall shall ever be other than the Church of the Reformation, seeking in the beauty of Holiness to worship God with reverence and simplicity, unfettered by ecclesiastical ceremonialism.

A BLOW FOR THE SEMINARY.

Mr. Editor:

The New York Churchman has hit the Alexandria Seminary a tremendous blow. The Seminary should protest.

In a recent issue, after berating the Editor of The Southern Churchman, it places its stamp of approval upon Henry Sloane Coffin (recent lecturer, by special invitation, at the Seminary), and indicates that this man is beyond all reasonable criticism.

Every one knows that the New York Churchman is openly, bitterly, and uncompromisingly Modernistic. Now the Editor indicates that Coffin is a man after his own heart—theologically, of course.

What a blow the New York Churchman has aimed at the Seminary! What can we make of it? An out and out Modernist officially, through his sheet, approving the Alexandria's Seminary's course.

Shades of dear old Dr. Nelson!

Book Reviews

THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER: By the Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D. The Paragon Press, Montgomery, Ala. Price 50c.

The fruit of a life-long, devoted study is offered to the Church by the Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., of Alabama, in his new volume, entitled, The Book of Common Prayer, fresh from the press. It is the tihrd volume of the Bishop's course of instruction, The Church School in the Book of Common Prayer, of which the first two grades were issued a few months ago. However, it has a value quite apart from this fact; for in the small compass of one hundred and twenty-five pages it contains the gist of the author's broad knowledge of his subject.

The Prayer Book of 1892 is used as a basis; at the end of each chapter is an addenda noting the changes in the revision of 1925 and their significance.

The system of questions and answers is used throughout, interspersed with explanatory notes. But one is reminded that, "It takes a wise man to ask a question". The answers given are clear, concise, and often epigrammatical.

The arrangement and sequence of the services, and each part of every service, are clearly set forth. The aim of the author is to help win the student to a glad attendance upon the worship of the Church, and arouse a deeper appreciation of our priceless heritage.

No child should be allowed to graduate from our Church School without the advantage of this course on the Prayer Book. It is especially adapted for the instruction of those who are preparing for Confirmation.

A review of this work impresses one with the rich store of information that lies behind, like the pent-up waters of a mighty stream, and creates the wish that Bishop Beckwith might give to the Church the benefit of his research and understanding in a work of larger scope.

The Great Commission

GROUND BROKEN FOR NEW ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL.

The first spade full of earth in the construction of the new $3,000,000 St. Luke's International Hospital was turned at the site of the new institution in the Tsukiji District.

Eleven members of the clergy of the dioceses of Tokyo and Tohoku directed by Chaplains Hakeda of the hospital, and led by Bishop Reifsnieder, participated in the ceremonies. In a long front-page story emphasizing the significance of the event, the Japan Advertiser said: "The clergymen took their places upon one side of the selected spot for the ground-breaking, while those who followed, including Tsunoske Igarashi, representing Shimidzu Gumi, stood on the opposite side. The Bishop's cross was held over the group at one end, while the flags of America and Japan were draped about. A passage was read from the Psalms and a hymn sung as the service began, a portable organ accompanying the voices of the group. Then with a few words from Bishop Reifsnider, Dr. Obata stepped forward and turned the first spadeful of earth. There was no sound except the swish of wet winds outside and the drip of water off the edges of the tent for several moments as Dr. Teusler and Dr. Kubo turned a shovel of earth next in turn, followed by Bishop Reisnider and members of the clergy. Prayer, another hymn, the national air of Japan, and a closing benediction by the Rev. P. D. Yamagata, Chaplain of St. Paul's University, who took the place of the Rt. Rev. Motoda, Bishop of Tokyo, concluded the ceremony. The Rev. James Chappell, rector of Holy Trinity Church, was the only other foreigner taking an immediate part in the exercises. Dr. Kobayaski, principal of St. Margaret's School, read the lesson.

After the religious ceremony was over, about three hundred guests attended a luncheon at which Dr. Teusler presided.

In a short address Dr. Teusler recalled that nearly five years ago the plans for the new hospital were under consideration. The earthquake wiped out not only the old hospital, but all contracts for the new, and since then efforts had been made to broaden the whole scope of the scheme so that it might give Tokyo a medical center as well as a hospital.

The new hospital, said Dr. Teusler, would cost about Y4,500,000 by the time it was completed, including equipment, and if the land were included, its value would be between nine and ten million yen. He referred in terms of warm appreciation to the support which the work had received during its existence from leading Japanese citizens and said the fact that so large a Japanese audience had attended these ceremonies in a downfall of sleet was proof that the promoters of the scheme were on the right road. Although Tokyo had many big hospitals, in the ward of Kyobashi where they were situated, there was no big hospital and one was needed.

Representing Viscount Shibusawa, Dr. Kyugror Obata addressed the luncheon which followed the religious ceremonies at the hospital site. Dr. Obata said in part: "In studying what St. Luke's International Hospital has so far achieved, I am again surprised by noticing a very similar kind of progress which the institution has made within a quarter of century. It has accomplished a marvel. In the beginning, the hospital was directed by only two physicians, Doctors Teusler and Kubo, and one trained nurse, Miss Araki. It occupied a one and a half story building, with accommodations for about twelve patients, on a piece of land covering about four hundred tsubo, but today it has thirty-eight physicians, and two hundred and seventy-two workers in all. It now owns over 13,000 tsubo. The present barrack hospital has the capacity to accommodate almost two hundred beds. There is a dispensary service with about fifteen major departments, prepared to take care of as many as four or five hundred patients daily.

"In addition there is a department for public health work, cooperating with the city in a maternity ward, a ward for foundling children, and there is a school of nursing recently recognized as a Semmon Gakko, by the Ministry of Education, with living quarters and dormitory space.

"The new hospital building itself will cost Y2,000,000; being the first units of a hospital which will cost ultimately Y5,000,000 when completed. It will contain beds for two hundred and fifty patients, together with a greatly amplified dispensary service and a thoroughly modern school of nursing for the training of one hundred and fifty young women in this profession.

"This is indeed a red-letter day for the history of St. Luke's International Hospital, and a great credit is due first to the statesmanship of Dr. Teusler, the Director of the Institution, and then to the unstinted support given by the far-sighted and broad-minded leaders of the Protestant Episcopal Church, both of America and Japan. My admiration for Dr. Teusler and his colleagues is all the more intensified when I am reminded of the trials and rebuffs through which they came out victorious. The earthquake and fire of 1923 wiped out almost all the machinery of the hospital. It was compelled to operate in tents for a few months. By the following spring, a barrack hospital was completed, at a cost of about Y300,000. This hospital was again attacked by fire and two-thirds of it destroyed, but again a new building rose out of the ashes.

"Dr. Teusler's profound appreciation of the Imperial gift of Y50,000 some years ago and his selection of Kigensetsu for the inauguration of the new hospital are an exquisite testimony to his true understanding of the most delicate side of Japanese psychology. In other words, Dr. Teusler is a foreigner who is truly assimilated into the Japanese life. This kind of assimilation, with his capacity for large affairs is a secret which assures him of his success in his magnificent enterprise."

CHINA BULLETIN NUMBER 54.

To the Members of the China Mission Staff in the United States and To the Friends and Relatives of the Missionaries in China:

Bishop Sanford and I spent six absorbingly interesting weeks in China during November and December. After a month's absence in Japan, we passed through Shanghai again on January 16 en route to Manila.

Most of our time in China was spent in the cities of Shanghai and Hankow. We succeeded, however, in making visits to Soochow and Nanking, Wuhu, Kiukiang, Wuchang. It was a great regret to be obliged to pass Anking as we steamed up and down the Yangtze. Boats are stopping irregularly and intercourse between the city and the outside world is limited.

We found all of the members of the mission staff who are remaining in China concentrated in Shanghai and Hankow. Up to December 10 it did not seem wise and in most cases it was impossible for foreigners to live in any other cities.

We learned in Shanghai that Bishop Huntington and Mr. and Mrs. Lanphear have returned to take up residence in Wuhu. The Rev. L. R. Craighill is making a visit to Nanchang. The Rev. Francis Cox and Mrs. Stranding make regular visits to Soochow. The Rev. John Magee goes occasionally to Nanking. Visits have also been paid to Zangzok, Wusih and Yangchow. In these three places our property is in the control of the military.

Bishop Gilman, Mr. Coe and the Rev. R. E. Wood are living in Wuchang, but it has not yet seemed wise for Dr. James to move over there, although she makes regular and frequent visits to the hospital. Bishop Roots, accompanied by Deaconess Clark and Miss Lustgarten, visited Shasi and Ichang, leaving Hankow on December 15, and returning January 8. A week was spent in each place. In Ichang on Christmas Day, services were held in the midst of some disturbances and anti-Christian feeling, but the services were not interfered with and some twenty-five were confirmed. The Huntington School and the residence of the Rev. F. C. Howe are both being occupied by the military. The deaconesses' residence is not occupied. So far as it was possible to ascertain the deaconesses have not lost any of their possessions and Mr. Howe's things are reported to be more or less intact.

In Shasi the residences occupied by the Sisters of St. Anne and Miss Lustgarten are now in control of the Szochuan troops. After eleven different occupations the residences are said to be in a damaged condition and the American staff have lost all of their household and personal possessions through looting. In Shasi on New Years' Day Bishop Roots confirmed four women.

All o fthe members of the mission staff whom we have had the pleasure of meeting are well and confident that eventually the will of God will be accomplished. This does not mean that the present outlook can honestly be described as hopeful. In spite of or because of the recent drastic action in driving out the Red Russians, there seems to be a spirit of anarchy abroad in a relatively small section of the community. Communism, either politically or economically, has little hold on the Chinese people. Nevertheless, in the judgment of those best informed the so-called red menace is by no means ended.

None of our middle schools or colleges are open at the present time. In some instances so-called tutorial schools have been organized by the Chinese. Our primary schools are going on with a fair degree of success largely under Chinese management.

St. Luke's and St. Elizabeth's Hospitals in Shanghai and the Church General Hospital in Wuchang are open and carrying on as usual. Our hospitals in Zangzok, Wusih and Anking are closed. St. James' Hospital in Anking, according to reports reaching us, has been badly looted and damaged.

The most hopeful feature of the whole situation is the fine way in which most of the Chinese clergy and congregations have been carrying on in spite o fenormous difficulties and sometimes in the face of serious opposition. All the Bishops feel much cheered by this fact. It indicates that the Chung Hua Sheng Huei has a real place in Chinese life.

"I Was in Prison and Ye Came Unto Me."

A little leaflet entitled The Prison Evangel, is issued periodically by The Vincent J. Steffan Prison Association (Incorporated), and gives a brief summary of the Association's activities. We quote from the most recent bulletin:

Volumes might be written were we to follow the footsteps of our Prison Evangelist in and out of the various prisons, but in the final analysis, we can but sum up with those immortal words, "That they also might obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory" (2 Timothy 2:10), with its accompanying cheer and inspiration for good citizenship. In fact, the blessing of God has been so manifest upon our Brother Steffan's continuous round of visitation that it would seem as unduly appropriating to the credit of man, that which was the Holy Spirit's own work within the prison walls.

Our "fellow-heipers" will be interested to know, however, that Mr. Steffan's ministry has ranged from the individual prisoner in the silent cell to as many as 3,600 prisoners assembled at one time. Could there be a greater privilege to thus proclaim, as "a voice in the wilderness", the glad tidings to those "without Christ and without hope".

It is not possible for all to engage in this form of Christian service, but it is possible for any one to have a share in intercession and by gifts, however small, and through which this service is alone maintained.

We will be glad to mail these periodical reports freely to all who register their name with us, so that they may follow our Prison Evangelist in his journeys. Communications may be addressed to the Association Office, 804 Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, Pa., and checks made payable to the Treasurer, Mr. Chas. W. Emery.

Of the 3,430 manifested decisions, each individual was supplied with a Gospel of John or a New Testament. Several notorious characters were among those who it was ascertained were definitely "born again".

A record of Mr. Steffan's labor from July 1 to November 30, 1927, is shown below:

Mountain Workers' Conference, Reported by G. W. Barnes.

It is undoubtedly rash for a Northerner with only a small knowledge of the South, though much affection for it, to tell Southerners about a conference on Southern mountain work, but as a Northerner who had the privilege of attending the conference on March 19 and 20 at Knoxville, had the responsibility bestowed, it must be attempted. This is the sixth year that Episcopal Church workers, clergy and lay people, have gathered to discuss their common problems on the day preceding the interdenominational Conference of Southern Mountain Workers. Although the enrollment was only about twenty-five in all, those who came represented work in seven dioceses, Virginia and Southwestern Virginia, Tennessee, Lexington and Kentucky, Western North Carolina and Atlanta. The Rev. Dr. Carroll Davis and the Rev. F. J. Clark were there from the Church Missions House, and Miss Agnes Grabau from the Tennessee Diocesan Church Mission of Help.

St. John's Church and parish house were used for services and meetings, the rector, the Rev. Dr. W. C. Whitaker, and his people contributing much to the comfort of the visitors. At the opening service on Monday night, Dr. Davis outlined the present situation in the Church's mission work at home and overseas. After the early celebration, Tuesday morning was occupied by reports from the workers, and the afternoon by a discussion of their common problems. Miss Grabau described the Church Mission of Help, especially in its effort to reach out from the diocesan headquarters in Memphis to the rural sections, to do preventive work, a matter of interest to mountain workers whose districts are mostly "superrural". She also reminded the conference that the National Church Mission of Help office is glad to advise in dioceses where its work is not organized.

The Rev. John N. Atkins, of Sewanee, called attention to the special opportunity for mountain girls in the training school for nurses at the Emerald Hodgson Hospital, Sewanee, where he is superintendent.

Mrs. Campbell of the John C. Campbell Folk School, Brasstown, N. C., told of the progress in the second year of that unique school which, following the lines of Danish Folk Schools, is experimenting to find ways of inspiring the less ambitious uneducated members in undeveloped communities. A farmers' union, a credit union and a cooperative hatchery are already achieved. One of the brilliant features of the past year was the lending of the school's Danish gymnast to a Presbyterian school for a month in order to obtain, in exchange, a month's services of the public health nurse. The nurse aroused great interest; the men of the place came to her lectures and wanted to be weighed and advised about their food. She inadvertently suggested to a somewhat inactive and unambitious citizen that as he was underweight he probably ought to "rest more", after which he did nothing else.

A committee of the Church Conference is to investigate new markets for the handicraft products of the Church's missions; and another committee is to prepare a long-wanted directory of the mountain work and workers. Information for it should be sent promptly to the Rev. John N. Atkins, Sewanee, Tenn.

Tell who and where and what you are.

Most of the people present at the conference are known to readers of The Southern Churchman. Among them were Archdeacon Neve, with his forty years of service to the mountain people; Mrs. Eva D. Barrett of St. Paul's Mission, Glen Alpine, N. C., twenty years in the work; Miss Ora Harrison of St. John's in the Mountains, Endicott, Va., with eighteen years' experience. With her was an English nurse, Miss Barlow, provided for the mission by a Northern friend; Miss Barlow, who has been in this country only a few months, rides for miles around in all weathers, rendering service in little crowded homes where conditions are appalling. Miss Isabel Graves of Valle Crucis, Mr. Ralph Morgan of Penland, and the Rev. and Mrs. H. A. Dobbin, of Legerwood, came from Western North Carolina; the Rev. E. W. Hughes from Graham, Va.; from Tennessee, besides Mr. Atkins, Mrs. F. C. MacDonald of Sewanee, Miss Shepherd teaching this year in a Congregational school, Pleasant Hill Academy, and Archdeacon Geiger of East Tennessee.

Mr. Geiger brought one of the most encouraging and at the same time appealing stories, of Church work in many small towns. One man cannot do half the work that should and could be done, and the opportunities are constantly growing, new people are moving into the section, Church families among them. It is more than Mr. Geiger can do simply to hunt them out and keep them in the care of the Church. A year ago he spent a whole day in Elizabethtown looking for one communicant he had heard lived there. That one he never found, but today, a year later, there are thirty Episcopal Church families living there. He has more stories quite as striking. The need for more resident priests is very evident.

In the Diocese of Lexington, the Rev. C. S. Lever, who has been working at Pikeville for little more than a year, had services at first in a band stand, now in a rented room up two flights of stairs, and is working hard for a church and social center. Fifteen hundred boys and girls in the county high school and grades are part of his responsibility. With a simple church and a meeting place where these young people and others could be reached, this could become a center of great influence. The people of the place have already raised part of the needed sum.

Deaconess Baker of Harlan, Ky., in a coal region densely populated, with twelve mines within five miles, is the only resident Episcopal Church worker, developing religion and community work, aided by the mine operators. The whole situation is one that cannot be suggested in these few words.

In the mountains of Northern Georgia, Miss Ann Carrington Davis, a Churchwoman, has for fourteen years been principal of the Tallulah Falls Industrial School, a unique institution in that it is owned and operated by the State Federation of Women's Clubs. Some eighteen years ago the summer visitors observed that there was no school for the children of the place, and the daughters of the visitors started one in the local jail. At first the mountain people opposed it and refused to buy their children books. The school now has ten buildings, twelve teachers, more than a hundred boarders, and day pupils from two adjoining counties.

It is evident that one cannot make general statements about work that is going on in such widely different communities, and that includes so many different varieties, education, social, physical, industrial, agricultural, religious. The general belief is that mountain work as such is not a special separate problem but that it shares the problems of other sunder privileged rural sections anywhere. One searching question that applies to every bit of mountain work is, what is the aim of this particular piece of work, and how is it meeting that aim for the good of the people concerned?

General Convention.

General Convention is only six months away! It meets in Washington, D. C., on October 10. Even the harrowing suspense of the national election will not eclipse the interest of this great Church event or hinder loyal Church people from following intelligently the important and far-reaching problems to be discussed. The Church papers will have authentic news and reports, and the best use will be made of whatever newspaper space is available. During the time of the Convention, radio will probably add its thousands, or even millions, to the number of listeners at the great general services.

Washington of course has its own charms and will attract more than the usual number of Convention visitors. The splendid Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, making good progress in its building, will be the most important point of pilgrimage, and its beautiful grounds will provide for a superb outdoor service. This is only the second time that General Convention has met in Washington. The other was in 1898, when Bishop John Williams of Connecticut was Presiding Bishop, Dr. Morgan Dix, President of the House of Deputies, and Bishop Tuttle, the preacher.

For the information of readers who have been confirmed since the last General Convention, it may not be amiss to explain that the Convention has two Houses; all the diocesan bishops and the missionary bishops are voting members of the House of Bishops; the House of Deputies has four clerical and four lay delegates from each diocese, and one clerical and one lay delegate from each missionary district, domestic and foreign. Bishop Murray is the Presiding Bishop. The President of the House of Deputies will be elected; Dr. Stires, who last held that office, has since become a bishop. Bishop Anderson of Chicago has been appointed to preach the General Convention sermon.

The final chapter, probably, of the present Prayer Book revision, important decisions in regard to the Church's program, maintenance budget and advance work budget for the new triennium, a new approach to the whole problem of advance work, renewed emphasis on evangelism throughout the Church, the situation in China, with the report of Bishop Sanford and Dr. Wood after their visit to our missions there, the election of a bishop for Wyoming—all these are among a great number of matters to be acted upon.

It will be impossible to house the entire Convention under one roof. The House of Bishops meets in the Hotel Willard and the general offices of the Convention will be there. The House of Deputies meets in Continental Hall. The Woman's Auxiliary, which holds its triennial meeting at the same time, will have its offices and sessions in the new Mayflower Hotel. Presentation of the women's United Thank Offering is always one of the great events, with a thrilling Church service.

All those very live and interesting men and women who are included under the thoroughly dull title, "Cooperating Agencies", with their own meetings and exhibits, will be there in alphabetical array—BSA, GFS, CMH, DK, CPC, SCI, ACIN, and those wardens of the future, NFEYP, together with lesser Guilds and Societies and Leaguers galore. The Church Periodical Club is doing a new thing in presenting its work in dramatic form; a number of delightful scenes have been assigned to various Washington parishes and are already in rehearsal.

For the time outside the sessions, it is planned to have fewer mass meetings and more study groups than in previous years, to give the maximum value for the time spent. The dominant tone will be missionary. Even if one attended no meetings, it would be no small experience to be present at this great gathering of bishops, clergy and lay leaders and delegates representing every part of the work of the Episcopal Church. Bishop Roots comes from far across the world in Liberia; Bishop Rowe comes down from the Arctic Circle and the Bishops from Brazil come up from below the equator. There are the bishops and delegates from all the Islands and Mexico, from all the missionary districts and dioceses in the States, and many Churchmen of national and international fame. Some one who has attended General Convention many times says: "Its chief value, aside from its legislative action, is the personal contact it brings into the lives of so many people who have never before realized that they belong to the Church!"

St. Andrew's Brotherhood to Gather.

Great impetus to the growing movement for lay evangelical work may be given at the National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, to be held at Washington City October 5 to 9, immediately preceding the Triennial Convention of the Church. According to plans outlined by the committee of which H. Lawrence Choate is chairman, representatives from all parish chapters of the Brotherhood in the United States and Canada will be gathered.

A preliminary meeting to arrange plans was held with Bishop Freeman, of the Diocese of Washington, at the Bishop's House, Washington, the evening of March 27, clergy and laymen from nearly one hundred parishes of the diocese being present. Evangelism will be the principal subject to be put before the Convention. For all the sessions of the five days there will be two separate meetings, one for boys from fifteen to twenty years of age, and the other for older men. It is planned to hold the senior conference at the Mayflower Hotel, and the junior conference at St. Thomas' Parish House. Evening meetings will be held at various chapters in Washington.

A few of the topics that have already been selected for discussion are: "The Place and Power of Lay Evangelism," "The Christian Religion Meeting the World's Need," "The Leadership of Youth," "Evangelism Through the Printed Word," "Christianizing the American Home" and "Evangelism in the Rural Communities."

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew was founded in Chicago in 1883. The national headquarters is in Philadelphia and the officers are: President, Edward H. Bonsall, Philadelphia; vice-presidents, Courtenay Barber, Chicago; Walter Kidde, New York; Dr. Benjamin F. Finney, Sewanee; G. Frank Shelby, Philadelphia; general secretary, Leon C. Palmer, Philadelphia; treasurer, C. E. Beury, Philadelphia; editor of St. Andrew's Cross, publication of the Brotherhood, George H. Randall.

The committee in charge of arrangements expects a registration for the Convention of approximately 1,500, consisting of about 1,000 from Washington and the vicinity, and five hundred from other parts of the country.

The local committee consists of the following chairmen: Col. John H. Finney, vice-chairman; Maj. F. Granville Munson, secretary; Bruce Baird, treasurer; Dr. William Earl Clark, registration; J. B. Wyckoff, publicity; William R. Ellis, hospitality; William J. Moore, hotel; Donald Gerow, junior convention; J. Harris Franklin and Dr. W. Sinclair Bowen, general committee.

This local committee will meet every week until the opening of the Convention.

Bibles in Braille.

Some blind folk have been trying for years to accumulate money enough to purchase the Bible in whole or in part, according to reports received by the American Bible Society, New York City, which has just completed its ninety-second year of service to the blind, during which it has distributed nearly 75,000 embossed volumes of the Scriptures in eighteen languages and blind reading systems. "My age is continually piling up," writes one man, "and I figure that I will be seventy-nine years old—seven years more—before I am in possession of the complete Bible."

Because of the space taken by the raised letters, felt by the blind fingers, a Bible when complete is from forty to sixty times larger than the ink-print books in general use. The separate volumes contain a single Gospel or at best but two or three Books of the Scriptures.

While a Bible in ink-print can be bought for less than a dollar a Bible in Braille costs approximately eighty dollars, but is sold by the Bible Society for twenty-one dollars—one dollar a volume. Where possible, embossed volumes are sent, with no financial return, to those who are unable to buy. The number of volumes which it was felt could be sent, last year, to any one blind person was a maximum of six as a donation. Even under this limitation, the demand of a half-year used up almost all the books which the Society's appropriation for a whole year enabled it to supply.

There are 100,000 blind in the United States of which ninety per cent becomes blind when adults.

Abroad the Society supplies embossed Scriptures in languages of South America, Asia and Africa. The Bible is the only printed book which the Armenian blind children have to read. The Gospels and some other Scripture portions which are printed in Braille by the American Bible Society, have been read over and over by the children until the chapters have been committed to memory.

Gift to Pastors Who Preach on Bunyan.

The American Tract Society has on the press a new and revised and well illustrated edition of its "Pilgrim's Progress" (First and Second Parts) and "Grace Abounding". The Chairman of the Bunyan Tercentenary Committee of the Society, who has already made a substantial gift to the Fifty-Thousand-Dollar Fund for the printing of Bunyan's books in many languages, has authorized the Society to announce that he will personally present and send, postpaid, a copy of the above-mentioned book to the first one thousand clergymen making application for it, providing these ministers agree to preach on "Pilgrim's Progress" or Bunyan's life, and recommend that their churches make an offering to the Bunyan Tercentenary Fund.

This friend of the Society will also furnish the above-mentioned book to pastors of churches which have already sent in their 1928 contribution to the general work of the Society, providing they will preach on Bunyan some time before the close of the year. Reprints of two of Dr. Matthews' articles on Bedford and Elstow will accompany the book. Extra copies of the book can be secured for two dollars each.

Good Friday Offering.

The great possibilities of the Good Friday Offering are again called to the attention of all the clergy by a letter sent out to them from Dr. Emhardt, director of Educational Chaplaincies supported by that offering, and Dr. Burgess of the Foreign-Born Americans Division. The important and far-reaching work of our Church in Palestine and the Near East depends upon this annual offering. It is not urged that the clergy ask for a large offering, but that the opportunity be presented to all our people.

Peace Treaty Found on Chaldean Tablet

From the New York Times we take the following:

With the completion of the deciphering from ancient Chaldean of the so-called "Stele of the Vultures" in the Paris Louvre, a tablet recovered some years ago from the site of the ancient Gizukh, thirty miles north of Tells, north of the Persian Gulf, the French savant de Sarzec, the oldest recorded international treaty is believed to have been revealed. It is a covenant between the States of Sirpurra, or Lagas, and Gizukh and is believed to date from 4500 B. C.

Preceding the text of the treaty is an account of the war which brought it into being. The King of Sirpurra, who gives himself the title of "Lord of the World", says that by command of his god he set a boundary of his land by a canal, and the King of Kish, named Meslim, set up a boundary stone confirming it, as he appears to have been the feudal lord of the King of Sirpurra.

It would seem that this alliance for the mutual protection of the grain fields of the two States offended the ruler of Gizukh, who caused the boundary stone to be removed and raided the lands of the Sirpurra. After a war of several years the latter gained the victory and the record of the peace treaty which ensued was engraved upon the "Stele of the Vultures", so-called because it shows these birds devouring the corpses of those slain in the war. The record of the Sirpurra-Gizukh peace treaty is as follows, translated from the Sirpurra text:

"I am Eannatum, the scourge of the sun god, the king of glory and brilliancy, which upon the people of Gizukh I poured out. I have concluded a treaty with them, and the men of Gizukh have given their word to (me) and taken an oath to respect the inalienable rights of proprietorship of the god, as manifested through the men of Sirpurra, over the city and grain lands, not to injure the irrigation canal which forms the boundary, or to move the boundary pillar. If they violate any of these clauses, the god of Sirpurra will surely decree their destruction."

Church Congress.

The Hotel Biltmore, Providence, R. I., has been chosen by the local committee of the Church Congress as the hotel where the officers and speakers will be entertained during the Congress. The Congress begins on the evening of Tuesday, April 17, and will close with the afternoon session on Friday, April 20.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Summer Schools.

With the passing of Lent and Easter and the approach of summer it would seem that one of the most important matters for the attention of our clergy and Church people is that of fitting workers for service through the Summer Schools or Institutes for the training of Church Workers.

The School at Sweet Briar, conducted by the three Dioceses of Virginia, will be held this year, June 18 to 30. It is here that complete courses are given for the training of Church School teachers. There is no better recommendation of the value of these courses than the testimony of those who have taken them and gone back to their work with new interest and enthusiasm.

The shorter School at Saint Margaret's, Tappahannock, conducted jointly by the Rappahannock Valley and Piedmont Convocations, will be held this year, July 9 to 13. Obviously the same training for teachers cannot be given at this School as at Sweet Briar. The latter is, therefore, especially recommended for teachers who desire to qualify according to the requirements of the National Accredited Teachers' Association. The School in Tappahannock is to meet the needs of those who are unable, on account of distance and time, to attend the School at Sweet Briar and for these same reasons the Board of Religious Education is considering the establishment of shorter schools at other points in the diocese. The programs of both Sweet Briar and Saint Margaret's will be ready for distribution shortly. Much time and labor has been spent in the preparation of them and the committees in charge most earnestly ask the full cooperation of clergy, Sunday-school superintendents, and other leaders in bringing them to the attention of all the people and in the selection of those who are to enter the schools from their respective parishes.

Convocation.

The spring meeting of the Rappahannock Valley Convocation will be held at Saint John's Church, Tappahannock, the Rev. H. S. Osburn, rector, May 2 and 3.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

The First of the Federation Services in Albee's Theatre was held on Tuesday of last week. The series will continue daily except Sunday and Monday until Easter Day. The preacher at the first service was the Rt. Rev. Ernest M. Stires, D. D., Bishop of Long Island. The attendance was very large; the New York Times puts it at three thousand. The Bishop preached a stirring sermon on life as a probation and preparation. He likened our life in this world to school days, intended to prepare us for something larger and better. Death he said, the last day in this life, is Commencement Day, the beginning of greater things. This series of services offers us a chance to contemplate our great destiny, to renew our determination to attain such character as will qualify for the life eternal—character, the only thing which we can carry from this life into that. He dwelt upon the value of prayer in this preparation, and insisted that the interpretation of the Gospel in the lives of Christians was the most effective kind of preaching of the Gospel. The lives of Christians are the only Bible the careless world will read.

National Church League Meeting.

The National Church League will hold a meeting in St. Thomas' Parish House, Bushwick Avenue, Brooklyn, on Monday evening, March 26, to protest against the removal of the Thirty-Nine Articles from the Prayer Book "and from the Constitution of the Church". The Rev. Alexander C. Cummins, of Poughkeepsie, will be the chief speaker. A circular letter advertising the meeting is signed by the Rev. Messrs. Duncan M. Genns, Reginald H. Scott and Emile S. Harper and by nine laymen.

Some New Ideas at St. Mary's, Brooklyn.

Lent has seen some new methods tried out at the Church of St. Mark, Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn. Instead of visiting preachers on Wednesday evenings, the rector has read the Litany and then used the question-and-answer method in the pulpit. Questions on "personal soul problems" submitted during the week have been discussed and answered. The topics have proved very interesting, and the discussion stimulating.

Another new method was a Wednesday afternoon service for school children, at which they presented their missionary offering, instead of hoarding it until Easter in a mite-box. The total offering to date is shown on a large bulletin each week, and it is hoped that the amount of $500 will be realized. At this service motion pictures illustrating Biblical and missionary themes have been shown.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop.

Dr. Glazebrook Begins His Work.

For ten days, beginning March 7, the Diocese of Florida received splendid inspiration and help from Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, in the development of practical lay evangelism.

Here Dr. Glazebrook actually began his work as a field representative of the National Commission on Evangelism, and too much cannot be said for his fine and enthusiastic addresses and conferences in different parts of the diocese.

Beginning in St. John's Church, Jacksonville, Dr. Glazebrook spoke daily, and conducted conferences with selected groups of laymen, in St. Mary's and the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville. From there he followed a schedule arranged by the Bishop and the Diocesan Commission, which took him to St. Augustine, Palatka and Gainesville, in addition to his services in Holy Trinity Parish, he met with several groups of students from the University of Florida. In all of these places Dr. Glazebrook has left behind him a small group of laymen pledged to the continuation of the Crusade's purpose of lay evangelism.

Bishop Juhan Visits Charleston.

On Sunday, March 18, Bishop Juhan visited Charleston, S. C., in the interest of the Sewanee Endowment Campaign. A mass meeting on Sunday night in St. Paul's Church was truly what its name implies, for that large and historic building was well filled with an attentive and interested congregation.

While in Charleston, Bishop Juhan attended the morning service of the Church of the Holy Communion, and made an informal talk to the congregation. He spoke to the Men's Club of St. Phillip's Church in the morning also, and addressed the local branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in the afternoon.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. Bishop.

St. Eliazbeth's Church Consecrated.

On the Third Sunday in Lent, March 11, the new St. Elizabeth's Church, Elizabethtown, having been completed and fully paid for, was duly consecrated by the Rt. Rev. James Henry Darlington, D. D., assisted by the Vicar, the Rev. Charles E. Berghaus, who is also rector of St. John's, Marietta, and the Rev. Harry G. Hartman, of Lancaster. The church is completely equipped with the usual ecclesiastical furniture and ornaments, the altar having been made some years ago by Mr. Heisey, the builder of the church. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers and smilax in loving memory of Mrs. Ethel Hiestand, who was one of the original members of the congregation. An American flag of embroidered silk, surmounted with a brass eagle, was presented by Mrs. V. H. Berghaus, mother of the Vicar, in memory of George Washington. St. Elizabeth's Church was designed and planned without the assistance of an architect by the Vicar, the builder, Mr. Heisey of Elizabethtown, and the building committee. Among those present at the consecration were Church people from Marietta, Mount Joy, Lancaster and York. The church was filled to overflowing.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

B Branches.

The B branches of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington will present a missionary pageant in the Parish Hall of All Souls' Church on Friday, March 30, at 8:30 P. M. The preparation and direction of this work has been thorough and it promises to be more than worth while. The proceeds from admission charged, will be applied to the remaining amount necessary to pay the amount pledged by the Diocese of Washington for the liquidation of the deficit of the General Church.

Unusual Gift.

A gift of unusual interest recently received by Washington Cathedral has been made by the Rev. Hobart B. Whitney, seventy years old, rector of Trinity Church, Athens-on-Hudson, N. Y. The gift consists of his mother's engagement ring, his own confirmation ring and his wife's wedding ring.

In forwarding the three rings to the Cathedral authorities, the aged rector, whose ministry has extended over a forty-seven year period, wrote: "These things may at any time become my own memorial as well as that of my mother and wife. They represent the beginning, course and close of my life's voyage."

The rings are dated 1856, 1872, and 1883. With similar contributions, including gold and silver jewelry and precious stones from many parts of the country, they eventually will be melted for the Holy Communion service on the high altar of the Cathedral. Acknowledging the gift, the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, Bishop of Washington, wrote: "I am deeply touched by your gift, and I consider the three rings, a most interesting and hallowed contribution to Washington Cathedral. Mingled with the other gold offerings of the Cathedral, they will proclaim that the United States is not lacking in the spirit of sacrificial giving which has made the building of cathedrals possible for centuries."

In Commemoration.

A special service, in commemoration of the consecration of the late Rt. Rev. Henry Yates Satterlee, was held in Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, on Monday, March 26, at ten A. M. The Feast of the Annunciation, March 25, marked the thirty-second anniversary of Bishop Satterlee's consecration, which took place in Calvary Church, New York, but because this day fell on Sunday, the following day was set apart at Washington Cathedral for special services. A memorial address was delivered by Bishop Freeman and the service was conducted by the Very Rev. G. C. F. Bratenahl, D. D., Dean of Washington Cathedral, who at the time of Bishop Satterlee's bishopric, was rector of St. Alban's Church. Many clergymen who served under Bishop Satterlee, and also friends and those confirmed by him were present at the service.

Epiphany Church.

March 25 was set aside by Dr. Phillips, rector of Epiphany Church as a one-day mission, when a special effort for attendance and consecration to the church was made. A series of five services were held during the day, and at four o'clock in the afternoon there was a "Rededication Service" when, owing to limited seating capacity, it was requested that only members of the parish attend. The Bible Class for Adults which meets at Epiphany Church every Sunday night, now numbers nearly 1,500 people enrolled.

Collect for Sunday Next Before Easter.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who, of Thy tender love towards mankind, hast sent Thy Son, Our Saviour, Jesus Christ, to take upon Him our flesh, and to suffer death upon the cross, that all mankind shall follow the example of His great humility; Mercifully grant, that we may both follow the example of His patience, and also be made partakers of His resurrection; through the same Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Collects for Good Friday.

Almighty God, we beseech Thee graciously to behold this Thy family, for which Our Lord Jesus Christ was contented to be betrayed, and given up into the hands of wicked men and to suffer death upon the cross; Who now liveth and reigneth with Thee, and the Holy Ghost, ever one God, world without end. Amen.

Almighty and everlasting God, by Whose Spirit the whole body of the Church is governed and sanctified; Receive our supplications and prayers, which we offer before Thee for all estates of men in Thy holy Church, that every member of the same in his vocation and ministry, may truly and godly serve Thee; through Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

O Merciful God, Who hast made all men, and hatest nothing that Thou hast made, nor desireth the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live; have mercy upon all Jews, Turks, infidels and heretics; and take from them all ignorance, hardness of heart, and contempt of Thy Word; and so fetch them home, blessed Lord, to Thy flock, that they may be saved among the remnant of the true Israelites, and be made one fold under one Shepherd, Jesus Christ Our Lord, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Spirit, one God, world without end. Amen.

The Way of Peace.

Ah, Peace, set now Thy face toward death!
Hear not the "Blessed be", they cry,
Nor yet the cavernous "Crucify",
For both are mortal breath.
Today they shout and sing Thy name,
Today they herald forth Thy fame,
Today Thy glories they proclaim:
Tomorrow Thou must die.
The glittering silver buys Thy friends,
The fear of crowds fair justice ends,
The sworn allegiance breaks and bends:
Tomorrow Thou must die.
Mars sits and gambles for Thy cloak,
Mars sits and laughs—ah happy stroke—
To see Thee hang upon the oak
Upon the oak to die.
The passers-by laugh Thee to scorn,
The soldiers press the cruel thorn,
With point of spear Thy heart is torn,
And Thou art left to die.
Ah, Peace, set now Thy face toward death!
Hear not the "Blessed be", they cry
Nor yet the cavernous "Crucify",
For both are mortal breath.
But hear, "Thou art my loved One";
And hear, up Thy cross, "Well done"!
For that is Easter breath.
Yea, that is Easter breath!

The Christ of Good Friday.

The solemnity of Good Friday lays a quietness upon our hearts. In that quietness let us think of two simple texts,

Hebrews 7:26—"Separate from sinners."

Luke 7:34—"Friend of sinners."

Both statements were made concerning Jesus. They sum up all that can be said about Good Friday. Indeed, they sum up all that can be said about Jesus Christ.

Our religion is often presented to us as though Christianity consisted entirely of one word, identification—Christ's identification with us and ours with Him, His entering into our life and death, and our entering into His death and life.

This method of presentation is used above all in reference to His passion. We are reminded of the marvelous light His sufferings throw upon ours. We are told how He has entered into our deepest distresses and has thus earned the name of the Great Consoler. On the other hand we are urged to become "partakers of His suffering", to be "crucified with Him", to bear in our bodies "the marks of the Lord Jesus".

This is the form in which we are often led to think of Christianity. There is also a word often used in the Scriptures for this idea, the word "partaker"—Christ is partaker with us, we are to be partakers with Him. It is all true. It is all beautiful. It is, however, not all that there is to our religion. There is something which precedes, which is fundamental to all of that, and which impresses us most clearly on Good Friday. It is illustrated in the texts.

This other idea is the separateness of Jesus Christ, His apartness from us. It consists of all that He is and does in which we are not partakers, although it was all done for us. May we call it His solitariness? It is to be seen above all in His passion. Isaiah's words may be applied to it, "I have trodden the winepress alone". Jesus Himself spoke of it when He said to His followers, "Ye shall leave me alone". This they did when they all forsook Him and fled.

We shall understand something concerning it if we ask ourselves a single question with each of the two texts.

"Separate from sinners." What is the most important, most outstanding fact about our lives? We ought to be able to answer that question a little more easily on this day. It is not that some of us are rich and others poor, some learned and others ignorant, some sufferers and others not. It is not that a certain man is the President of the United States, and another the King of England. These are not the most important facts concerning them for us. This, however, is most important, that all are sinners.

We realize the fact that every large view of our lives we can take. For instance, life's chief relationship is the one with God. Whenever we think of that relationship, however, we are conscious that it has been ruptured by sin. We are far away from Him. Again life is not a matter of a few years, but is eternal. No man ever thinks of eternal life without aiming to eliminate sin. An eternity of sin is repulsive. Once more, the very instinct of life is to conquer. Yet we are defeated again and again unto the end. We know the great undeveloped possibilities of our lives, all of them hindered by sin. It is said that in Japan a condemned criminal must ever after, when he signs his name, add the crime of which he was found guilty. How startling it would be to us if whenever we sign our names, we were mentally to add to our signature the word, sinner.

We cannot have the least understanding of Good Friday without that deep consciousness as to ourselves, and without the other consciousness that here Jesus stands alone, "separate from sinners". Pilate said of Him, "I find no fault in this man". We can say the same in a far truer sense than Pilate ever meant the words. In spite of that fact, He suffers. Why? The moment we ask that question, we are face to face with the world-old problem, Why do the innocent suffer? It is perhaps the world's greatest problem, and here in Christ's passion is its climax. No man can properly study the problem, unless he begins at the cross, and ends at the cross. It is not that Christ is comparatively innocent, as are those of whom we usually think when we consider the problem. He is altogether innocent, separate from sinners. Why did He suffer? We can know nothing at all about Good Friday unless, conscious of our own sin and His sinlessness, we ask, Why do the innocent suffer?

We are ready now for our second text and our second question.

"Friend of sinners." What is the most important fact about our sin? It is not the shame, the degradation, the misery, the weakness, the ignorance of our sin. We could stand all of that if it were not for the guilt of our sin—the unworth, the ill-desert of it. It is a guilt which consists in the desire to dethrone God and to enthrone self- self-opinion, self-wish, self-will. It is the guilt that hates God, that would put God out of existence, that would literally kill God, as this day's fact so clearly reveals.

Why do we not feel it? Why do we not hang our heads! How can we look into one another's eyes without blushing? This is, of course, because we are used to it. It is because as we face one another, each is conscious that the other is guilty also. It is just a little easier to feel it today, because somehow we know that Jesus is dealing with the guilt of sin today, He alone. The mystery as to how He dealt with it enters into that other mystery as to why the innocent suffer, why He suffers. Now we can realize that He is distinctly, "the friend of sinners". You and I can be friends, can be helpful to each other in the shame, the degradation, the misery, the weakness, the ignorance of our sin. In the greatest matter, the guilt of sin, He is the only friend a sinner can have.

He is dealing with it alone today. He only is "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world". No man can think earnestly about Jesus Christ without realizing that He looked upon that which He came to accomplish as having a universal bearing, as applying to all men of all times. Such a man will know also that Christ regarded His death as the climax of His purpose. Once more that man will recognize that Christ knew the heart of His purpose to be the forgiveness, the remission of men's sins. Consider well those three facts, and the meaning of Good Friday, with all of its deep mystery, becomes illuminated.

God was laying His hand on the guilt of human sin in Him. When the climax came all forsook Him and fled. He was solitary. He is the one friend of sinners.

Shall we aim to sum up all that we have considered? It will be well for us if with our two texts we can face the cross of Jesus and realize simply that our sins were there. They were there, killing the innocent one—then our hearts will repent. They were there, being taken away—then our hearts will be eternally grateful.

We can sum it up even more briefly in these two sentences. Jesus did not sin. I did not atone.

"Separate from sinners." "Friend of sinners."

Prayer.

By precept, as by example, our Lord impressed upon us the vital necessity of prayer. Men ought always to pray and not faint. Prayer should be offered in His name. To ask was to receive, that their joy might be full. He even taught us to pray and gave us the great themes of prayer, and in the presence of His friends He offered His high priestly prayer.

Such a precious precedent leaves us speechless and without excuse before the charge that our individual and Church life is so largely prayerless. There are services enough and too much entertainment, but too little prayer. The call of the season, therefore, is that we give ourselves to prayer.

The benefit of so doing is great for body, mind and heart. Prayer rests the body and recuperates our jaded energy. It quiets the nerves as nothing else can. To this even neurologists bear witness and thousands of afflicted ones can testify. Prayer quiets the mind. It readjusts emphasis. It clears the vision. In its exercise and atmosphere we are enabled to "pull ourselves together".

Prayer is the breath of life to the spirit. The atmosphere of life soon becomes close and foetid. Prayer lets in the clear, crisp air, which blows forever on the hills of God. These sweeten the spirit, strengthen the purpose and give health to the soul. Every one knows what a restfulness and peace comes to those who spend an evening at home. We do not mean merely in the house, but at home. Prayer is the spending of time at home, when, care shut out, the atmosphere of home recreates body, mind and spirit. The home, therefore, is naturally the place and atmosphere of prayer. It is the place of renewal for the whole man. Here the spirit of God bathes and enters the human spirit and greatness of soul is the resultant.

Such prayer-strengthened souls can rise to all the heights of intercession. We are continually reminded by their fresh discovery and use of the unused forces of nature. We are as certainly surrounded by unused spiritual forces beating against the life of our spirit and awaiting discovery and use. Prayer is the secret of such discovery. It opens life to the infinite resources of God. We need nothing more and the Church needs nothing more than that we should become adventurers in the realm of prayer.—Selected.

My Master.

My Master was so very poor
A manger was His cradling place;
So very rich my Master was
Kings came from far
To gain His grace.

My Master was so very poor
And with the poor He broke the bread;
So very rich my Master was
That multitudes
By Him were fed.

My Master was so very poor
They nailed Him friendless to a Cross;
So very rich my Master was
He gave His all
And knew no loss.

The Greatest Hero.

"Do you think Jesus will come to the Passover?" the scribes and Pharisees asked each other. "He knows we are planning to kill Him; do you think He will come?"

While they were questioning and wondering, Jesus was getting ready. It was Sunday morning. He was going to ride into the city. He knew what would happen, but was not going to hide from the rulers. He was ready to finish the work His Father had sent Him into the world to do.

He sent two disciples to a house in Bethphage for a colt. They brought the colt and some of them put their garments upon him for Jesus to sit on. A great crowd of happy people were waiting to walk beside Him. People had come out from Jerusalem to walk with Him. There were Bethany people and pilgrims lately come to the Passover. Some of them had seen Him raise Lazarus from the dead. Most of them had seen miracles and heard His wondrous words.

In those days kings rode on asses through city streets in times of peace and cheering crowds followed them. Jesus the King of Kings was going to ride like a king. Every one in Jerusalem should know of His coming and have a last chance to accept Him as Saviour.

As the procession passed over the road, people took off their outer garments and spread them in the street for the colt to walk over. It was a custom of those days. They broke branches from the trees and waved them, shouting songs as they followed Him.

When they entered the city, the Pharisees were filled with rage. "See," they said to one another, "we can do nothing, for the whole world is gone after Him." But they meant to take Him, when the people were not with Him.

The song the people sang was:

"Hosanna to the Son of David! Hosanna in the highest!
Blessed is He that comes in the name of the Lord!
Blessed is the King that comes in the name of the Lord!"

The singers did not know that the song was written about Jesus and that the prophet Zechariah had told about this procession five hundred years before it happened. It was just as had been prophesied, but they did not know it.

"Forbid the people to be so noisy," some Pharisees said to Jesus. But he did not rebuke them. He was glad to let them have this hour of happiness.

"Who is this?" strangers in the city asked of the crowds going before and following our Lord. "Who is this?"

"He is Jesus, the prophet of Nazareth," the strangers were told.

All Jerusalem knew He had come and that they would have a chance to hear Him for the last time, if they came to the Temple where He was going to preach, teach and heal.

When He went to the Temple, He found a market in it. Men had brought sheep, oxen and doves there and were selling them. Money-changers sat at tables on which were piles of money. One heard bleating of sheep, lowing of oxen, cooing of doves and the voices of men buying and selling.

Jesus made a whip of small cords and entered into the confusion and drove them all out, compelling the men to take away the sheep, oxen and doves. The tables were overturned in the stampede and the money spilled along the floor.

"My Father's house is a house of prayer," He said, as they ran before Him, "and you have made it a den of thieves."

He was only One and they were many, and yet they fled before Him. The Scribes and Pharisees burned with anger as they saw His power. They had given permission to the market men to use the Temple.

"What right have you to drive them out?" they asked.

He did not answer them. He had proven His right.

When the Temple was cleansed, the people came to Him. Children sang hosannas to Him. The Scribes and Pharisees did not object to the noise of the animals, but were disturbed by the voices of worshipping children.

"Make those children hush," they said.

The songs of the children pleased our Lord and they were not told to hush.

The blind came and were given their sight. The sick and the lame came and were healed. Multitudes gathered to hear Him preach and teach. His enemies dared not arrest Him in the presence of the people, for fear a mob would be stirred up.

On Tuesday evening on the way to the Bethany home, He told the disciples that the end was very near. "In two days is the feast of the Passover and then I shall be betrayed into the hands of the Jews who shall crucify Me. I shall not remain in the grave; on the third day I shall rise again."

He could have saved Himself. He could have gone that night beyond the Jordan or elsewhere from His enemies. Or if He would only stop preaching, teaching and healing, they would let Him alone.

But He came into the world to die for the sins of the world and of His own free will was going to His death.

The Caterpillar's Journey.

Once upon a time a lazy brown caterpillar started out on a journey. You would not have thought it a very long journey—just across the road and under the fence to the roots of the big maple tree, where he thought he would spin himself a hammock and hide away from the cold winds and snow which he knew would soon come. But the caterpillar thought it a long way and full of dangers. Some careless boy or girl might step on him, or an automobile or wagon might run over him. He trembled when he thought of it, but one bright day he started out. He could see a tall white daisy on the other side of the road, and he thought he would stop and talk to her when he reached her.

It took him a long time to cross the road, and when he came to the place where he had seen the daisy there was no daisy there, only a tall brown stalk.

"Where is she?" he asked a robin who was watching him with bright eyes from a bough above.

The robin answered in a little song that said, "She is dead, she is dead".

"Oh!" said the caterpillar, "I want to talk to her."

The robin went on singing in a soft little voice, and soon the caterpillar knew he was saying, "She shall live again, she shall live again".

But the caterpillar did not understand and he felt very sad as he went on.

Soon he began to look about him and think what he would say to the friendly green grass which had nodded to him on the other side of the road. When he looked, he saw there was no friendly green grass; everything was dry and hard.

"Where is the friendly green grass?" he said to himself. "Where can it have gone?"

And then came a little whisper in his ear which he knew was the wind, "It is dead, it is dead".

The poor little caterpillar felt very lonesome and he put his head close to the ground as he cried out, "Oh! the friendly green grass, I shall miss it so".

Then he heard the wind whisper again very softly this time, "It shall live again".

But the little brown caterpillar did not understand and he felt very sad as he went on.

By and by he came to the roots of the big maple tree and as he looked up he saw the branches were all brown and bare and the lovely green leaves were all gone.

"Oh, dear!" he said to himself, "the big maple tree is dead, too."

But he heard again the soft voice of the wind as it said, "It shall live again, it shall live again."

But the caterpillar did not understand, and he felt very sad as he began to spin his silken hammock.

"They are dead," he kept saying to himself, and every time he said it, he heard the soft wind answer, "They shall live again, they shall live again".

But the caterpillar did not understand, and he was sad.

Soon the hammock was all done and the caterpillar was ready for his long nap. He did not hear the two children who came and looked at the hammock and said to each other, "The caterpillar is dead, too," but the wind heard them and answered softly, though they did not understand: "He shall live again, he shall live again. Wait and see."

The cold wind and snow came and stayed all winter, the birds were all away in the southland, and the wind no longer whispered in a soft voice, but whistled shrilly through the trees and shook the branches roughly.

By and by the sun grew warm and bright and the snow melted away and spring came to all the earth. The little seeds began to grow in the warm earth and soon everything was a lovely green again. Something began to happen in the silken hammock where the caterpillar went to sleep. Slowly it came open and something moved inside.

The soft wind saw it and said, "The caterpillar is alive again". And then out of the silken hammock came a queer wet thing, not at all like the brown caterpillar. The sun shone warmly upon it, and soon it was resting there on the trunk of the big maple tree, a great, beautiful butterfly, with wings of black and gold.

The butterfly did not understand, and he said to the robin who looked down at him from the branch above, "I thought I was a caterpillar".

But the robin answered as before in a little song, "Now you are living again".

Then Mr. Caterpillar Butterfly thought of his friends, the lovely white daisy, the friendly green grass, and the big maple tree, and he remembered the soft voices that said, "They shall live again". He looked around him and there they were, every one of them, more beautiful than ever in the warm sunlight.

He did not understand, nobody understands, but we know the soft voices were true when they said, "They shall live again, they shall live again".—Charlotte Brown.

Myselves.

Helen Bayley Davis.

There are two selves inside of me—
One is as proper as can be;
But sad to say the other self
Is a very misbehaving elf!

She doesn't like to sew or sweep
Or bake a loaf, and when I peep
Into the corners, as I must,
I find she's left them full of dust.

She piles the dishes in the sink
And leaves her bed unmade—I think!
She never shines the pans and crocks
Nor sews the buttons on her frocks—

But, oh, she loves to leap upon
The wind's back—riding on and on,
Swinging from a tall tree's tip,
Holding a bowl of white moon-drip.

Today I saw her clasp a pair
Of dazzling moth-wings in her hair
Then float toward a rainbow shelf . . .
I wish I were my other self!

A First of April Story.

The milkman came around early, before anybody was awake. He put the milk, two quarts of it, in a little box on the back porch. But before he put the milk in, he took something out—something that was as certain to be there as the milk was. To be sure, that something was not always the same. At times it was a sandwich: at others a piece of cake; once in a while a bit of fruit or piece of pie. But always there was something. Mother looked to that.

"Why do you do it, mother?" questioned Harold. "Why does the milkman have to have something to eat at night?"

"Because he's tired and hungry, dear," explained mother. "He comes from a long, long way off. And it is only kind to do that much for him."

But Harold did not wholly approve of the milkman's largesse. There were times when he would rather have eaten the cake himself than to have given it away. But mother never forgot.

One night there was gingerbread for luncheon. It was a treat of which Harold was very fond. Company happened in for luncheon that day. When Harold came home from school there was but one piece left. And mother calmly put it away for the milkman! Harold was vexed about it. But mother stood firm.

"It will be a pleasant April fool surprise," she said. "Tomorrow will be the first of April."

"I'll put a mud pie in, or something," Harold thought. "April fool jokes are like that. Not nice things like gingerbread. I don't like the milkman, anyway."

Harold went to much trouble to fix the gingerbread. He took out the middle of it very carefully, all the nice raisins and all. And he made a stiff batter of mud that no one would have suspected of being other than gingerbread.

"There!" he said. "There, Mr. Milkman, you can eat mud 'cause you didn't give me a ride one day."

But, somehow, he could not bring himself to eat what he had taken out.

Every one was sound asleep when Harold woke up. He lay thinking about what he had done. Why, that was pretty near stealing! At last he could stand it no longer. He crept out on the porch, turned on the light and took the mud-gingerbread. Carefully he scooped the mud out and replaced the original filling. He went back to bed satisfied.

"What do you think I found in the milk box?" said mother next morning. "I found a note, asking if my little boy could go to the milkman's farm tomorrow and spend the day. Won't that be a fine ride in his big machine?"

"Maybe it's an April fool," said Harold.

"No. The milkman is too kind a man to do such an unpleasant thing."

"So'm I!" cried Harold. "So'm I! But I nearly wasn't."

And then he told her. He confessed to the milkman, too, as they took the long ride. And the milkman said it was quite all right. He did not mention the gritty taste the gingerbread had had. And Harold never guessed it. —Lutheran.

The Meadow Lark's Unselfishness.

Emily W. Woolfork.

Why is it that the meadow lark makes its nest on the ground?

The meadow lark is golden underneath, because it loves the sunny meadows, and the beautiful gold color matches the sun. Most of our birds nest in trees, but some live on the ground, among them the meadow lark.

The reason for this is that once long ago the flowers that grew close to the ground loved the bird songs, but they were too far away to hear them well. So they asked that some of the birds come and live near them. The red-headed woodpecker said, "I am afraid that my red head might be seen. A hollow tree is better for me".

Now the butter-cups were yellow and the yellow primroses and the dandelions, so they suggested that as the meadow lark had the beautiful gold on his breast, if he would make his nest on the ground they would grow near, so as to protect the nest.

The meadow lark since then has always lived very happily on the ground and the little flowers listen every morning and evening for his lovely cheerful song.

"None knew thee, but to love thee,
None named thee but to praise."

She was a member of the Staff of the Hannah More Academy for nearly nineteen years, serving under three Principals, and greatly beloved by members of the Staff, the students and her corps of servants. For her unselfish and untiring service for others she will be greatly missed.

As the Chaplain of the School said to her on one of his visits, while she was ill, "You have made a nitch at the Academy which can never be filled." Therefore be it resolved by the Society of Graduates of the Hannah More Academy, of which she was an associate member:

That in the death of Elnora Binford Scarff, we have lost one of our most beloved members, the influence of whose beautiful Christian character will ever prove an inspiration to all of us and that the memory of it may remain as a torch to be upheld by us and passed on to those who follow.

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be spread upon the minutes of the Society, and that a copy be sent to the family, The Tidings of Hannah More Academy, The Maryland Churchman and The Southern Churchman.

MRS. B. LATROBE WESTON,
Chairman.

IN MEMORIAM.

In the passing to the higher life, on March 13th, of Miss Helen A. H. Bennett, our branch of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Monumental Church has given into the Father's keeping our last Charter Member and the branch's first Secretary and Treasurer.

In the latter capacities, Miss Bennett served faithfully for twenty-five years, and gave to the upbuilding of the Auxiliary her best work and constant prayers. Her co-workers in the early days when the work was new, notably, Mrs. Annie E. Warren, Mrs. R. H. Meade, Sr., Miss Emily Harvie and Mrs. Robert Fisher; all of whom builded better than they knew, and their prayerful efforts helped to make this branch, what it has continued to be through its thirty-six years of activity: a strong, spiritual force in the Parish and also in the Diocese of Virginia. The close personal associations with these Saints, now gone to their reward, is a sacred memory with those who in a feeble way served with them, and their lives should be an incentive to all privileged to carry on the work now and in the coming years. We would bless God, and give to Him the glory for the examples of devotion to His Cause and to the highest ideals set for all workers in Christ's Kingdom, by the many blessed women who have in the past served in this Church. Love, Loyalty, Fidelity—were their watchwords.

We rejoice to think of the reunion of our dearly-loved friend, with "that company of all faithful people" gone to the Eternal Home from this Church, who "having finished their course, do rest from their labours, and their works do follow them".

KATE N. CHRISTIAN,
KATE F. MEADE,
SUSIE M. JONES,
Committee.

In the visitations women call in pairs on women and men in pairs on men. In some cases, however, husbands and wives make calls together.

The visitors assemble each evening for supper after their afternoon visitations, make a report as to the number of cards signed and then go out for evening visitations. In all cases the parish church is the unit.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Coadjutor

Proposed Church Merger Fails.

The merger between Christ Church, the Church of the Ascension, and the congregation worshipping in the Under-Croft of the Synod Hall of the proposed Maryland Cathedral, has failed to materialize. Ascension Church has definitely announced that it will not consider the question of a merger.

Meanwhile the Trustees of the Cathedral Foundation have announced that plans for the building of the Cathedral at a proposed site far out Charles Street Avenue, on the grounds of the Church of the Redeemer, have been dropped and the structure will be erected on the present site at Charles Street Avenue and University Parkway.

An interdenominational survey has recently been completed in all this northern semi-suburban section of the city, in the course of which 2,500 families were interviewed as to their religious affiliations. Thirty per cent of the families were found to be Episcopal, the next highest being seventeen per cent Roman Catholic. Of the total number two and four-tenths per cent disclaimed any religious inclinations.

The Episcopal Churches included in this region are: St. David's, Roland Park; the congregation of the Cathedral, Guilford; and the Church of the Redeemer, Homeland. The latter church has plans under way for the erection of a fine parish house. Not long since this was a country parish, but now the suburbs of the city are rapidly enveloping it.

Head of Oldfield's School Dies.

Miss Anna Green McCulloch, the beloved head for more than sixty years of Oldfield's School for Girls, a private Church boarding school, died recently. She was known affectionately as "Miss Nan" and her fine Christian character has influenced many generations of girls.

Rector Buried Beneath His Church.

The body of the late Rev. Peregrine Wroth, D. D., rector of the Church of the Messiah, Baltimore, for more than fifty years, who died in December last, was reinterred on March 17, beneath his church, as a singular mark of honor to his memory. The last occurrence of this nature in Baltimore was the burial of Cardinal Gibbons beneath the Roman Catholic Cathedral.

On the Sunday succeeding the reinterment, the Church of the Messiah was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. Edward T. Helfenstein, Bishop-Coadjutor of Maryland, assisted by the Rev. Sewell S. Hepburn, life-long friend of Dr. Wroth, and the Rev. James A. Mitchell, the rector. At the same time the rite of Confirmation was conferred upon a large class.

The present structure of the Church of the Messiah was completed in 1922, making the removal of the Church from a down-town section of the city after many years of faithful work, being the second oldest Episcopal Church in the city. The present church, a beautiful Gothic structure, is part of an L shape plant which includes a large fully-equipped parish house. Messiah is the only Episcopal Church for a radius of two miles in the rapidly developing suburbs in the northeast section of the city.

Historic Church Ceremony at Charleston

"St. Philip's Pilgrimage" was conducted the afternoon of Wednesday, March 21, at Charleston, S. C., perhaps the one place in the country where the variety and quaintness of historic association attending the ceremony could be assembled. The "pilgrimage" was by members of the parish of St. Philip, of which the Rev. S. Cary Beckwith is rector, one of the oldest Church of England churches in the United States. It was provided for by act of the colonial authorities of South Carolina in 1710, as "a new brick church at Charleston, to be the parish of St. Philip, Charleston". Colonel Rhett, who was one of the commissioners, appointed to arrange for the building, gave the parish a beautiful Communion service and, later, another service of fine silver which he is said to have taken from pirates, who had seized it in the rifling of a captured ship. Both services are yet owned by the church.

The pilgrimage was for the benefit of the parish fund. It left the Villa Margherita at three o'clock P. M., going first to the church, where Mr. Beckwith displayed the silver services for inspection. From the church it went to the old Glebe street rectory and thence to the residence in Hasell Street, occupied by Colonel Rhett when he was commissioner, nearly two hundred and twenty years ago. Other historic residences, of which Charleston has such wealth, were visited and tea was served at the residence of Mrs. Thomas B. Frost, 22 Church Street.

Bishops' Crusade.

In addition to using her own clergy in an effort to conduct the Bishops' Crusade in every parish and mission field, Alabama has been fortunate in securing the assistance of several distinguished crusaders from without the diocese.

The Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., of Delaware, was at All Saints, Mobile. In the same city the Rev. J. M. B. Gill, of St. Paul's, Petersburg, Va., was at St. John's Church, and the Rev. Charles R. Blaisdell, Calvary Church, Memphis, preached at Christ Church. In Birmingham the Crusade was conducted at the Church of the Advent by the Rt. Rev. Wm. T. Capers, of West Texas; at St. Andrew's by the Rev. Raimundo DeOvies, Chaplain of the University of the South. The Rev. John S. Bunting, D. D., of Ascension Church, St. Louis, was the Crusader at St. Mary's, and the Rev. Oliver J. Hart, D. D., of St. Paul's, Chattanooga, preached at Grace Church.

At Montgomery all the Episcopal churches of the city combined in holding the Crusade at St. John's Church, with very fine results. The Rt. Rev. Edwin A. Penick, D. D., of North Carolina, and the Rev. Walter C. Whitaker, D. D., of Knoxville, Tenn., were the visiting crusaders.

Mr. S. Bartow Strang and Mr. Wm. E. Dodge, both of St. Paul's Church, Tenn., served as crusaders to laymen in Birmingham and Montgomery, respectively. In Montgomery, Mrs. D. E. Wilson, former Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary, conducted the women's conferences of the Crusade.

Personal Notes

The Rev. John M. Griffith, rector of St. James' Church, Lenoir, N. C. (Western North Carolina), has resigned, and becomes rector of St. Andrew's Church, Canton, N. C. (Western North Carolina), April 22. Address, St. Andrew's Rectory, Canton, N. C. Mr. Griffith was for some years Archdeacon of the Diocese of Western North Carolina. He is now serving brief rectorates in small parishes and missions in order to strengthen them. Within sixteen months at Lenoir, Bishop Horner paid three (confirmation) visitations, confirming in that time, as many men, as were confirmed in the eleven previous years in St. James' Church. The Canton Church was the first mission organized by Mr. Griffith while he was Archdeacon.

The Rev. Charles C. Durkee has entered upon his duties as rector of Grace Church, Elkride, and St. John's, Relay. Mr. Durkee comes last from Western Port, Md., where he was rector of St. James' Church. He is a graduate of William and Mary College and the Virginia Theological Seminary.

The Rev. S. D. Palmer, rector of St. Stephen's, Eutaw, Ala., and St. Mark's, Boligee, Ala., with associated missions, has resigned, having retired from the active ministry. Mr. Palmer will take up his residence at Washington, D. C., with his son, Mr. Leon C. Palmer, recent Executive Secretary of the National Commission on Evangelism.

ORDINATIONS.

On Quinquagesima Sunday the Rev. Ralph J. Kendall was ordered priest at St. John's Church, Decatur, Ala., by the Rt. Rev. William G. McDowell, D. D.

The candidate was presented by the Rev. E. L. Malone, of Florence, Ala., the Rev. Richard Brown, of Owensboro, Ky., read the Litany; the Ven. V. G. Lowery, of Sheffield, Ala., preached the sermon. The Rev. Messrs. Edmund Bennett, Ph. D., of Ensley, and Cary Gamble, of Huntsville, Ala., also took part in the service.

Mr. Kendall is serving at St. John's Church, Ensley, at present.

CHRISTCHURCH SCHOOL

Building and Endowment Fund

THE boys of Christchurch School in oldest Virginia (thirty miles north of Jamestown) form a distinct group, coming from homes of tradition and culture though ofttimes of slender resources. Some day you may look into their glowing faces and realize the full satisfaction of having been their benefactor in an hour of real stress.

Their School, alone in all Tidewater Virginia, and with but seven years of struggling history, of course, lacks the loyal alumni of established position and wealth who, for older schools and colleges, care so generally for expanding growth. Its cause for the present must be the care of others.

Five marks of the Schools are noteworthy:

1. It re-occupies the earliest field of Anglo-Saxon civilization in America.

2. It has in its Headmaster, the Rev. Dr. William Page Dame, a really great leader of boys.

3. It has set up high standards of Christian character and scholastic attainment in a rural simplicity of life.

4. It has overtaxed its present capacity to house sixty boys of select promise, with a long waiting list for next session.

And the fifth mark of the School, its very low cost ($600 covers all School charges), can be maintained in one way only, by doubling the present enrollment; and the necessary building program costing $120,000, is now ready for immediate execution.

Half the required sum is in sight, though conditioned largely on completion of the whole unified program in time for next session's use.

REV. WM. PAGE DAME, D. D.
Headmaster of Christchurch School.

Work on construction should start within ten days. Sixty thousand dollars is still to be subscribed.

Dormitory units for five to twenty boys—$5,000 to $20,000.

Full accommodation for one boy—$1,000.

Furnishings per boy—$100.

Gifts may be made memorials. Subscriptions (for payment at convenience) may be sent to the Dean, the Mayo Memorial Church House, 110 West Franklin Street, Richmond, Virginia.

Checks may be made payable to Christchurch School Extension Fund.

Visualizing with keen sympathy the full emergency so briefly outlined, will you share with others in promptly meeting it?

Faithfully yours,
Edmund L. Woodward.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"We see the marks of His conflict, but not one sign of defeat."

"Life will perhaps fall into old forms after Easter, but the sunrise gives new meaning to old forms."

"Love for the law is the safeguard of liberty."

"All true love is proof of our relationship to God."

Wandering sinner, striving saint,
Prisoner hopeless of complaint,
Courage kindles now anew
Christ the Lord is risen for you.
—H. Kimball.

It will hurt you more to live a life without prayer than to live it without bread.

Here is the Light which alone can bring the world out of darkness, here the courage which alone can conquer our instinctive fear. With the fulness of the resurrection message in our minds we can go forward into the great experiment of peace on earth and goodwill among men, because we trust in God.—Bishop Remmington.

What Jesus did to Mary was to bring home to her heart that death cannot sever. She thought death impassable; and here He was with the old love, and the selfsame voice and the familiar tenderness. Mary was the first of a multitude innumerable who have seen and heard Him so. Socrates held high discourse of immortality . . . but Mary could never understand anything of that. . . . But now she sees the Master: the torch of immortality is lighted that ere long illumined the world.—Presbyterian Banner.

Life for me shall never again mean only that I am bound to drudge on under a heavy burden of work and responsibility as long as I am in this world; but it shall mean that the glory of the Lord God Incarnate is risen upon me, and I am bound in every law of discipline, in every step of duty . . . to be making my way out of darkness further on into the light.—G. Congreve, "Christian Life a Response".

Suddenly we see the world of people with the eyes of Jesus—plain men and women and little children all set about with the glory of the living God. We meet a certain concrete problem of balancing our relationships with those principles of justice and friendliness upon which Jesus of Nazareth built His life. The power of His resurrection!

"Magdalene sought the Lord while in truth she touched Him. . . . She looked to see Him in His robes of glory, not in the earthly garb of a gardener. . . . You meet our Lord in His gardener's garb in the daily vexations and mortifications which offer themselves to you. You would prefer grander, more attractive mortifications, but indeed these are not the most profitable. . . . Before you see Him in His glory He wills to plant many a little lowly flower in your garden after His own fashion, and therefore He comes to you in such a garb."—S. Francis de Sales.

THE WITNESSING EASTER

THE primitive Church was a witnessing body, and witnessing was the pre-eminent function of the apostleship.

Of this Jesus spoke to the eleven the night before He died, promising the certifying presence of the Comforter with them, and adding, "Ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning" (John 15:27).

In keeping with these words of his Lord, Simon Peter, when proposing the choice of one to succeed Judas, said: "Of these men which have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of His resurrection" (Acts 1:21-22).

When some at Corinth questioned Paul's apostleship, he vindicated his claim to the high office with the short, sharp, and decisive question, "Am I not an apostle? Am I not free? Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord"? (1 Cor. 9:1).

No man could be an apostle who was not qualified by sight of the Risen Lord to testify to the resurrection. Hence some questioned Paul's apostleship because he was not one of the original twelve; and except for his experience with the Ascended Saviour on the Damascus Road, their objection would have been well-taken. But since in that thrilling and transforming experience he had talked with the Risen Jesus, no man could claim higher credentials to the apostolic office. He had seen and heard the Lord. That was enough.

The apostolic function of the Church will be always, as it has been from the beginning, witnessing to the resurrection. That testimony includes and carries with it all else, and has the promise of the confirming witness of the Holy Spirit. Hence, the fact of the resurrection, with its necessary implications, is the very heart of the Christian system. Without it Christian faith is empty and Christian preaching is futile. "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain" (1 Cor. 15:14).

This great fact was the staple of apostolic preaching, and around it the primitive Church was organized. Without it there would have been neither Gospel nor Church.

It was the center and substance of Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost, and it continued to occupy the central place in all the preaching which turned the world upside down as the Apostles wherever they went "with power gave witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 4:33). Whether preaching in Jerusalem or at Athens, to Jews or Gentiles, their message was always "Jesus and the resurrection" (Acts 17:18).

It was on this account that their first contests among the Jews were with the Sadducees rather than with the Pharisees; "for the Sadducees say there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit, but the Pharisees confess both" (Acts 23:8). But for their testimony to the resurrection the Apostles and first Christians would have escaped most, if not all, of the persecutions which were visited upon them. For that testimony they suffered and died; and, hence, our word martyr, which is derived from a Greek word which means "a witness". To be a martyr signified at first only to be a witness to the resurrection of Christ; but such witnessing so invariably brought persecution and execution, that martyrdom quickly came to mean witnessing by death. It was for such witnessing that St. Stephen, the first martyr, was stoned to death (Acts 7:55-60).

Without the truth implied by the resurrection there would have been nothing worth dying for, and no motive for dying through devotion to Christ. Wherefore, Paul asked, in view of the denial of the resurrection by the Corinthian sceptics, "Why stand we in jeopardy every hour? I protest by the rejoicing I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily. If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die" (1 Cor. 15:30-32). Thus the Apostle teaches that without the resurrection merriment, not martyrdom, is the becoming and proper end of life. And so it is.

Faithless men are never martyrs, and an age of doubt is always an unheroic era.

But the Church was not founded by the children of luxury, but by the cross-bearing sons of light and life. With its Lord it rose from the sepulchre, and lived through the power of His resurrection.

We can not account for the existence of the Christian Church, unless we refer it to the resurrection of Christ. If He arose, the death-defying courage of the Apostles, the joyous sufferings of the first Christians and the speedy spread of Christianity throughout the Roman Empire are easily explained: but not otherwise. For if Jesus rose from the dead, He was what He claimed to be, the Son of God; and if such He was, His birth and resurrection were the most stupendous events in the history of mankind, and the gospel proclaimed by His witnessing disciples was the means chosen and used by the infinite wisdom of God to accomplish the purposes for which His Son became incarnate, suffered, died and rose again, and was indeed nothing less than "the power of God unto salvation". It is no wonder then that the Apostles were utterly fearless of the power of men, and that their brave words wrought conviction to the hearts of thousands who fell at their feet crying, "What shall we do to be saved?"

On the other hand, if Christ did not rise, the faith of His followers and the effect of their gospel upon the world is utterly inexplicable, and we are forced to believe that an imposture, or a delusion, saved the world at the time of supreme crisis and gave birth to the Christian Church.

In the first century a decayed and despairing world was sinking into hopeless chaos. But in the midst of its decay and death a new life began to appear and to take form in the Church. From city to city and land to land it spread until it had nearly overspread the known world. And that unearthly type of life has persisted through the changeful centuries of light and darkness, peace and war, until it has reached us in the distant land and modern days. And upon its continuance in the earth the hope of mankind depends.

All these blessed consequences have followed from the preaching of men and the living of saints who but for their belief that their Master did truly rise from the dead, would never have dared to devote themselves to His service, undismayed by pain and death.

Wherefore, the living Church today is still a supernatural witness to the resurrection of Christ. Without its faith in the Risen Lord, it would not and could not be living at all. If it uttered not a word, but simply stood before the world in the majestic silence of saintliness, it would be a testimony to Him whom it adores.

It is true that the Church can no longer say with St. John, "that which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life declare we unto you" (John 1:1-3), but while she can not affirm that she has seen Him in the flesh, she can declare unhesitatingly, "Because He lives, I live also"; and that witness is true. She cannot testify that she has seen Him in the body, but she can witness unto Him by exhibiting a celestial type of life which would be impossible if He had not lived as very man among men, suffered death, rose again from the grave, ascended into heaven, and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high. Such witnessing unto Him is her supreme office and high calling.

Wherefore, she will give no heed to them who say that belief in the resurrection of Christ is not essential to Christian living, as the rationalists, who are now called "modernists", do vainly talk. She knows that her Risen and Ascended Lord is the very source of her existence and support of her life.

With joyous confidence the members of the household of faith will salute one another with the exultant declaration "the Lord is risen indeed"; and exhort one another with the words, "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory" (Col. 3:1-4).

In this brave faith of the martyrs who witnessed to the Risen Christ by their deaths; in this faith of the saints of all ages who are "living still in spite of dungeon, fire and sword", let us rejoice on the Easter morn, and go "traveling home to God in the way our fathers trod".

The Church that ignores the fact of the resurrection dishonors its Lord, repudiates the source of its own being, and renounces the only hope of its continued existence.

The Church that forgets it impoverishes its life, and is ready to perish.

The Church that denies it ceases at once to be a Church at all; and the preacher who accounts it non-essential has nothing left which is essential for him to preach or for others to hear. Such a Church and such a preacher can not be witnesses for the Christ, nor will He honor and empower them by the outpouring of the Spirit upon them with power from on high (Acts 1:8).

The glad Easter, with its triumphant songs and holy services is itself a witnessing day that refreshes faith and kindles hope.

WARMTH

For homely, practical wisdom for every day and home use, the fables of Aesop may be ranked next to the proverbs of Solomon. The two men were four centuries apart and in countries separated from each other widely, as ancient conditions made distances, the one a powerful and opulent king, the other a Negro slave. They studied and saw the realities of life and reached like conclusions. "A soft answer turneth away wrath," wrote King Solomon, about 940 B. C. About 540 B. C., Aesop told—it is said he could not write—the fable of the North Wind and the Sun contending which should make a traveler yield his cloak. The harder the wind raged and tore the more closely was the cloak held and the more tightly wrapped. It was put aside quickly when the sun shone warmly. "Persuasion is better than force," is Aesop's teaching from his fable; but Aesop was a heathen and Solomon was considering worldly, material, diplomatic situations.

The New Testament confirms these older lessons for dealing with human mentality and temporal affairs and carries them on to the wider, higher, deeper realm of the spiritual. Every year at this season nature illustrates sound worldly philosophy and demonstrates one of the majestic lessons of the Gospels. Everywhere, on all sides of us, we see the power of kindly sunshine and genial warmth developing hidden beauty and latent value. Each bud and new leaf on bough or bush, each blade peering timidly from the earth, is new evidence. "The spangled heavens, a shining frame, their Great Original proclaim, Forever singing as they shine, The hand that made us is divine," Addison's great ode tells us. More insistently and plainly do the common, familiar things we constantly touch, at our sides and feet, testify of the same Omnipotence, remind us each spring of the duty imposed on us and the privilege conferred on us to try to make the world better and more fruitful of loveliness and usefulness by giving it from ourselves more warmth and sunshine.

It is astonishing how little perception of this the strongest and most profound of the Grecian and Latin philosophers, living amid natural conditions generally like ours, gathered or used. Plato, with wonderful mind and frequent flashes of insight into the most profound mysteries and the deepest truths, said trees and fields told him nothing, men being his teachers. It may be that the real poet is the one real and the soundest philosopher, seeing with his soul the inner meanings of things. Shakespeare found tongues in the trees the town bred, bookish Plato scorned and books in running brooks, sermons in stones, as Addison could hear the singing of the silent stars, and Burns could make pathetically beautiful philosophy from the uptorn nest of a field mouse. Study, by physician and chemist, of the nature from which Plato could learn nothing has brought to humanity enduring blessings and deliverances.

The Saviour, to whom there were no mysteries and who was Truth incarnate, who with a word could still to peace the wild tempest and who walked on turbulent seas securely and surely as a strong man on safe roads, gathered from fields and trees, flowers and birds, the daily tasks of farmer and shepherd, meaning and text, and for all the future instruction and inspiration. He gave glorious, eternally resounding, pleading, warning voice and aspect to humble, common things in which the stately, self trusting, reason guided philosopher could see nothing. The parable of the lost sheep has given comfort and hope to countless millions, turned sinners from sin to righteousness and led souls heavenward through long successions of generations, while all Plato's philosophy has attracted the admiration and directed to varied, and often confused, lines of thought the minds of a few.

Tolerance—firmly and sensibly restrained from complaisance with wanton and vicious defiance of laws of God and man—warmth, friendliness, kindliness, cordial sympathy with weakness and misfortune and wise, faithful, self-sacrificing labor to strengthen and relieve—these are taught us and urged on us by the springtime sunshine. "He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and the good and sendeth rain on the just and unjust," the Saviour tells us of His Father. Whether the evil and unjust respond with gratitude and service to the blessings given them is their responsibility for which they shall be held accountable. The duty, the part and the privilege of those seeking to serve and please the Almighty God is to demonstrate and illustrate His abounding mercy and long suffering goodness. God is love. To love God and strive to seek and share and express His spirit and purposes is the noblest and most beautiful of ambitions.

Each recurring spring—for some of us the last we shall see—woos and warns us to soften our hearts, to gather into them the life and lesson of Christ's warmth and light, to be diffused wherever we can reach. It is not for us to know where in the wide field of humanity our warmth and love and loving charity may be unrewarded, or may bring abundant yield. The sunlight filters through the densest shade to the darkest places in the forest and wakes to life and beauty and fragrance things dormant there, sends its long shafts of radiance through narrow crevices to the heart of blackest gloom. It is for us to learn from what we see all around us at this time of the year, from every growing and springing and awakening new life, the glory and use of warmth and love. The season exhorts us, with illimitable multitudes of appeal and demonstration, that cold condemnations, arid philosophies, hard ice of prejudice, must vanish; that to brighten the world for our fellow sojourners in it and share with all the faith and love garnered into our own souls is the supreme duty, the highest happiness, the most worthy work for our sojourn.

NO MONOPOLY OF THE CHRISTIAN HERITAGE

By the Reverend Canon Osborne Troop, M. A.

Rector-Emeritus of St. Martin's Church, Montreal.

Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He Himself said—

> "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear My Voice; and they shall become One Flock, One Shepherd" (St. John 10:16, R. V.).

ANY serious treatment of the above subject must, in the nature of things, lead us into the realm of age-long controversy; but controversy need not be un-Christian. It may be conducted in a spirit of honest inquiry, sincerely desirous that the truth should prevail. In that spirit I would now lay before the minds of intellectual readers the slowly-formed convictions of a long ministry as to the one cure of "our unhappy divisions".

1. My court of final appeal is, from first to last, the supreme authority of the Word and Spirit of the Living God. Proceeding with reverential care from step to step, I shall endeavor to show that neither the Roman Catholic Church nor any other part of Christendom possesses a monopoly of the Christian heritage.

2. It is not sufficiently realized that all Christians have an equal right of access to God. There can be no possible monopoly of the Lord's Prayer. All children of God are invited and encouraged to cry, "Our Father". Even so, all penitent sinners have an equal right to the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. "He died for all." He "tasted death for every man". He is "the Saviour of all men", says St. Paul; and he is careful to add, "specially of them that believe". Nor is there any monopoly of the Holy Spirit. "The Spirit and the Bride say 'Come; whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely'."

3. Indeed, it becomes manifest that even the Church Universal has no monopoly of the Everlasting Gospel. The whole Church holds the Gospel only as a sacred trust for all Mankind, for the benefit of the whole race. How comprehensive is the command of our Risen Lord: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature!"

4. No one can, with reason, deny that the Holy Bible belongs equally to all Christians; and, as before, the Church has no exclusive right to it. The Scriptures are committed to the whole body of believers; but only that they may be disseminated throughout the world.

5. No body of Christians enjoys a monopoly of Baptism. There is only "One Baptism". No one can possibly be baptized a Roman Catholic, an Anglican, a Presbyterian, or any other. He can only be baptized "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost"; and, in virtue of his baptism, he becomes, not necessarily in the deepest sense of a Christian, but a member of the whole Christian society, and entitled to share in its privileges and responsibilities. As St. Paul says of the ideal Baptism: "In one Spirit were we all baptized into one Body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free, and were all made to drink of one Spirit."

6. Wherever water is reverently used in the Name of the Blessed Trinity by any believer, ordained or unordained, there is a true Baptism, so far as its outward form is concerned, and, as such, it may not lawfully be repeated. Even the Roman Catholic Church recognizes the validity of baptism performed in emergency by a Roman Catholic nurse.

7. Any one who has been baptized in another Christian communion and then desires, for example, to unite with the Church of England, is not again baptized, but is welcomed as already a member of the Christian Church. This rule, for the most part, prevails throughout Christendom, and is entirely in accordance with Scripture. Even the Roman Church, in receiving a Protestant, does not presume to rebaptize him. A form of baptism, indeed, is used, but with the saving clause, "If thou are not already baptized, I baptize thee". In Christian courtesy, I should add, that of course I am not forgetting the conscientious difficulties of the Baptist, who regards the adult believer as the only person to be baptized, and immersion as the only proper mode.

8. It should be carefully noted that Baptism, though appointed by Christ, and of equal dignity with the Lord's Supper, may, in emergency, be validly performed by any Christian, man or woman. It is not limited to the Christian ministry. This, again, is wholly Scriptural.

9. We proceed further to find that there is no justifiable monopoly of the Lord's Table. Its very title should warn us that it belongs to the Lord and not to us. Baptism and the Lord's Supper, equally with the Scriptures, are entrusted to all Christians, and are intended for the equal benefit of all who, out of mankind, become believers.

10. It is just at this point that confusion is introduced by unscriptural claims. The Lord's Table is, unhappily, the very storm-centre of centuries of controversy, and involves the whole question of the validity of the Ministry. By a sacerdotal and exclusive view of the theory of Apostlical Succession, the Roman Church unchurches the Church of England, and in its turn the Anglo-Catholic section of the Church of England unchurches all other Protestant communions. The Roman Catholic and the extreme Anglican agree that only those who are episcopally ordained can rightfully minister at the Lord's Table; but it should be reverently observed that the Lord Himself, Whose the Holy Table is, has made no such restriction. The Holy Spirit, the Lord of Pentecost, is Christ's sole Vice-Gerent upon earth, and the same Spirit is the fountain-head of the Christian ministry. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty," and there is also unity. The Spirit gives right both of ministration and of access in all that pertains to the Eucharistic Feast. "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ," says St. Paul, "he is none of His." What heart-searching words are these for all of us!

11. We have now reached the most difficult and delicate part of our discussion, but I am constrained to maintain, with humble confidence, that there is no monopoly within the Christian Church even of the Christian ministry; and, further, that there is absolutely no authority given in the Scriptures to a Christian sacrificial priesthood. The Christian Church is unique in this. We are all familiar with such a priesthood among the heathen peoples; and with the Jewish priesthood, especially appointed by God. The New Testament speaks of heathen priests and of priests of the Jewish Order; it brings before us the glorious Temple of Jerusalem, with its altar and sacrifices; but never so much as once is the Christian minister spoken of as a priest, nor is the Lord's Table spoken of as an altar. Indeed, the late Bishop Lightfoot reminds us that, "It is a significant fact that the first instance of the term 'priest' applied to a Christian minister occurs in a heathen writer". He is careful to add, "at least I have not found any example of this application earlier than Lucian".

12. The late Bishop Westcott, in reference to the sacred words of the Risen Lord, recorded by St. John, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost", makes this most weighty and unequivocal statement:

> "The gift is conveyed once for all. No provision is laid down for its transmission. It is made part of the life of the whole society, flowing from the relation of the Body to the Risen Saviour. Thus the words are, I repeat, the charter of the Christian Church, and not simply the charter of the Christian Ministry. They complete what Christ had begun, and could only begin, before His Passion. He had given to His disciples the power of the keys to open the treasury of the Kingdom of Heaven, and dispense things new and old. He had given them power to bind and to loose, to fix and to unfix ordinances for the government of the new Society. And now, as Conqueror, He added the authority to deal with sins. In saying this, I do not touch upon the Divine necessity, by which the different persons and channels, through which the manifold graces of the Christian life are administered, were afterwards marked out. I wish only to insist upon the Apostolic mission of all Christians, which no subsequent delegation of specific duties can annul. . . . . All Christians, as such, are indeed Apostles, envoys of their Risen Lord. To ministers and to people alike, while they are as yet undistinguished, He directs the words of sovereign power—in the announcement of His victory over death and sin—'Peace be unto you; as the Father hath sent Me, even so send I you. Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whosesoever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them; whosesoever sins ye retain, they are retained'."

13. It is a fact too often overlooked that even our Lord Himself, while on earth, was not a priest, but, in His human nature, a layman. He was not of the priestly tribe, or family of Aaron, but of the royal tribe of Judah. When He laid down His life for the sin of the world He was not sacrificed by a priest upon an altar. As the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews tells us, "He suffered without the gate". No one took His life from Him; He laid it down of Himself. The whole Roman Army would have been powerless to slay Him had He chosen not to die. We are told in majestic language, that "He through the Eternal Spirit, offered Himself, without spot, to God". In well-known words, He was "Himself the Victim and Himself the Priest". By this sacrifice of Himself, once for all offered, He "put away sin" for ever; and, in virtue of this sacrifice, He also became "a priest for ever, after the Order of Melchizedek", but not after the Order of Aaron. Like each of us, He had, as Man, but one life, and, having died, it is impossible for Him to die again. "Death hath no more dominion over him." Not even He, then, can repeat His sacrifice. How impossible is it, therefore, for any human priest to offer Him "for the living and the dead" in the so-called "Sacrifice of the Mass"!

14. Moreover, when our Redeemer instituted the Lord's Supper, He did not celebrate it as a priest, at an altar, but as a layman at a table, in the course of the Feast of the Passover. Nor were the disciples fasting, for it was "while they were eating" that He gave them to eat of that Bread and to drink of that Cup. These simple considerations show conclusively that the Lord's Table can never properly be an altar, nor can he who ministers at it be a sacrificing priest.

15. We do not forget that the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says, "We have an altar"; but Lightfoot makes it unmistakably clear that the inspired writer is not speaking of the Lord's Table. The only Christian altar is the unique and terrible altar of the Cross; and that altar has for ever disappeared, and has left no successor. If an objector should appeal to the authority of "Catholic Tradition", our Lord's mighty words most solemnly remind us of those, who made "the Word of God of none effect by their tradition", vainly seeking to worship while teaching for their doctrines "the commandments of men".

16. Christ Himself is our Priest—our great High Priest, Confessor and Judge. We need no other. He is the one perfect Mediator through Whom every believer has free access to the Eternal Father. And, wonder of wonders, all believers share in Christ's royal priesthood. There is no special class of Christian priests recognized by God; but every single believer shares equally in his Saviour's priesthood. Christ is the Head of the Body, the Church, and as members of His Body we partake of His priesthood. Lightfoot, in his immortal essay on "The Christian Ministry", clearly states that "the most exalted office in the Church, the highest gift of the Spirit, conveyed no sacerdotal right which was not enjoyed by the humblest member of the Christian community". He further says: "It must be borne in mind that the minister's function is represented without being vicarial. He is a priest as the mouthpiece, the delegate of a priestly race. His acts are not his own, but the acts of the congregation. . . . " It may be a general rule," he goes on, "it may be under ordinary circumstances a practically universal law, that the highest acts of congregational worship shall be performed through the principal officers of the congregation. But an emergency may arise when the spirit and not the letter must decide. The Christian ideal will then interpose and interpret our duty. The higher ordinances of the universal priesthood will over-rule all special limitations. The layman will assume functions which are otherwise restricted to the ordained ministers." It may be added that Lightfoot quotes with approval of Tertullian, who says: "Where there is no bench of clergy, you present the eucharistic offerings, and baptize, and are your own sole priest. For where three are gathered together, there is a Church, even though they be laymen."

17. If the above paragraph be accepted as true, and it is founded, be it remembered, strictly on the Scriptures, then the practical consequences for our own day are of priceless value. As the present Bishop of Durham has recently said: "Above the Papacy, above General Councils, above every conceivable ecclesiastical authority, we set the Word written". The authority of the Scriptures supersedes the unwarranted claims of an exclusive priesthood, and Christian unity is seen to embrace without distinction all believers. The devout Presbyterian, for instance, is as valid a priest as the devout Anglican or Romanist, and that without distinction of minister or layman. All Christians are reduced to a level as to their common priesthood, and the ministers become only duly authorized officers and leaders of the Christian community.

18. We can see at once of what inestimable value this neglected truth is to the scattered Christian communities, for example, in our own Northwest. The universal priesthood, once intelligently embraced, meets all possible emergencies; for where there are believers, however few, absence of the ordained ministry does not cut them off from their Christian worship or sacraments. The Spirit of Christ is with them, and they are perfectly justified in ministering to each other until such time as an ordained minister can be secured. The noble simplicity of the Gospel of Christ thus becomes the security of every believer and guarantees the supply of all his need. No conceivable emergency can possibly separate the believer from his Lord.

19. With my whole soul I believe the above statements to rest upon the supreme authority of the Scriptures, as upon the very Rock of Ages; and I am supported in this conviction by the vast learning and dispassionate conclusions of both Lightfoot and Westcott, whose memory the world of Christian scholarship delights to honor. Their printed words are the more weighty now that they have passed into the nearer Presence of the King of Glory. Into that wondrous Presence we may at any moment be called to follow them. Their reasoning is calm and balanced, as if at the very feet of Him Who said, in simple majesty, "I am the Truth". They bear strong testimony to the early development of the Historic Episcopate out of the New Testament ministry; but they unchurch no body of believers in the Son of God, nor do they discredit the orderly ministry of any Christian community.

20. In conclusion, it should, perhaps, be pointed out that the Prayer Book of the Anglican Church never calls the Lord's Table an altar, and that the Anglican "priest" holds the office of a New Testament presbyter or elder. In the familiar words of the judicious Hooker, the word "priest" in the Prayer Book is "presbytery writ short". While I am fully aware that what I have written is unlikely to receive any serious attention from ecclesiastical authorities, yet as a humble Christian and loyal presbyter of the Church of England, I venture to send it forth in the assurance that, in so far as it may be true, the God of Truth will not suffer it to perish. We may well take comfort from the words of the Lord Jesus: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." "Every one that is of the truth heareth My voice." Furthermore, our Lord is soon coming back to gather in His own from the living and the dead that they may be with him and with each other for ever. It is obvious that, in that glorious reunion of the faith, there will be no possible place for division among them. We shall then, for all eternity, "dwell together in unity". Why should we not, as far as possible, anticipate that unity now?

"The earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the unveiling of the SONS of God." So says St. Paul in the Greek of Romans 8:19. The sons of God constitute the Holy Church, the true Body of the living Christ. At present they are hidden from mortal gaze: but they are to be unveiled at the Personal Return of our Lord, even as it is written—"When He Who is our Life shall appear, then shall we also appear with Him in glory." Then, and not till then, shall the world at large be convinced that Christ is indeed the Son of God. Then also will it become clear that our Lord's great high-priestly prayer, in St. John 17, has been heard and answered from the beginning, "that they all may be One, as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be One in Us". This is the true Christian unity. Christ never promised that there should be One Fold. But He did promise that both Jewish and Gentile believers should become One Flock, under Himself, the One Shepherd. Even so, come, Lord Jesus!—Reprinted from The Gazette, Montreal.

HISTORIC PERIODS OF FREDERICKSBURG.

Mrs. Vivian Minor Fleming.

The old town of Falmouth, situated at the mouth of the Falls of the Rappahannock, in Stafford County, Virginia, was first built on fifty acres of land, purchased of Major William Todd in 1728, and regularly laid off in streets, squares and lots. Its government was vested in seven trustees appointed by the House of Burgesses of Virginia. The original trustees, as given by the old town record-book, were Robert Carter, President; Nicholas Smith, John Fitzhugh, Charles Carter, Henry Fitzhugh, John Warner, surveyor, and William Thornton.

In 1773, by an amendment of its charter, these trustees were made elective by the qualified voters of the town and their president empowered to act as mayor.

At the head of navigation of the Rappahannock river its situation made it formerly the market of all that section of the country lying above it between the Blue Ridge Mountains and Tidewater, which supplied it with grain for a great milling business and for export trade, for in those days Falmouth had a regular trade with foreign countries, a thing impossible for a great many years on account of the filling up of the river to an extent, rendering it no longer navigable to sea-going vessels.

Wagon trains, miles in length, loaded with grain, were frequently seen approaching it from the mountains, merchant ships anchored at its wharf to purchase flour and other products, and sea captains and sailors moved constantly through its streets. Its storage capacity was not equal to its trade and hogsheads of sugar and molasses lined its streets and the road to Gordon's store, near the wharf. Basil Gordon, its owner, was an early millionaire in the United States. He built for his home the large brick house nearest the bridge, the tradition being that the bricks, brass locks, etc., were brought from England in his returning ships.

Falmouth was also prominent in military matters. The Falmouth Blues were led in the famous charge upon the redoubt at Yorktown by their brave commander, Captain William Payne. He was a citizen of Falmouth and raised the company referred to for the Revolution. He was given 3,000 acres by Virginia for his service during the war.

George Washington was born in Westmoreland, but reared in the present county of Stafford, and received at school in Falmouth intellectual training which prepared him for his future career as liberator of his country. In a sketch of family history, written by Washington himself, the only mention made of scholastic advantages is that he attended school there, and it has been well said that no other municipality, ancient or modern, has the distinction of having begun the education of the father of so magnificent a Republic. In this connection will say when General Washington made his celebrated march from Long Island to Yorktown his troops came by the old stage road through Falmouth to Fredericksburg, thence to Yorktown.

Hon. Alexander H. Seddon, Secretary of War of our Confederacy, was one of its citizens, and it furnished distinguished officers and brave soldiers to the Lost Cause. Among the officers, Col. William Green, of the Forty-seventh Virginia Regiment, was killed while marshalling his forces, not far distant from where his grandfather, Captain William Payne (above mentioned), led his nearly a century before. Captain Jack Forbes and Sergeant George Kelly also gave their lives as a tribute to the Confederacy.

The grandmother of the Duchess of Marlborough was born in Falmouth in the house afterwards occupied by Dr. Rose. She was a relative of the "Fall Hill" Thorntons and the Forbes.

The old Dunbar house, completely effaced by fire about twenty-five years ago, was famous for its beautiful grounds and frontal garden and conservatory, woodwork and exquisite furniture. The last owner, of the name Miss Anna Dunbar, a great-granddaughter of Lady Spottswood, died there in extreme old age and it passed to others.

"Belmont," on the edge of the town, now owned by the celebrated artist, Gari Melchers, was built for Susannah Knox, nee Fitzhugh, by her father, Fitzhugh, of Chatham. Her tomb is still in Falmouth cemetery. Between this and the present brick church there was once an old colonial church, long since moldered to decay. It was of wood, built in the form of a cross, and above the Carter pew the family coat of arms was blazoned. It was destroyed by fire or time's ravages more than a hundred years ago. In this same cemetery is buried one of the officers of Napoleonic wars, who was exiled by Louis XVIII, as recorded on his tombstone. He and Lafayette embraced and kissed each other when they met on the occasion of Lafayette's visit here in 1824. Another old grave is that of Jean de Baptist, merchant. At that time Falmouth was a busy mart of commerce and strangers from many nations drifted into it.

An aged lady of this city, who died about forty years ago, said she went to a large ball when she was fifteen years old at the old Falmouth tavern or inn, given in celebration of some important occasion, probably the victory and peace of 1816, as the dates would correspond. Being her first ball she was particularly impressed by the beauty of the costumes worn by the ladies. She was Mrs. R. H. Carmichael.

Besides the extensive milling operations of wheat and corn another important industry of Falmouth of former times was the manufacture of cotton goods. A large brick cotton factory was built and owned by Duff Green.

Moncure D. Conway, the eminent author, was a Falmouth man and this able and reliable antiquarian, in Magazine of American History, Vol. 27, No. 3, page 186, says that the fort on the Rappahannock river was on the north side of the river and that Falmouth was the center of the military district commanded by Major Lawrence Smith. He was empowered to execute "martial discipline among the soldiers so put in arms", both in times of war and peace, and with "two others of said privileged place", he was to hear and determine all cases, civil or criminal, that should arise in said limits, as a county court might do, and to make by-laws for the same

The historic lustre of Falmouth and its business importance belong to the past, but doubtless a few years in future it will be incorporated in a Greater Fredericksburg, even as Manchester has been absorbed by Richmond, for this city is slowly but surely building out to meet it.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart" (Psalm 119:11).

This week the following verse was submitted by Miss Alice B. Joynes, of Washington, D. C.:

"I am the good shepherd: the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep" (St. John 10:11).

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

THE EASTER EVANGEL

By the Reverend Dyson Hague, Toronto, Canada

LHE dominant note of Easter is—life. Life—leaping victorious from the grave. Life—triumphant over the Winter of death. Life—invincible by time. Life—reincarnate in the victorious Prince of Glory. Life—in the ever-living Sovereign of the unseen realms. Maclaren of Manchester once declared that, in a time of haunting national peril, a great preacher of another age was found sitting, abstracted, in his study. But while he sat the shadows seemed to flee away, and his face took on the lighting of the dawn. For he traced on the table with his fingers, two words: "Vivit! Vivit!" He lives! He lives! The dynamic of that Easter fact transformed and illumined his inmost soul. He felt in that dark moment that men might come and men might go; leaders, teachers, thinkers, fall silent; the foundations of the earth seem out of course; but He liveth! He liveth! That was the guarantee of everlasting victory for Christ and His Church.

Three hundred years later another great English preacher was lifted one Easter-tide to a new plane of victorious faith by a sudden consciousness of the same wonderful fact. Jesus was not entombed in the oblivion of history. Christ's influence was not the mere aftermath of one of those immortal dead who live in lives made better by their presence. Jesus Christ is living. Jesus Christ is living today! Ever after that he felt as if every Sunday was Easter Day. The consciousness of Jesus Christ being alive swept into his soul as a new revelation of life and victory.

And to a myriad million since, and to millions today, the secret of faith's victory is: I know that my Redeemer liveth. All down the centuries this has been in Him. The fountain of His ever-living personality pours out its streams of refreshing life, because He ever liveth to make intercession for us. He said, "Because I live, you shall live also". "What attracted me to Christianity," said a young Japanese not long ago to one of our missionaries, "was your preaching the Living Christ. Our gods are all dead. I never heard before of a Living God." The need of the Christless world today is the Gospel of Life in the One who lives. Buddha is dead. Confucius is dead. Mohamet is dead. But the Living Word, the Living God, the Living Church, the Christ who lives, and is alive forevermore, these are the glorious watchwords of the Easter Evangel.

Once more, then, as a burst of sudden glory, let the old, but ever fresh evangel break in upon us. Let all the joy of its ever gladdening life once more elate us. In a world that's tragic with sorrow and pain and disappointed hopes, let the glorious news that "He is risen" bring victory. Once more let the bells of Easter peal out the triumph of His Resurrection. Once more let the singers take up the song that is ever vibrant with joy; Jesus Christ is risen today. Once more let us face the unknown future, radiant with peace. Christ has abolished death. The Final Battle is won! Christ has opened Paradise. The best is yet to come. Life is stronger than death. Love is mightier than hate. Truth is victorious over falsity. Right shall triumph over wrong. The grave is not our goal. The King is on the Throne. He lives. He reigns. He comes again. One day the Day will break and the shadows flee away, because He liveth! He liveth!

WHO CHANGED THE SABBATH?

By Miss Bertha L. Ahrens, Chandler, Okla.

THE Sabbath has not been changed; it still falls on the seventh day of the week, but it belongs to the Jews only. For Christians, the Lord Himself provided the first day of the week to be their holy day. This fact He represented in Old Testament time by first-day types and in New Testament time brought it to pass in Christ.

The first day of the week is not mentioned in the New Testament till it records "Christ risen from the dead". Then, suddenly, every Gospel writer uses the new phrase, "the first day of the week" (Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; John 20:1). Why this new phrase? Each evangelist could have told the resurrection facts without mention of a first day. Matthew could have said, "At the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn toward morning", but he said, "The first day of the week", putting in every word of it, and so did they all. There must have been a strong reason for the phrase.

Mark could have said, "When the Sabbath was past, early in the morning they came", but he said, "The first day of the week". Why?

Luke could have said, "The next day after the Sabbath they came", but he said, "First day of the week". Had he not a reason for it?

John could have said, "The day after the Sabbath", but he said, "On the first day of the week". And the word week seems to have been as necessary as the word first, for each one connected the week with the first day.

John, not satisfied with one mention of the first day, points it out a second time, saying, "The same day at evening, being the first day of the week, when the disciples were assembled" (John 20:19). Why did he not say, "The same day, at evening", and let it go at that? Why again say, "First day of the week"? What made the phrase so precious, or what put it into the minds of those four writers of the Gospels? There is but one answer: "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable," first of all, "for doctrine" (2 Tim. 3:16).

Can we ignore or belittle these inspired utterances?

II.

We note another fact: Never did Christ call His disciples brethren (in the spiritual sense) until He had risen from the dead (John 15:15; 20-17).

And still another fact: Never till then did inspiration record a meeting with them or a so-called first day of the week—never till after His resurrection; then, suddenly, we read of brethren and of a meeting with them in holy fellowship, on the first day of the week. Why did not inspiration rather take pains to record that Jesus met with them on the Sabbath? It could have been so a week later and every Sabbath for forty days. But instead of a meeting on a Sabbath, we read: "And after eight days again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them." Thomas, evidently, had been invited to the meeting for that day—it also was the first day of the week. And, Jesus did not disappoint their expectation. He met them "in holy convocation" (John 20:24-29).

Why do we not read that this occurred on the Sabbath? Why entire silence about Sabbath observance after the Lord's resurrection?

The Purpose In It.

There must have been a purpose in this silence and in the emphasis on the first day of the week. There was a purpose—it was this: God was beginning to fulfill the historical meanings of first-day types of holy days, given in the twenty-third chapter of Leviticus. There, connected with the "feasts of the Lord", we find five first days to be observed exactly as the Sabbath was observed—as "a day of holy convocation" and "no servile work". These two requirements applied to a first day the same as to a seventh day (Lev. 23:3, 8, 35, 39).

In the same chapter we find one first day which the people were not expressly bidden to observe as the other first days (vv. 10, 11). Why not? Let us seek the reason: In those feasts (which include the regular seventh-day Sabbath) every first day (and also every seventh day) has its own prophetic meaning, each pointing to a different event in the history of God's people—an event due at a set time (the time unknown to us). That is one reason these feasts are called set feasts (Num. 29:39).

The resurrection of Christ was the first event set for fulfilment. It was represented by the firstfruit sheaf of wheat (Lev. 23:10, 11, 14; 1 Cor. 15:20, 23). That sheaf was to be brought and waved before the Lord on a first day—the day after the regular seventh day Sabbath. Compare Leviticus 23:11, 15, 16; Matthew 28:1.

It was this particular first day which the Jews were not required to observe by "holy convocation". And, why not? All the other first days had to be kept holy—why not this one? Because this one represented the Christian's holy day, and not under the law that says, "Thou shalt" (Rom. 6:14; 4:15), and because God knew that the Jew, as a nation, could not fit into the plan for the Christian; the Jew as such, must remain under law; and his holy day must continue to be the seventh day. God, therefore, could not invite the Jew to feast with Him "in holy convocation" on that day which pointed to the Christian's holy convocation—the Christian's feast of fellowship with God. Such a first day feast was impossible under Old Testament conditions even in a type, with men who would, acting nationally, reject the Lord and the event promised in that sheaf on that first day.

But when Christ had risen, and thereby could have and claim spiritual brethren, this first day—the day after the Sabbath—became an actual feast of firstfruit occasion—at once we read of precious holy meetings in fellowship on that first day of the week. It filled the type.

III.

But meetings with Jesus on first days, did not establish the day for the organized church—there was as yet no Church of the New Testament. It was yet to be formed and baptized into Christ at the next feast—the feast of Pentecost, fifty days after the sheaf was waved (Lev. 23: 15-17).

"And when the day of Pentecost was fully come," it fell on a first day of the week, and so fulfilled the type of first day, and also the type of the bread offering (Lev. 23:15-17, 20; 1 Cor. 10:17; 12:13; James 1:18).

Of this day the Lord said: "Ye shall proclaim on the selfsame day, that it may be a day of holy convocation unto you; ye shall do no servile work therein. It shall be a statute forever in your generations" (Lev. 23:21).

And so, under statute law the Jew had to make that proclamation once a year, concerning the fiftieth day from the sheaf offering; thus to introduce the day, the first day of the week, as a holy day. Was it not done for the benefit of the Church? If typical Pentecost at all applies its meaning to the Church (and it does), then to the Church also applies the proclamation to make the day a holy convocation, and no servile work therein.

And, we find that the first Christians observed the day, not once a year only, as did the Jews, but observed it every week, as already practiced by Christ and His disciples all the fifty days before Pentecost (John 20:1, 19, 24-26; Acts 2:1; 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2).

Thus we have the first day of the week by the fulfilled meaning of the sheaf offering, by the meaning of the bread offering, by proclamation, and by the example of Christ and the first Christians.

In the feast chapter, Leviticus 23, when a first day points forward to Church events, then such day is not called Sabbath, but it is called holy (Lev. 23:7, 11, 15-17, 21). These days do not point to the Church exclusively, but do so with special intent toward the Church (Rom. 11:18, 24-27).

Only two typical first days are called Sabbath: the first day of the seventh month is a Sabbath, and the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles is a Sababth (Lev. 23:24, 34, 35, 39). This because these first days point to future Jewish history, without reference to the Church. No "Sabbath" points to Church history. The regular seventh day Sabbath is under law that worketh wrath (Exod. 31:14-15; Num. 15:32-36; Rom. 4:15).

First-day types point to new beginning under better conditions. Therefore no penalty clause is attached to a first day. It is freed from law. Therefore, we have a holy day but no Sabbath (Col. 2:16, 17; Rom. 10:4; 6-14).

IV.

The seventh day clause in the fourth commandment is the constitutional foundation of the plan that runs through the seven covenants, the seven feasts, the seven-year-long Sabbaths and the seven dispensations, etc. The Ten Commandments are God's constitution for all the universe. It embodies ten moral principles which are eternal and unchangeable; but the seventh day is not a moral principle; it is a time limit which will be removed when no longer needed.

God works out redemption in time cycles of seven. When a cycle has run its course, He begins another seven cycle with a first day. What should hinder His saying to the Jew: "Keep holy the seventh day, the last one in this cycle"; and saying to the Christian: "Keep holy the first day of the same cycle."

Does That Change Any Moral Principle?

No. Does it substitute the first day for the seventh? No, the first day has always been one of the seven, but has not always been used as a holy day. Many centuries passed before there were Christians to whom the Lord could assign the first day to keep it holy; but when the time arrived, then, at once, as we have seen, the first day of the week was introduced; and, every moral precept of the Ten Commandments was repeated in the New Testament, but the command to observe the seventh day was not repeated anywhere in the New Testament. It is not for Christians (Col. 2:14-16).

But if God intended to assign the first day to Christians, why does not the fourth commandment say something about it? For the same reason that it says nothing about death penalty to follow violation of the seventh day. A constitution is only the foundation, and leaves details of administration to laws and ordinances that must follow. Seven is God's symbol of redemption; and, the small seven cycles in the fourth commandment embodies His purpose to redeem all things from the curse of the law that is founded on this same constitution and the seventh day observance belongs to the people chosen of God as the custodians of law and covenant (John 4:22; Rom. 3:1-2; 9:4, 5). When the process of redemption is finished, every day will be holy (Heb. 4:9-11).—Selected.

APPOMATTOX AND STONE MOUNTAIN.

By H. H. Smith.

On April 9, sixty-three years after Lee surrendered at Appomattox, the figure of General Lee, astride his horse, Traveler, carved on the side of Stone Mountain, near Atlanta, will be unveiled. The statue of Lee measures one hundred and thirty feet from the hoofs of his horse to the crown of his head, and is said to be one of the largest carvings in the history of the world. It is the work of Augustus Lukeman.

Great men show their true greatness in the hour of adversity. Let us turn for a moment to that memorable day in April, 1865. Fitzhugh Lee gives the following account of General Lee's farewell to his soldiers at Appomattox: "They pressed up to him, anxious to touch his person or even his horse, and copious tears washed from strong men's cheeks the stains of powder. Slowly and painfully he turned to his soldiers, and with voice quivering with emotion, said: 'Men, we have fought through the war together; I have done my best for you; my heart is too full to say more.'"

The next day he took formal leave of his army and issued his farewell address. In this memorable address he stated that the army had been "compelled to yield to overwhelming numbers and resources", and that he had "determined to avoid the useless sacrifice of those whose past services have endeared them to their countrymen". "You will take with you," he said, "the satisfaction that proceeds from the consciousness of duty faithfully performed; and I earnestly pray that a merciful God will extend to you His blessing and protection. With an increasing admiration of your constancy and devotion to your country, and a grateful remembrance of your kind and generous consideration of myself, I bid you an affectionate farewell."

Dr. Wm. E. Hatcher, in his book, "Along the Trail of the Friendly Years," as an eye-witness, gives a vivid picture of General Lee's return to Richmond after the surrender at Appomattox:

"But I saw another sight in connection with Richmond's fall which I confess thrilled me a thousand times more than all the glory of the victorious armies of the Republic. It was a spectacle that broke upon me most unexpectedly; it came while the heavens were black with storm and the streets were wild with flooding rains.

"What I saw was a horseman. His steed was bespattered with mud, and his head hung down as if worn by long traveling. The horseman himself sat his horse like a master; his face was rigid with self-respecting griefs; his garments were worn in the service and stained with travel; his hat was slouched and spattered with mud and only another unknown horseman rode with him, as if for company and for love. Even in the fleeting moment of his passing my gate, I was awed by his incomparable dignity. His majestic composure, his rectitude and his sorrow, were so wrought and blended into his visage and so beautiful and impressive to my eyes that I fell into violent weeping. To me there was only one where this one was; there could be only one that day, and that one was still my own revered and cherished leader, stainless in honor, resplendent and immortal even in defeat, my own, my peerless chieftain, Robert E. Lee.

"In that lone way, in the midst of rain and mire, with no crowds to hail him, with no resounding shouts to welcome him, with no banners flapping about him, did he come back from disastrous war. But, ah! we did not know. Conquered and solitary he was, but yet he wore invisible badges of victory; he carried spoils of honor and conquest which could never fail, and in every step of his sad moving he was marching forward to take his place in the balance courts of universal fame."

AN EXPLANATION

John S. Littell

Mr. Editor:

You were good enough to print last August a letter from me pleading for peace in the Church through better understanding, with some data indicating how this may be given effect. You also very courteously removed my letter from the correspondence column for which it was intended and placed it in the body of the paper. Now I think it is time for something more on the same line. This I gather from reading all the Church papers. My former plea for understanding leading to peace brought out some pleasant reactions. Only one man wrote otherwise: and anonymously I wonder if an anonymous attack is entirely ethical. I do not charge it against Virginia, for it was postmarked New York. I hope this letter will provoke neither anonymity nor animosity. Let us strive to be as just, and as much like brethren, as Our Lord wishes us to be.

You know the custom of naming a subject at the outset in order that all may know what it is. But in this case I am not going to name my subject until I have properly led up to it.

1. MATTER AND SPIRIT.

THE modern world is aware of a conflict between science and religion. Science deals with the measurement, content and combinations of matter. Psychology deals with matter organized in the human system. It traces reactions in nerves and brain, and their influence over the emotions and in the mind. Our lives are set in the world of matter. Most of our calculations on life have to do with forces which are of a material kind. Science dealing with matter cannot find any sufficient explanation of man or the universe. For such an explanation it turns to religion.

Religion deals with mystery. Mystery is something not physically known and not physically knowable. Religion explains things knowable, but does not start with them or work with them exclusively as science does. Religion explains the origin of things. It assumes things must have an origin, and it finds all origin in God. Science has no way of finding origin, and so science inclines to take the word of religion that the origin of all things is God. To take that is better for science than forever to have no explanation at all. Origin demands some explanation and so does the growth of things, particularly life. Life has a direction in which it moves, and it must have a purpose. Purpose as well as origin point scientific men away from science which furnishes them no clue, to religion which does furnish a clue. Religion gives the clue in God. Of God we know by science only that He must be, His existence explains things. God is a mystery science cannot know or teach. In the study of the whole of existence, science finds in the end that religion starts out a friend to science, and science is thus far ready to agree with it.

2. IMMORTALITY.

The common man in his own experience finds out what the philosophers have found out. Physical forces are not so entirely his master. There is a way in which matter and force are his servants, and he is the master. The reality is not in matter but in the man—the personality. the object of life is to be looked for in man. Man is something above matter.

Here you find your common sense of immortality. Physically, when a man dies, he goes out—quits—ceases to live. But a man knows his life is not for that. He knows he did not come all by physical process and growth. He knows at the last he came from God. Without that origin and the purpose attached to it he could not come at all. Any possible origin and purpose are fulfilled in immortality.

Physically, nothing is harder to believe than immortality. No geometry or physics inform us where God is, where heaven is. If God is, then heaven is, and how they are only religion can suggest.

Yet man believes in immortality because he believes in God. Religion holds God a mystery. Religion cannot define God in any physical terms. Religion holds immortality, but cannot define the life after death in any physical terms; nor in any terms we can deal with or understand. Immortality, to religion, is a mystery.

Now at this point let us enter one more factor. That is Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ revealed God so men knew God as they had never known Him before. Jesus Christ brought to light life and immortality. It is not only by what He said that Jesus Christ brought immortality to light, but by what He did. Our strongest faith in immortality is substantiated by the Resurrection of Jesus Christ.

3. THE RISEN CHRIST.

The Resurrection of Jesus Christ has always been central in the Christian message. It adds an explanation to life, clearing up as science cannot clear up our purpose and destiny in life.

Now when Jesus Christ rose from the dead, He entered the spiritual world. He entered immortality which we know is not in this physical world, but it is in a real world, heaven, or where God is. That is a mystery. We cannot define or describe it. It yields to no physical terms or laws which we by science know of.

Yet, we can think of the Risen Christ as a reality, as a person, as a representative of our human race. He was able to carry our human nature to the mystery we call God and heaven. He, the Eternal Son of God, took our nature here, and took it there when He rose from the dead. He enters the mystery of God and immortality. He is there the immortal head of humanity, leading us on and up. We do not know in any physical terms what His life is, or what ours shall be. We know Him only under the terms of the mystery. We look to Him as the head of humanity and as the ruler of personal and racial destiny. How far He rules in the physical world by the direction of its energies and movements we do not know. But we suspect it may be more than we know.

Now when Jesus Christ promised to feed us with His flesh, to give us His Body and His Blood, it is evident that He intended to keep His promise in terms of life, His life, His RISEN life, which now is in a mystery we do not know. The presence promised is the presence of the Risen Christ. And so His Presence can never be thought of in terms of actually physical materials. Nor even can our own souls. The soul is God's, and of God, and the only food of the soul is God. But not in terms of physical food. The food for the body is physical, but the food of the soul is spiritual.

St. Paul is fully responsive to his Lord when he applies this to the communion, "The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the Body of Christ"? We learn elsewhere how conscious St. Paul was of the difference between the natural and the spiritual. We learn how sure he is of the Risen Lord. We have every reason, therefore, to insist that the Body he speaks of is the spiritual and heavenly Body of the Risen Christ.

St. Paul warned Christians against receiving the Sacrament without discerning the Lord's Body. He said it was a danger to the unready soul. Mere bread can be no such danger. He was speaking of something real though, of course, not physical or material. There was a necessity to receive discerning the Lord's Body. After him, an old Bishop who was martyred for his faith (St. Ignatius of Antioch) wrote explaining that the reason why some did not come to Church was because they did not realize "that the eucharist is the flesh of our Saviour, whom the Father raised". He too evidently looked for the Body which was glorified.

Thus Christians took the real presence as part of their faith. Everywhere the Lord's service, the communion, was the service in which they would worship on the Lord's Day.

You see the Lord's eucharistic presence came from the mystery of heaven. It cannot be placed under our physical system of measurement, analysis, or description. Many of those who held firmly to the Real Presence wherein they worshipped Christ, but, mark you, never worshipped bread and wine, would at the same time speak of the bread and wine of the Sacrament. Their faith and their love led them away from the physical, so they tended more to speak of the higher reality, the heavenly Body and Blood of Christ. This entire freedom to think and to speak as one could about the Presence continued for hundreds of years. Long after, in the middle ages, there arose a long discussion about what the Eucharistic Presence could mean. Even then, all felt free to think of it as they could. The manner of the Presence was a mystery. But the fact of the Presence was affirmed and felt.

4. TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

But in 1215, this old Catholic liberty was taken away in the Church in the West. One-half of the Catholic Church declared that the bread and wine ceased to exist, that its substance was changed into the Body and Blood of Christ. Material of bread was made to vanish, and the material of the Body of Christ was made to occupy its place. Christ descended from heaven and entered into what still appeared to be bread. The priest holds his Maker IN HIS HANDS. So Cardinal Hayes and the Censor

The Papacy stands for a dogma of Transubstantiation. The Papacy says no man can be saved without believing in that way.

Now I have shown that the Bible does not make it so. The early Church did not make it so. History does not make it so. But the Roman Church says it is so. That is Transubstantiation, which I most deeply regret to see writers in The Southern Churchman, the Churchman and the Chronicle continue to wish over on some of us who are most distinct in NOT holding it. The faith we hold is that of the Gospel and St. Paul and the Church un-Romanized. Our idea is that of our own Church.

But Cardinal Newman shows that Roman Catholics even in modern times do not agree about this dogma of Transubstantiation. I will not even affirm that Cardinal Newman's belief is Transubstantiation. I think most Roman Catholics, people or authorities, would say that it is not. I think they would call it rank heresy. I do know for a certainty that when they come to tell what Transubstantiation really is, and what people may and must believe about it, they seldom if ever quote the explanation of Cardinal Newman. Here it is: 1877. "Our Lord is in loco in heaven, not (in the same sense) in the Sacrament. Our Lord neither descends from heaven upon our altars, nor moves when carried in procession. He is in the Holy Eucharist after the manner of a spirit. We do not know how. We have no parallel to the 'how' in our experience. We can only say that He is present, not according to the natural manner of bodies, but sacramentally. His presence is spiritwise, sacramental; an absolute mystery, not against reason, however, but against imagination, and must be received by faith." That does not sound Roman. It sounds much more as in accord with St. John 6 and St. Paul and the Catholic past and the teachings of our own Church.

5. THE PRAYER BOOK.

Our Church teaches that Our Lord Jesus Christ is present in the sacrament. Now you have this to understand in its proper meaning. Our Lord now is not of this natural physical world, but glorified by Resurrection and of the spiritual world, the mystery of heaven where God is and where we shall be when we have put off this physical body. It is this our Church means when it speaks, in His own language and St. Paul's and St. John's, of His Body, Blood and Flesh. The terms sound physical and perhaps difficult. But they are His terms and Apostolic terms. We must not shrink from them. They stand for a reality, though we may not know how to describe it.

Our Church teaches that in a sacrament are two parts. the outward visible sign and the inward spiritual grace. It says the outward sign is bread and wine. It says the inward grace is the Body and Blood of Christ. And, of course, this means, for it never to us could mean anything else, the Risen Christ, who has gone into the Mystery called heaven, whose life now is in the spiritual world.

Our Church says the Body and Blood of Christ are spiritually taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper. Not physically, but spiritually. God is Spirit and God is real, the Risen Christ is of the spiritual world and He is real, His Presence in the Eucharist is spiritual and real.

Our Church teaches us to pray before receiving this Sacrament that we may worthily receive this "flesh" and drink this Blood, and after we have received the Sacrament to give thanks that we have received the spiritual food of the Body and Blood of Christ. Our Church has authorized for our use in our service, under the heading of Holy Communion, no fewer than twenty hymns addressed to the presence of Christ, worshipping Him, and otherwise "discerning" His Body present.

SUMMARY.

The modern scientific mind recognizes, as St. Paul did, that there is a spiritual world of which faith can teach us—a world which has done for us what the material world and physical force never could do, and has more to do for us than the physical world can do. Christ Risen belongs to that spiritual world. It is not so far away—it is only different. His presence in the communion is of that world. We accept our Lord's promise of that presence, St. Paul's affirmation of it, St. Ignatius' affirmation, the affirmation of the "Holy Catholic Church" in which we confess our belief. We are safe there. We stop short when we reach the Roman dogma about it. We do not accept Transubstantiation. Even Cardinal Newman supports us against his own Church. Our own old Prayer Book has ALWAYS taught us the real presence, and provides us a weekly communion.

The communion is most certainly the memorial of the death of Christ. But Christ is not dead. He WAS dead. But now He is Alive forevermore. He is the Saviour of the world. He is the food of the faithful soul. He is the spiritual bread of the world. He is not the bread of the physical world but of that spiritual principle in us which is a man's life and the world's best life and supreme purpose. He is the spiritual bread of the spiritual world. He, of whom the communion is the memorial, is accessible to all the faithful. He does not have to go about from place to place to find them, for conditions of space belong to the physical world and not to the spiritual. He is accessible everywhere. His Memorial is not offered of Him as Dead, though it is offered of Him as Crucified. His Memorial is offered of Him as once Crucified, but now RISEN, LIVING. And so it is not offered in His absence, but in His Presence. The Presence given us as food to support the soul is the Risen Lord whose Life is now in the spiritual world or heaven with God the Father, which is a mystery to us. The Real Presence in the Eucharist is an action of God's love and nearness to us all, and His expression of that love.

We reach the heart of the spiritual world not when we regard the bread and wine as tokens of the Body and Blood of Christ, but when we discern the Body and Blood of Christ as tokens of the LOVE OF GOD.

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES

Prepared by J. T. Bougher. Reading Terminal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

LESSON—No. 29.

TOPIC—Solace for the Sorrowing, and the Suffering Ones.

Read 1 Peter 4:12-19.

All about us, as well as within our own bosoms at times, sorrow and suffering abound to such extent that all are forced to recognize its presence as universal, yet how few search the Scriptures for the only source of real comfort in the day of such adversity. The leading mystery with which we have to deal is in the fact that suffering in its various forms falls not only upon the vilest sinner, but also upon the saintliest of the Lord's people, and not only from the consequences of one's own misconduct, but also may have had no measure of responsibility or control.

Limited space prevents any extended review of our topic, but for the present purpose it is our privilege to bring to the notice of those who are in sorrow or trial, a few of the wonderful helps from the Word of the Lord, which after all, is affliction's only source of true and effective consolation.

1. The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart. —Psalm 34:8.
2. Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate.—Heb. 13:12.
3. He was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows.—Isa. 53:3, 4.
4. He healeth the broken in heart and bindeth up their wounds.—Ps. 147:3.
5. Take my brethren the prophets, . . . as an example of suffering, affliction and patience.—Jas. 5:10.
6. For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for His sake. —Phil. 1:29.
7. That the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried by fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ, whom not having seen ye love.—1 Peter 1:7, 8.
8. Our light affliction which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. —2 Cor. 4:17.
9. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.—Psalm 126:

5; for they shall obtain joy and gladness and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.—Isa. 35:10; and they shall not sorrow any more at all.—Jer. 3:12.

10. Suffer therefore with long patience, brethren, until the coming of the Lord.—Jas. 5:7; If we suffer with Him we shall also reign with Him.—2 Tim. 2:4.
11. Knowing that as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye also be of the consolation.—2 Cor. 1:7.
12. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us.—Rom. 8:18.

HE IS NOT HERE, BUT IS RISEN

The Reverend W. F. Bumsted

SOME TIME ago I saw a picture of St. John and St. Peter, running to the tomb where our Lord had been buried, and as I looked I thought of what might have been the events that centered around such a picture.

Let us go therefore to Calvary on that awful Friday.

Darkness everywhere, the leaden-hued sky, pierced here and there with deep red and against the dim light the outline of the Cross. As we come near we see the body being taken down by Joseph of Arimathea, being wrapped in linen from feet to neck with the folded napkin around its head; we see it being carried on men's shoulders to the new tomb for burial.

The soldiers have gone. The weeping women have gone and followed the body.

Around the now nearly deserted cross stand a few men. Listen to their conversation: "He is dead," says one. "The Master is dead," says another. "Do you remember what He said," asks a third, "how He would rise again?" Then one, mayhap Thomas, says, "Suppose He does not rise".

They will be mocked by the whole world. They had left all and followed an imposter. The priests were right after all.

No sleep now for them, no supper. They thought too much of that last supper with Him, just a horrible gnawing doubt. Suppose He does not rise. They go at last to that room and sit and think, ever thinking.

Let us leave them for the moment. What of the women?

They followed the body to the tomb, then went home and waited and talked of Him who was dead.

Those of you who have lost dear ones know this: the feeling of emptiness, the vacant chair, the stilled voice, the little shoes and toys never more to be used. Your loss was bad enough, your loss was great.

But the loss of our Lord's disciples and His mother and friends was greater and the blow harder to bear. If He did not rise again He would be a liar.

We can almost see them waiting through the day and the night for the break of day.

Then away early to the tomb and the stone rolled away. It was true. He is risen! The shock almost made their hearts stand still. He was the Christ indeed.

They run to tell the disciples, and Peter, the impulsive, must needs see, and John must see. All their doubts and fears were groundless, His words were true.

Then, as a climax, Christ appears. He speaks to Simon. He has spoken to many, He has sent messengers to us. We are to see Him in Galilee. They believed not for joy. Their Master, the Man they had followed was their Lord —the Son of the Living God. All is now changed. From the most despondent crowd in the world, they are filled with an unshakable conviction that Christ was risen.

People always like to cast doubts on the Resurrection as well as other facts in our Lord's life, especially in this age of modern interpretation so-called. Let us reply, as it were, to some doubts. What then made Peter and John believe when they looked in the tomb?

What they saw was this: The linen wrapping just as it was when on our Lord, with the folded napkin at His head, exactly folded as when occupied by the body, but the body gone as though it had evaporated unto thin air, and the clothes and napkin flat.

Some questions on the reason of bodily and spiritual resurrection: It is both—spiritual for He appeared through closed and barred doors; bodily, for did He not eat of broiled fish and an honeycomb?

Some question is on the reason of bodily and spiritual res- of truth to the resurrection story. Would men have taken Him away and then have died for a belief that they knew was false?

James, brother of our Lord, was martyred in Rome in the year 90. Paul was martyred about the same time. St. Peter was crucified and, as tradition says, head downward, so as not to be like his beloved Master.

These men and the men that came after them, Polycarp, Irenaeus and men of our own Reformation, Hooper, Ridley, Latimer and almost countless others, did not believe in nor were willing to die for a myth, a nicely got-up fairy story.

The resurrection was just a natural thing.

Go out into the woods any morning in spring about daylight just as the first rays of a rising sun are turning everything to gold and the fleeting wisps of mist are disappearing. Look at your feet, see the first violets peeping through; hear the note of the bird rejoicing in renewed life; everything growing, casting off the dead brown of winter in the ever-recurring spring; the eternal resurrection.

Every spring in each bud and leaf comes to us the eternal Truth, from death to life.

This fact of the resurrection is the Gospel of the Resurrection.

Within two months St. Peter preached it, and it has been preached ever since. St. Paul preached it.

Christ, the first fruits, and afterward they that are Christ's at His coming.

Death should only be the stepping stone to something better when we know Christ.

Christ is the one traveler who has explored the unknown country, and, after three days, returned. His is a glorious report—full of inspiration, assurance for all who love and trust Him, for all who have forsaken sin and entered through the gate of repentance, for all who have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb, and made them white. Let not your heart be troubled, in my Father's House I go to prepare a place for you, and if I go I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I go ye may be also.

How calming and soothing those words have been to many a poor weary soul!

All comfort was gone and blotted out from the lives of the disciples, nothing but empty promises; their old jobs back; back to the nets, the receipt of custom, the farm and the scorn and mockery of the world. This they thought until the third day.

Transformation.

Jesus rose again and opened the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers. It is from Him and His rising from the dead, the disciples received their new impetus and their belief that the grave had no power over Jesus, and this fact He imparts to all who believe.

The world has grown so accustomed to this fact, and takes it so for granted, that it forgets it ever was without it.

The world thinks it knows all about it and can dispense with a Risen Christ, and is at liberty to challenge with the Revealer terms on which the heaven He has revealed may be enjoyed. As a street preacher once said: "You people all are glad to know of and enjoy a Bible heaven, but you do not want to enter it in a Bible way."

You cannot pick and choose. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life.

He that believeth not the Son shall never see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him.

This, then, is what we must understand and realize.

Christ is the vanquisher of death, sin and the devil.

Whenever we stand convicted of sin and are tempted to do evil, there Christ stands with outstretched arms.

Fear not, I am risen!

I have borne your sins;
I have robbed death of its sting;
I have overcome Satan;
Trust in Me.

That is the ultimate confidence in life—in death.

The man who knows it has a right to it as a Christian, his whole faith, his whole knowledge, brought about by the conviction in the fact, that Christ is risen indeed.

THE FOLLY OF DESPAIR

By Arnold N. Hoath

NOT to one of the powerful and influential men in Israel, not even to one of the leaders of the apostolic group, but to a weeping and despairing woman of no special prominence were the first words which Jesus uttered after His resurrection spoken. It was early in the morning. There was no movement within the garden save the musical flowing of a little stream, no sound save the sleepy twittering of the awakening birds. As the heralds of the rising sun pierced the darkness in the eastern sky, Mary Magdalene, prostrate before the sepulchre, in utter blackness and misery of spirit, sobbed her bewildered loneliness and fear. A few days and how greatly things had changed. All the radiant happiness of the last few months had soured into a desperate bitterness, all her exaltation of spirit had given place to gloom and grief. There were serious things to think of, too. The allurement of the old and hateful life had departed into the almost forgotten past through her friendship with Jesus, but could she face recurring temptation without the inspiration which came from His living presence; face it and laugh at it scornfully, triumphantly? How gentle and courteous He had been with her! Was it any wonder that new hope and new aspirations had rushed into her heart as she realized His confidence and faith in her. He had seen the unsuspected greatness of her nature and when He saw it she had seen it too, and immediately it leaped forth into noble being. Could she go on with fortitude, could she maintain her faith in her own goodness, now that He was dead and even His body had been removed to some secret hiding place? It would have comforted her to have been able humbly to worship beside His last resting place, but even that was denied her. Haggard, and worn with grief, her cry was filled with agonized despair, "They have taken away my Lord and I know not where they have laid Him".

How natural but how needless were her grief and agony! She wept because the dead body of Jesus was no longer in the tomb, yet while she poured out her heart's distress, He for whom she wept stood so near she could have touched Him with her hands. It was the same experience which the two disciples had on the road to Emmaus. Jesus was with them, but they knew it not.

So it is with most of our despair. We grieve and mourn and keep our tear-stained eyes upon the ground, while the remedy for all our sorrow is just beside us, only our grieving hides it. Are there not some who think that the poverty that hems them in with ugliness and gloom upsets the Psalmist's declaration, that God will never see the righteous forsaken? So many are the cruel and evil facts in the world we are sometimes tempted to think that our Lord's presence has been removed from the problems that harass us. But He stands beside us, patient, eager to help. Even as Mary recognized Him when He called her by name, and all her joy came rushing forth just as the sun burst with its full splendor over the green garden and the nearby trees, so when we hear the personal call of Jesus in our hearts our desperation and hopelessness give way before a buoyant happiness.

One of the lessons, then, which comes to us from the resurrection morning is that in all the difficulty and trouble and sorrow that fall to the lot of man, Jesus is nearer than we think. He is not in the tombstone. He is risen! He is calling! What He was to every weary mother and sad-faced child who came to Him in ancient Palestine, what He was to every man bent with the weight of his temptations—all this He wants to be to us today. The generous love with which He redeemed Peter, and made a new man out of Paul He radiates still with unceasing liberality. With an unyielding constancy Jesus stands beside us, and although our life has seemed placed in unfertile soil, now the disappointed hopes begin once more to blossom into strength and loveliness. How foolish then are tears, or fears! We have but to look into the face of Jesus to feel the thrill and romance of a Risen life, and the fortitude that is ours through our comradeship with Him.

The Risen Jesus also brings us the comfort of the Christian hope as we watch our loved one pass through the gateway of the last great adventure. The loneliness of the parting and the natural innate shrinking from the moment of death cannot destroy the Christian joy of one who knows that on the other side is a new life of closer comradeship with our Lord. Are not our grim and mournful funerals, which accentuate the idea of sorrow and loss, a denial of the vision of the Risen Jesus? Rather should not our emphasis be upon the message which Jesus brings of spiritual comfort, hope and joy? For death is no leap into oblivion if we are holding Jesus' hand. It is only when we lose our touch with Jesus that the mystery of it all appears appalling. It is only when our grief hides the Risen Lord that, as we stand before the window out of which the great hearts of the past have looked we find the window frosted, and the vision blurred. "They have taken away my Lord," sobbed Mary. "There is no longer any hope or happiness in life." Jesus said, "Mary". For 'tis-death is dead, not He. Jesus is near us if we only look up.

Ah, the difference that it makes in life if we look at Jesus and not away from Him. Difficulty and sorrow and death—all are transformed. "They have taken away my Lord," said Mary. But Jesus stood beside her. It was the resurrection morning.

THE BIBLE AND VOWS.

Mr. Editor:

Your mention of ordination vows in the last issue (March 24) of The Southern Churchman, suggested the thought that if the teaching of the Bible on the subject of vows should be exhibited it might have a salutary effect upon those whose solemn vows or oaths of allegiance, whether at baptism or ordination, are treated as mere scraps of paper.

1. "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, or in falsehood." The teaching is that as God's Name was called upon the people (see Gen. 48:5, 16; Num. 6:7; Deut. 28:10; Rev. 3:12) they should be exceedingly careful to keep that Name unsullied. "Be ye holy, for I am holy." Mr. Moody once said to a boy, "I have given you my name. I have kept it clean; see that you bring no stain upon it". Each one of us has been baptized into the Name of Christ.

"I will by God's help" is the answer given by every one who is baptized or ordained. If this vow or oath is not kept in truth and honesty then God's Name is linked with a falsehood.

2. In Joshua 9 is an account of the deceptive trick which the Gibeonites played upon Joshua and the elders of Israel, who without asking at "the mouth of the Lord" made a league with them, only to learn three days later that they were next door neighbors. Notwithstanding the fact that the whole transaction was conceived in dishonesty and begotten in ignorance, Joshua and the elders held themselves bound by the league. "We have sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel; now, therefore, we may not touch them."

3. In 2 Kings 24:20 and 25:1-7, we read that Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon, who put out the eyes of Zedekiah after killing both of his sons before his face. Why? In 2 Chron. 36:13 the answer is that King Nebuchadnezzar had "made him swear by God", and because he violated this solemn oath the king visited upon him the refinement of cruelty. "That man died not alone in his iniquity."

4. For additional instruction note the following: Numbers 30:2, "If a man vow a vow unto the Lord, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth". Ecclesiastes 5:4, 5, "Whom thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools. . . . Better is it that thou shouldest not vow than that thou shouldest vow and not pay".

5. Psa. 56:12, "Thy vows are upon me, O God". Therefore every baptized and ordained person should be exceedingly careful lest they be guilty of "taking God's name in falsehood".

CONGRATULATIONS.

Mr. Editor:

I have been watching the stand of The Southern Churchman against the Anglo-Catholics and their Jesuitical practices for some months. I wish to congratulate you upon the splendid work you are doing. Your paper has done more, I think, to arouse the South to the dangers confronting our Church than any other publication or effort that has been made in this direction.

Thank you also for your offer to print material furnished you by the National Church League, or in behalf of the cause in which we are both so mutually interested.

With best wishes,

CHANGED HIS MIND.

Mr. Editor:

It is encouraging to have the Editor of The Living Church say in a letter to you, "I have no desire whatever to strike at the Articles themselves". He has changed his mind since he wrote the editorial in The Living Church of March 3. There discussing Article Twenty-eight he sums up his argument thus: "It begins with a sentence of seventy-five words, very involved, very difficult to parse, almost impossible for an ordinary person to understand; and continues with paragraphs that are so generally misunderstood as, practically, to defeat the purpose of the Article. It is largely couched in negative phrases. It is as contrary to the rules of modern pedagogy as language can be."

The answer to all that is simply this, when the Courts are called upon to interpret a sentence or paragraph in a suit, they do not concern themselves with the number of words contained or whether it can or cannot be parsed. The one question is, What was the intent of the testator? That determined and the matter is settled.

So the one and only question here is, What is the intent of Article Twenty-eight? There is nothing in the Prayer Book any plainer. In the above mentioned letter to you the Editor of The Living Church takes a jab at "the Articles themselves"—all of them, when he says: "Everybody knows that they are misleading and greatly misunderstood and written in long and involved sentences in a language of four centuries ago and that their teaching value today is almost nil. That does not correctly state the case. Many people know to the contrary, that they are not misleading and not greatly misunderstood. At the Virginia Seminary forty years ago they formed the basis of all theological instruction and were not only far from misleading and from being misunderstood, but were a veritable guide and equipment for the clergymen who graduated from that then evangelical institution.

If there is nothing against the Articles per se, why all this effort to get them out of the Prayer Book? They certainly do not cumber the Book; for they only occupy ten pages, and that is very little space in a book which has five hundred and sixty-six pages. The Editor of The Living Church says, according to the title page the Articles are "established" and that if omitted from the Prayer Book they will be just as much "established" and "as a publisher I should see that they were kept in print and readily available". One is tempted to ask, for how long? Will the Editor of The Living Church never die? Keep the Articles of Religion in the Prayer Book where they have been for generations. As long as they are there they carry a certain authority. The Prayer Book is an ideal repository for them. There they are "established" and "available" for all time. The Editor of The Living Church may be right when he says dropping the Articles from the Prayer Book and repealing them are totally different questions, but if the first is carried into effect, every sensible man knows that it is only a matter of a little while when the second follows. So, after all, the two questions are in reality one.

BOOKS.

Mr. Editor:

I am delighted to see you are publishing again Scroggie's "Daily Notes on the Scriptures". I think them the best course of daily Bible readings I have ever used. I also think our textbook this year, "The Church Awake", by Sturgis, is by far the best we have had in many years, and I only wish every communicant of the Church would read it. May I recommend also that most helpful book of Floyd Tomkins, "Following Christ", that I have reread this Lent with greater joy than when it first came out. No better book could be found for sponsors to give their god-children at Confirmation.

ARE THE LAYMEN OF THE CHURCH BEING INFORMED?

Mr. Editor:

When the mind and thought of an eminent jurist of the Church was concentrated on the purpose of notifying the laity of the danger that the Church is in through the machinations of a certain disrupting party in the Church in its effort to remove the Thirty-nine Articles from the Prayer Book, many of his friends thought that perhaps he was over anxious about the matter and that the "Bishop and other clergy" would see to it that justice would be done the laity, the bone and sinew of the Church, and that they would be duly informed of the fact that the Resolution to remove the Articles from the Prayer Book had been certified down to the dioceses to be voted on at the Church Conventions held in the winter and spring of this year. As success attends his effort in this behalf and letters are coming to him from all parts of the country, thanking him for what he has done and is doing to arouse the laity, it becomes more and more apparent that his worse fears are being realized. The laity are not being given the opportunity to express themselves on this momentous subject.

Indeed, a diocese in the West frankly states that they are getting along amicably and that "it would be a mistake to circulate the petition (sent to them for signatures) among the people who do not understand the issue".

Thus in that diocese, at least, they will let the matter go by the board with a perfunctory reference at their convention to the Resolution for removal. The vote, of course, will be in the affirmative, because, perhaps, the laity did not know. Whose duty was it to inform the laity that they might vote intelligently?

Another evidence of the need of this effort to get reports from the laity before the General Convention comes out of the West, also, from one of these two by four dioceses whose only purpose in life, apparently, seems to be to add to the noise of the noisy minority. This minor prophet, or if not liking the word prophet attached to his name, this lesser light, who fairly scintillates when he hammers the Thirty-nine Articles on the anvil of his wrath, intrigues and interests for his utter abandon in the use of words and his entire want of moral perception. We have been sent a copy of his program of Lenten services for the Second Sunday in Lent. Herein he states that the Evangelicals are dishonest, the modernists, stupid (think of it!) and the dear old Thirty-nine Articles, which all these years have had a good character, are found liars!

If space allowed, we would publish the little pamphlet in full, as it is a gem of its kind, as it discloses the means resorted to by this noisy minority in their effort to change the Protestant name and nature of this Church. Note particularly how he hopes to raise the morale of General Convention.

The program announces services for Sunday at Ashhand, Fond du Lac, as being seven hymns, two misses or masses, but no mention of a sermon; morning mass for Wednesday and the guild to meet all day Tuesday when vestments will be mended (ponder it!) Then comes this delightful tidbit: "The first English Prayer Book placed the Gloria in Excelsis after the NINEFOLD (emphasis his), Kyrie; the Exhortation Confession, Absolution, Comfortable Words, and Prayer of Humble Access after the consecration, where they OUGHT TO BE (emphasis his) and where they will eventually be placed as we raise the morale of General Convention by using it thus ourselves." (Making the law by breaking the law.) "The Modernists are stupid!" So; but not only so but more also. He actually uses the "small and ugly" towards our dear Thirty-niners. Being from Fond du Lac and thus close to the head and front of these disrupters of the Church's peace, he may have heard him use that little word in reference to the rector of St. Bartholomew, of New York. Which reminds us to say in passing that "the head and front" purrs when he comes to Virginia; note the difference when he refers to the rector of St. Paul's, Virginia, but the claws come out for other places and people. Perhaps Virginia needs a little more nursing yet.

But here is what he says among other things about our dear Thirty-niners: "No Priest can subscribe to them today without mental reservation (a little habit, perhaps, but what is the moral nature of a past time like that). Again "they are ambiguous, involved, and DELIBERATELY LIE (emphasis his). Oh! dear! All these years of good character and now found a liar by one who condones mental reservations and admits law-breaking for law-making!

A concluding announcement in this informative Lenten program is "that lovely Mr. McD——— has passed over and we were pleased to say a requiem mass for his soul". Here also we may suppose in introducing this Romish practice he was trying to raise the morale of the General Convention; and now that the "head and front" has ordered Virginia to Prayers for the dead we may look forward to some such practice here in the not far distant future, unless the laity are aroused to the danger confronting us.

OF TWO EDITORIALS.

Mr. Editor:

Since you asked an expression of my view of your editorials of March 10 and 17, I am glad to send this:

"The Atonement of Christ" I read with a sense of reverence. I have always thought that I have much to learn personally of the Atonement and I could not help feeling that your editorial has a message for me. The Cross not only made the impression we know upon those who witnessed it and on the great first convert, St. Paul, but has continued to make its impression upon the Christian world; and—as a stumbling block and foolishness—upon the non-Christian world. I know I have not grasped and cannot grasp all its meaning. I like to make my excuses (or repentance) for my failure to comprehend it all by singing after Communion

> "O Lamb of God, still keep me
> Near to Thy wounded side,
> One-half hath not been told me
> Of all Thy power and grace".

"Of Christian Unity" as a review of the Scripture, particularly of the intent and promise of our Lord, seems to me comprehensive and satisfactory. It seems also very close to the teaching of our own Church. Personally, I recognize it as an essential side of religion my own Church taught me long ago, and it remains with me as the faith which I hold with my whole heart. In specific instances it gives me pain to face this truth as facing truth often does give pain. But generally and over all, it gives me great joy. And I am sure it is a strength to any man, and a very great equipment towards the strength and usefulness of any part of the Church which will make use of it. I think you have stated it fairly, fully and well.

Now, from such a friendly hand as mine you will not mind this further comment: I am just a little timid about the use of the word Substitute. In the first place it does not occur in the New Testament. And it may imply and actually often does carry far more than you intend to mean. I have an awful article from The Sunday School Times of some years ago showing how far people can go with the word Substitute. It is almost a perfect expression of Luther's You Are in Faith: then "Sin Boldly". The word also offers an opportunity of attack, as we have had it, under the phrase "Substitutionary doctrine". The full meaning has to be gathered up and expounded with care to avoid attributing injustice to God. Or hardness. Don't you think the Church has been very wise to avoid any definition of the Atonement? By leaving it to be applied with life's experience the Church has opened the way to leading on the immature who can have no personal experience in its meaning; and also keeps open the way to those of mature experience whose experience of repentance is keen in the past, retaining of it a strong memory of its emotional intensity, but now living more distinctly in the sense of forgiveness and God's mercy and in the sense of a call to the future for faith and service. These are classes of people in normal conditions whom the Church can nourish. Often they can see the Atonement through the Cross which always has its message and through the revelation of God's love in the Incarnation. It is valuable to recall that we used in our service "full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world," etc., at a time when they were exceedingly offensive to the Calvinists inside as well as outside of the Church. They held that God had predestinated most men to hell and some to salvation. And this "whole world" idea was offensive to them. We have to make some identification of ourselves with the Sacrifice on Calvary; by faith certainly; by faith only, if faith is meant to include love and obedience. In many, obedience has to come first. "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine."

Developed and lasting love is a FRUIT not a preliminary antecedent of the Spirit. Some such considerations move me to avoid the term Substitute and to treat the Atonement with some care as to the time and as to the development or crises of the persons I am addressing. If we are called to charity, we must have some patience with people on a difficult and personal matter like this, and let them get to it before we supply it to them. "I have not shunned to declare unto you the whole counsel of God" was written not to the crudest of pagans, but to specific and somewhat loyal Christians. I don't like the policy of "reservations", but I feel I MUST give attention to suitability of occasion in a thing like this.

Each man in articles like this will use his own terms and no two men will write precisely alike. Such variations are not proper matter for comment. But may I note the common reference to Adam? If this were a generally stressible factor, we should have expected much definitely indicative material in the words of our Lord. Somewhere recently I read a note calling attention to the fact that in the Old Testament there is no such statement as "In Adam's fall, we sinned all". If that line represents definitely our Lord's purpose in coming, we might expect Him to say so. He was explicit on the sins of men. But He did not lay it to Adamic taint. He seems to have taken it as personal or actual sin. I have no doubt of "original sin" and believe its curse was in our Lord's purpose. Nor do I think science points to anything but an original common human ancestry, the gift of God. But as neither our Lord nor the Creeds base on Adam, so neither do I feel that I should. St. Paul did four times. The Church has wisely used his conclusions without making his method of argument into an article of faith. Hence I feel that a more sparing use of Adam would be in accord with the Scriptures. I do not care for that Christian-Science-minded Congregationalist who proposed to take all mention of sin and death out of the Hymnals!

You will readily see that mention of these details does not in the least interfere with my gratitude and pleasure in the two editorials.

General Convention—1928.

Washington proposes to make this the greatest Convention in the history of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

In this hectic age of kaleidoscopic changes, the foregoing statement may seem rather spirited or boastful; but from all signs, it is indicated that the attendance at the 1928 triennial Convention, to be held in the City of Washington from the tenth to the twenty-seventh of October next, will be by far the largest in the history of the Church.

Besides the Bishops and Deputies to the General Convention, and the Delegates to the Woman's Auxiliary and other organizations which will bring the largest attendance of any Convention heretofore held, thousands of visitors will make this an occasion to come to Washington: the Capital of the United States, the City Beautiful, the home of the President of the United States, the seat of the Federal Government, and by far the most interesting city on the American Continent.

With its wide, clean, shade embowered streets and avenues, its magnificent public buildings, its handsome homes, its beautiful parks, squares and flower gardens, delightfully ornamented by shrubs and flowers brought to the highest state of perfection by the experienced scientific treatment of the Agricultural and Horticultural Departments, Washington is conceded by those who have traveled far and wide to be one of the most beautiful cities in the world.

The Art Galleries, the Museums, the drive through Rock Creek Park and through Potomac Park, particularly by way of the Lincoln Memorial which, when approached in the evening twilight, presents a picture against the western skies of sublime beauty. From the Lincoln Memorial looking east across the Reflecting Pool, by the Washington Monument to the Capitol on the Hill, presents another impressive vista.

For the comfort and convenience of those attending the Convention, Washington has more than forty hotels, many of which have every convenience of modern equipment. There are also a great number of restaurants, cafes, grills and tea rooms conveniently located to the assembly halls of the Convention.

The House of Bishops will hold its meetings in the lesser ballroom on the tenth floor of the Willard Hotel, which is an unusually handsome, well ventilated, well lighted room, with a beautiful unobstructed outlook across the Ellipse and the southern entrance of the White House toward the Washington Monument, across the Potomac and the heights of Arlington in the distance. The larger ballroom adjoining the lesser ballroom will be used for the daily luncheons for the members of the Convention.

The House of Deputies will hold its meetings in the Women's Memorial Continental Hall, otherwise known as the D. A. R. Building, which is one of the handsomest buildings in the City of Washington, the auditorium being attractively decorated and furnished, and of just sufficient size to comfortably seat the House of Deputies. This building is on the west side of Seventeenth Street, about four blocks south of Pennsylvania Avenue, and is one of four buildings facing the Ellipse, beginning on the north with the Corcoran Art Gallery, then the Red Cross Building, the D. A. R. Hall and the Pan-American Building, which are four of the finest buildings in the city. This is just ten minutes' easy walk from the Willard Hotel where the daily luncheons will be served. In the D. A. R. Hall will be ample room for the exhibits, and also the various offices necessary to the House of Deputies.

The Women's Auxiliary will have its headquarters at the Mayflower Hotel, one of the newest and most luxurious hotels. Their Convention will be held in the Presidential Ballroom of the Mayflower.

The opening services of the Convention will be held in the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul on Mount Saint Alban, which will be sufficiently advanced in its construction at that time to seat about three thousand people, and which will be so arranged that the overflow can hear the opening sermon from the outside.

The Committee on Arrangements and the Women's Auxiliary will spare no pains or expense and are looking forward with the greatest interest to the comfort, happiness and pleasure of the members of the Convention and their visiting relatives and friends. Sightseeing trips, teas, dinners, private entertainments and a great pageant on one afternoon and evening will be some of the many attractions offered.

The Convention itself should be the most interesting Convention since its original inauguration. This Convention is to complete the Revision and Enrichment of the Book of Common Prayer. This is to be the final chapter in that great and important work which has been going on for the past fifteen years. The ratification or reopening of the disposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, important matters with regard to the Church's Program, a new approach to the old problem of advance work, renewed emphasis on evangelism throughout the Church, the election of a Bishop for Wyoming, are some of the interesting and important things that will come before this Convention.

At the regular meeting of the Richmond Clericus, held on Monday, March 26, with seventeen members present, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

General Convention.

Interest centers around the General Convention in Washington next fall, and matters of general Church interest have taken on a local importance for Washington Church people. Committees of many different kinds are at work. Cathedral building operations are being watched with the hope that desired progress there will be made by next October; and publicity items in the daily papers are effecting a real education as to the procedure and general meaning of the next great Triennial Convention, which promises to equal, if not surpass, those of the past in size, importance of deliberations, etc. The Woman's Auxiliary was perhaps the first to form committees and make preparations and has accomplished much in this way. The Brotherhood of St. Andrew has organized its local committee, which meets each week under the chairmanship of H. Lawrence Choate. Major F. G. Munson is secretary, and Bruce Baird, treasurer. Chairmen of subcommittees include Dr. William Earl Clark, registration; Dr. W. Sinclair Bowen, churches and meetings; William R. Ellis, hospitality; J. B. Wyckoff, publicity; William J. Moore, hotels; Donald Gerow, juniors, and J. Harris Franklin, music.

At a meeting recently held at Diocesan House, Bishop Freeman, who was the principal speaker, emphasized the important work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and the lay people of the Church.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

Protest Against Removal of Thirty-nine Articles.

A meeting was held on Monday evening, March 26, in the parish house of St. Thomas' Church, Brooklyn, to protest against the removal of the Thirty-nine Articles from the Prayer Book. The invited speaker was the Rev. Alexander G. Cummins, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He declared that the Articles had great historic value as a testimony to the great and important work done for the Church at the time of the Reformation. Many influential clergymen in the Church seem anxious to repudiate this work of the Reformation period and are, therefore, making every effort to have the Articles eliminated.

There was an attendance of six hundred and fifty people, all communicants of the Diocese of Long Island, six hundred and fifteen of whom sign a petition which will be forwarded to the House of Bishops, at the meeting of the General Convention to be held in Washington, protesting against the removal of the Thirty-nine Articles from the Prayer Book. A similar petition will be presented in many of the churches in this diocese and an opportunity given to communicants to register their protest. It is believed that this movement among the laity will have a very wide publicity and will give the lay communicants of the Church an opportunity to express their opinion, that no change shall be made in the reformed doctrine of this Church. Sixteen clergymen were present, and a letter was read from Bishop Stires stating that he deemed it unwise to remove the Thirty-nine Articles against such significant protest as was now manifest in the Church at large.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. M. Green, D. D., Coadjutor.

St. Andrew's Church, Jackson.

Bishop Wm. Mercer Green, the Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese, visited this parish on Palm Sunday and confirmed a large class presented by the rector, the Rev. Walter B. Capers, D. D. The personnel of the class was unique in that the men and women outnumbered the children two to one.

Saint Andrew's Parish has just issued a Directory and Year Book which indicates in many ways the tremendous activities of the parish and its phenomenal growth since the last Directory which was published in 1924.

Since the last Directory, the parish has raised for various purposes $125,000. In addition to its confirmations, one hundred and seven families have come into the church through transfer and otherwise. The parish now numbers nine hundred and fifty communicants. It bears something over a tenth of the expenses of the diocese.

Our rector is much in demand as a Crusade and Lenten preacher. This Lent he was one of the preachers at Saint Stephen's Church, Philadelphia, and at the request of the rector and congregation, Dr. Capers agreed to fill a similar engagement next Lent D. V.

15. First Sunday after Easter.
22. Second Sunday after Easter.

Collect for Easter Even.

Grant, O Lord, that as we are baptized into the death of Thy Blessed Son, Our Saviour Jesus Christ, so by continually mortifying our corrupt affections we may be buried with Him; and that through the grave, and gate of death, we may pass to our joyful resurrection; for His merits, Who died, and was buried, and rose again for us, Thy Son, Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Collect for Easter Day.

Almighty God, Who through Thine only begotten Son, Jesus Christ, hast overcome death, and opened unto us the gate of everlasting life; we humbly beseech Thee that, as by Thy special grace preventing us, Thou dost put into our minds good desires, so by Thy continual help we may bring the same to good effect, through Jesus Christ Our Lord, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost ever one God, world without end. Amen.

Easter.

Sing, soul of mine, this day of days.
The Lord is risen!
Toward the sunrising set thy face.
The Lord is risen!
Behold He giveth strength and grace;
For darkness, light; for mourning, praise;
For sin, His holiness; for conflict, peace.
Arise, O Soul, this Easter Day!
Forget the tomb of yesterday,
For thou from bondage art set free;
Thou sharest in His victory
And life eternal is for thee,
Because the Lord is risen.

He Is Risen!

He would indeed be a most untrustworthy and unscientific student of history who would not admit that immediately following the crucifixion of Jesus something took place which had a marvelous transforming effect upon His followers and furnished a dynamic which inheres in the Christian religion yet today. In no other way can the historic facts be explained. There stands that little group of frightened, depressed, sorrowing men and women—their leader dead, crucified as a common malefactor and blasphemer, and all for which He had lived apparently gone. The great expectation in their hearts of a wonderful new kingdom had been utterly blasted, and gloom and hopelessness had settled down upon them. Then something happened. Suddenly they became radiant with joy and magnetic with a thrilling faith and a strange power which sent them out into the world to make peaceful conquest of nations and civilizations as well as of individuals. Now there is no rational explanation of such a change apart from the assumption that something happened—something of such powerful import as to furnish irresistible impact upon human life, not only in that day, but through the centuries to come.

The followers themselves accounted for it all by the simple explanation that "He is risen" and that He would be alive forevermore. Cavil over matters as we will, that was their belief—a belief so strong that they could become martyrs for it because they could not doubt what they had seen and felt. It was a conviction which immediately became foundational to the Christian religion and to the whole Christian movement. To try to minimize the vital place which the belief in the Resurrection and in a living Christ held in the Christian religion from its very beginning down to the present day is to be so unhistoric as to be actually silly. The whole Christian movement has been built around and pillared upon that central and distinctive item of faith. Men and women have worshipped a living Christ. They have believed Him to be alive again. Every implicate of their faith has been builded out of that conviction and its completing conviction that they were as immortal as He and that they and their loved ones would live after death even as He has done. Destroy that belief in a personal and conscious immortality and what one would have left would not be the Christian gospel, nor could it by any possibility hope ever to become the impelling and transforming power in human life which Christianity has been. That ought to be made plain and unmistakable to this present generation—that when you efface from the Christian religion its faith in immortality, you make it impotent to such an extent that it is neither historic nor fair any longer to call it Christian.

Nor would the effect of destroying faith in a personal and conscious immortality be any less disastrous to human life than it would be to the Christian religion. The deepest instincts of the human heart are embedded in a belief in eternal life, and all the finest aspirations of the soul are builded thereon. No normal man wants to believe that he is just a high-type animal, a blue-ribbon beast, and nothing more. No normal being wants to believe, nor can he find any comfort or aspiration to higher and holier living in the belief, that when he buries his mother or his wife or his child he buries them as he would bury a dog—and that there is nothing more of them forever! All the tinseled finery of the casket becomes a jest if that ends all; and life itself becomes a horrid mockery, and for millions of people an unbearable injustice—if death ends all. The psychological effect upon the human race of robbing it of its comforting faith and stimulating hope in immortality would be inconceivably depressive and disastrous. As long as loved ones die, as long as injustices and hardships go unrequited this side the grave, as long as vicarious service and suffering remain uncompensated in this life—that long must men and women believe in a life to come, in order that they shall not be crushed and embittered with sorrow and resentment. All this and infinitely more were involved in that first thrilling cry, "He is risen"! and from that day to this has been central and dynamic in the faith of all those who believed that He now is. And peace and power have been theirs in measure as this belief has been overmastering.—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

A Sonnet.

Jesu! In lowliness supreme didst Thou
The ageless right of heavenly home disown,
To bide in man's unholy world, unknown,
Despised, contemned, outraged, at last to bow
In God-like shame on Calv'ry's shameless Cross,
To yield the ghost with one unceasing groan
For sinful man alone, O man, bemoan
Thy lawless deeds! Wilt thou still bear the loss?

Behold the Cross! Blest Instrument of our Eternal rescue, piercing yon deep skies.
O conquering Sign of endless Hope, to thee
We cling in every clime through every hour,
Till from the Cross, on Christ enthroned, our eyes
Shall gaze with love through all eternity.

—Bernard Gruenstein.

The Crowning Proof.

The Resurrection is the crowning proof that "with God nothing is impossible". Here, God does not act through men, but of Himself alone. Here, the divine power is seen beginning that transformation of the natural order which the consummation of the kingdom will require; and here the Apostles find the source of their confidence in the sufficiency of the divine power for the body, here and hereafter, as well as for the soul. That power is for them, and for all who are Christ's by the gift of the Holy Ghost; and through it they feel themselves the instruments of an activity which nothing can ultimately withstand. It is a power not their own, a power that works only on the line of God's redemptive purpose; they can do by it "nothing against the truth". But, as long as their minds are enlightened to know God's purpose, and their wills surrendered to accomplish it, there is nothing that they cannot do in God, or that God cannot do in them. So it has been all down the Christian ages, just in so far as God's message has been accepted, and His Spirit received. "Teresa can do nothing; God and Teresa can do everything." That is how the Church answers the question, "What is God doing"? We point to the great stream of redemptive activity which runs through the ages; and call men into the Church that they may themselves experience it, and become its instruments. "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that ye also may have fellowship with us: yea, and our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ."
—Canon Gandge, In The Guardian.

The Cradle of Life.

Born in a manger; laid to rest in a rich man's tomb—that marks the beginning and the ending of Him who passed through all the stages of the life that is human that He might open up for us the gates of life eternal. How fitting that the body of the crucified One should escape the ignominy of finding a grave with the wicked to which it would have been consigned had not Joseph changed the verdict of the Pharisees and asked permission of Pilate to lay it to rest in his own sepulchre! It was a fitting tribute of love which this rich and secret disciple of Jesus paid to his Lord. Did he know that the tomb would be empty only a brief span of hours hence? Did he know that his sepulchre was but the cradle of a glorious resurrected life and a pledge of his own resurrection? Did he dream that his Lord was to hallow that sepulchre and make it a fitting and honored resting place for his own body not many years hence? Joseph, like the rest of the disciples, doubtless saw no further ahead than the darkness of the grave. Too bewildered and sad were they to look through the darkness to the dawn. It was night in the hearts of Christ's loved ones when His body was laid in a rich man's tomb. But that night was only the prelude to a glorious dawn such as the world had never dreamed of before. Lent closes with this act of Joseph, one of the members of the Sanhedrin. What was darkness and gloom in the hearts of Christ's followers gave way to the dazzling lights of Easter, which marks the greatest event in human history.—Lutheran.

Ancient Rite.

Mary Noel Bleecker.

Yea, Lord, the Cross, I understand—
  Early Thou gave'st it me and give'st again,
Thou placed it in mine infant hand
  And taught me the deep mystery of Pain.

Symbol of suffering and strife,
  Dread prophecy of unborn days to be—
Thou holdest the strange paradox of life
  Athwart Thy clasped arms of love and agony.

Yea, Lord, then still the Cross for me,
  Since passionately I desire to live—
For they must bear who would be free—
  And they who taste of life are they who give.

Mine then the ancient, sacrificial way
  Of love offered on the shrine of agony,
Since Love of God on that first Easter Day
  Spurned not the Passion of Gethsemane.

For Easter and Beyond.

We can never study the earthly life of Christ too deeply; yet we make a tremendous mistake if we imagine that a close scrutiny of the life of Christ will yield us the whole secret of Christ. For it is the Resurrection and the Pentecostal gift of the Spirit which make His life valuable to us. . . . . I want to say with the utmost emphasis that a study of the life of Christ in the Gospels, if it is divorced from the Resurrection and the new life made possible by the Spirit, is incomplete, powerless, depressing. . . . . The glory and exultation of the full Christ-story lies in the triumph of the Resurrection, and in the possibilities of a new risen life for us, here and now, guaranteed by the Presence and Power of the Spirit.

I venture to submit that the dullness, the lifelessness, the torpidity, of so many Christians is due to the fact that they have not claimed and used the energies of a new divine life won for us in the Resurrection of Christ and infused into us through the Spirit. Oh, these listless and impotent Christians! What skeletons they are at religion's feast! No wonder they convert nobody; who wants a religion of inertia?

But to a real Christian, Christ is not Somebody Who lived and died nineteen hundred years ago. He is his King, reigning as God and Man in heavenly places, and imparting to His Church and His individual children the power of an endless life.—W. J. Carey, What It Means to Be a Churchman.

Rise, My Soul!

Rise, my soul! 'tis Easter morning!
  Winter melting into spring;
Lo, the heaven and earth adorning,
  Shines the glory of our King.
    Christ is risen!
  Let the world His triumph sing.

All creation wakes to gladness,
  Grateful odors fill the air;
Songs of praise dispelling sadness,
  Rise upon the breath of prayer.
    Christ is risen!
  Winds and waves the burden bear.

Saints, your floral tribute bringing,
  Early at His altar bow!
While the joyous bells are ringing,
  Lo, the grave is vacant now.
    Christ is risen!
  Put the crown upon His brow.

Crown Him, crown Him, King of glory,
  Seated on His Father's throne;
First in all redemption's story,
  Men and angels make it known.
    Christ is risen!
  God in Christ and man made one.

—F. Mottome, D. D.

Only a Risen Christ.

Can explain the fact pertaining to Him. Only a risen Lord can explain His life, His wonderful words and works that engraved themselves unforgettably upon the minds and hearts of His hearers and enemies and disciples and that endure to this day, while empires have fallen into dust. Only a risen Christ can explain His sinless character that shines in spotless purity across all the centuries and remains unique and unapproachable among all the sons of men. Only a risen Christ can explain the crucified Christ that made such an impression upon a dying theif and a Roman soldier that they bore witness to His divine personality. Only a risen Christ can explain the events of the resurrection morning and the succeeding days until a cloud received Him out of sight. Only a risen Christ can explain the day of Pentecost and the course of Christianity in planting Christian churches around the Mediterranean shore. Only a risen Christ can explain nineteen centuries of Christian history and achievement. Only a risen Lord can account for the Easter faith and joy that is now brightening the world. Only a risen Christ can save us from our sin and make life worthwhile and give us eternal hope. Only a risen Christ is an adequate Christ to account for facts and to fulfill His promises and carry on His work until He comes again.—Presbyterian Banner.

Alice's Easter Surprises.

Everybody who met Alice Kent on her way home from school smiled at her. They couldn't help it. She didn't walk; she skipped, the way a little girl does when she is very happy. Every now and then she hummed a funny little tune, because she had to bubble over out loud. She was round and rosy. Her eyes were very bright, and in one hand she carried something gay and pretty. It was made of heavy green paper, folded like a little book. On the outside was pasted a white rabbit holding a big pink Easter egg in his paws, with a row of cunning yellow chicks across the bottom of the page, all colored and cut out by Alice's own fingers at school that afternoon. Inside was an Easter verse which she had carefully copied. Now she was taking it home to show mother.

Did you ever made an Easter card at school and keep it as an Easter morning surprise for some one you loved very much? Alice knew exactly who was to have her booklet. She meant to put it in a pretty basket on top of the three colored eggs and give it to her cousin and playmate, Allison, who lived just across the street. She gave a little extra skip as she thought how pleased Allison would be. Then suddenly she stood still in surprise. A timid little hand had touched her sleeve, and a timid little voice called out: "Hello, little girl!"

There by the iron gate of a big brick house on the corner stood a little girl with a rather frightened expression.

"Hello!" said Alice. "Do you live here?"

"Yes," the thin little girl answered. "I heard you comin' along, and you sounded so jolly I just thought I'd say hello."

"I was thinking about my Easter card," Alice explained. "Isn't it pretty?"

"I don't know what it's like," said the other little girl. "Can I touch it?"

"Oh!" gasped Alice, opening her own eyes very wide. "Can't you see?"

"No," was the answer; "but I'd like to feel it, if you'll let me."

Alice silently handed it to her, her mind for once too full of new thoughts for words. She knew that there were blind men and women who lived in the big house. Sometimes she saw them in the yard, and there were the words over the door: "Home for the Blind." But she had never thought of a little girl who could not see. It was too dreadful!

The little blind girl's fingers went swiftly over the green paper with its decorations, and she smiled with delight. "I know it's pretty," she said. "It's a rabbit that's pasted on, isn't it? I feel its ears. What's it for?"

Alice told her all about making the booklet and what she meant to do with it, and in turn learned that the blind girl had never had even an Easter egg and that she had come the week before with three other blind children to live there and to be taught what sightless children could learn.

"It's nice here," the little girl added; "but it's kind o' lonesome, and I like to come to the gate to hear the school children go by."

"I'll stop every day coming home and say hello," exclaimed impulsive Alice, "if you'll be here at the gate."

Her new friend promised eagerly, and Alice ran home to tell her mother. "I'd love to make Easter presents for those four, mother," she said as she finished her story, "but they can't see even the prettiest card."

"They can feel," answered her mother; and they can smell, Alice; and they can taste, can't they?"

Alice's eyes opened wide again. "Oh! mother," she cried, "could we put candy eggs in little baskets and make some more cards? And tie hyacinths on the handles of the baskets?"

Alice had to dance around the room as the splendid idea unfolded to her.

"Bessie and Kathie and Allison will help," mother suggested, "and I have some pretty colored paper. You shall make them right away."

So three little girls and one little boy worked like bees. Mother bought four Easter baskets and candy eggs, and soon four love gifts were ready, even to fragrant hyacinth sprays on the handles.

If you had been hidden where you could have watched early Easter morning, I doubt if you could have told which were the happier, the four excited children who tiptoed softly to the door of the big house, left four beautiful Easter baskets on the step, and ran away as soon as they had rung the bell, or the four blind children who laughed and nearly cried with pleasure over their very first Easter gifts.—Mrs. C. H. Battle.

Red Bird.

Gene Scott Wright.

Red bird, red bird, in the grass,
  Red bird on the tree,
Flashing scarlet as you pass
  Back and forth in glee—
Calling out to all who hear
"What cheer! What cheer! What cheer"!

Red bird, red bird, do not go,
  Linger still awhile,
Till I shall forget my woe,
  Till I learn to smile.
Call your challenge loud and clear,
"What cheer? What cheer? What cheer"?

The Spirit of the Lily.

Edwardina Crane.

Once upon a time there was a little girl named Therese, who lived all alone with her maiden Aunt. Therese was a very pretty girl and a good one, too. She was kind and careful, and fond of pets. Therese had many friends among the children who went to school with her and the grown ups loved her, too.

Not very far from the home of Therese and her aunt there lived a little old lady, of whom it was said, that she was so ugly and so cross that 'most every one was afraid of her. The very naughty boys would throw rocks at the house and run away; the good little boys kept as far away from her as possible.

One day—of all things—Therese's aunt told her that she should go to the home of this old lady on an errand. Granny Winkle was the old lady's name. Therese, being a good little girl, made no fuss, but went. It is true that her heart beat fast and she was terribly frightened, but she went. She went up to the house and went up to the door and knocked just like little Red Riding Hood; a voice, and not a cross voice, either, said "Come in"; so Therese went in and there, sitting in a high-backed chair, was a little old lady—not ugly, either—how did people get such wrong ideas?

Therese spoke politely to the old lady and delivered her aunt's message and then she wanted to leave, but the old lady asked her to stay, so she did. She talked about her school and her little flower garden at home. "Fond of flowers you?" asked the lady, and when Therese said she was, Granny Winkle said she had a bulb which she would give her. Therese took the black looking root and thought how ugly it was. "Plant it in the moist sand and keep it in a warm place and watch what happens," said Granny. So Therese took the bulb home and did just as she was told, but for a long time nothing happened, then a straight green spike grew out of it. Taller and taller grew the spike. Therese watched it eagerly. It began to unfold—nice lily pad leaves began to open and right in the very middle a tiny pink bud began to show itself. Oh! how Therese watched it, every morning she ran, first thing, to see how large it had grown. One morning she ran to see and there in the golden sunlight the lily bud was almost open. It was so very beautiful that Therese leaned over and touched her lips to the beauty of the bud—there was a little quick "pop" and there was the lily opened wide, and in its very center what do you suppose Therese saw? Why, the very spirit of the lily—a tiny, tiny little maiden all fairy white. Therese was so happy! She called Auntie to come and see, she ran as hard as she could over to Granny Winkle's. You could see her could you? Only good children can see the spirit of the lily. Therese kept the beautiful lily with its beautiful spirit, in the sunshine of the window and one day when the leaves began to wither, Therese heard a queer, queer little twittering noise at the window and she looked just in time to see a tiny bluebird bear the Spirit of the Lily upon its wings away, way away, until it was lost in the blue of the heavens—and when Therese could not longer see the wee messenger, she looked again at the lily bud and it had drooped and died.

You little boys and girls, can you see the Spirit of the Lily? Watch in your mother's Lily buds for the beautiful Spirit—be sure it is in each one—but few of us have eyes pure enough to see it.

"Little Pink Calico."

Betty Lois Lane had just finished having the measles. Here it was Thursday, and the very next day would be the first of April. But Mother said that it would not be safe for her to go back to school until Monday. Betty Lois' heart was almost broken. Last year she and the other first-graders had had so much fun trying to April-fool each other!

"Who can I April-fool besides you and Daddy?" she said.

"You might try it on Grandpa and Grandma Brown," replied Mother Lane.

Mr. and Mrs. Brown were not truly-for-sure grandpa and grandma to Betty Lois; but she had always called them by those names. They lived in a pretty, white house just across the road and had lived there ever since Mother was a little girl.

"Mother, what can I do to April-fool Grandpa and Grandma Brown?" asked Betty Lois.

"I'll think up something," replied Mother Lane. "You might go up into the south room of the attic to play for a while. It will be nice and warm up there. Here is the key to that small trunk which has some of my little-girl clothes in it. Run along now, and Mother will put on her thinking cap."

It wasn't very long before Betty Lois came racing back down the two flights of stairs. Her mother stared in surprise at the figure of her daughter in a quaint pink calico dress and a white sun-bonnet with a pink lining. Mrs. Lane recalled that tucked away somewhere was a tintype of a little girl who looked almost exactly like the one who stood before her in the old-fashioned dress with its full, short waist, little puffed sleeves and very full skirt.

"The very thing!" exclaimed Mrs. Lane. "Now, Betty, take off your bonnet and dress, and Mother will have them freshly washed and ironed for you to wear over to Grandma Brown's tomorrow. I think that they will help you to April-fool Grandpa and Grandma."

"What shall I say to them, Mother?"

"I don't believe you'll need to say anything," replied Mrs. Lane.

Next morning when she saw the Browns out in their garden at work in the warm sunshine she quickly buttoned Betty Lois into the stiffly starched pink calico dress and tied the strings of the cunning bonnet under her round little chin. As Mrs. Lane looked into the brown eyes so like her own, she thought, "Well, there is one difference; but that won't be noticed while she has the bonnet on". Mrs. Lane was thinking of the two brown braids that had adorned her own small head, while Betty Lois wore her golden hair bobbed.

Betty Lois quickly ran across the road. She couldn't help giving a giggle as she opened the gate. Grandpa looked around and after staring a moment, exclaimed, "My eyes, Mother! Who is that"?

Grandmother looked and stared too. "I do believe," said she, "that it is Little Pink Calico"; and Grandpa added, "It certainly can't be anybody else".

You see, "Little Pink Calico" was the pet name which the Browns had given to Betty Lois' mother when she was a little girl, for they said that she surely was brought up in pink calico!

"Little Pink Calico!" exclaimed Grandma as she put her arms around the smiling little girl. "Have you come back again after so many years?"

"Why, Grandma," laughed Betty Lois, "that isn't my name. I'm just me."

"Oh, are you really?" laughed Grandma in turn. "Seems like I can scarcely believe it. Well, you certainly worked an April-fool on Grandpa and me."

"Oh, goody!" exclaimed Betty Lois, "and I hadn't said a word yet."

"No," said Grandma, "but this pretty dress and bonnet played quite a part. Now I have some fresh cookies for you, and when you take them home please tell your mother that half of them are for Little Pink Calico."—M. A. Kunkel, in Youth's Companion.

God's Dark.

The Dark is kind and cozy;
  The Dark is soft and deep;
The Dark will pat my pillow
  And love me as I sleep.

The Dark is smooth as velvet,
  And gentle as the air,
And he is good to children
  And people everywhere.

The Dark can see and love me
  Without a bit of light.
He gives me dreams and resting,
  He brings the gentle Night.

God made the Dark, so Daytime
  Could close its tired eyes
And sleep a while in comfort
  Beneath the starry skies.

The Daytime, just like children,
  Needs rest from work and play,
So it can give us children
  Another happy day.

God made the Dark for children
  And birdies in their nest.
All in the Dark He watches
  And guards us while we rest.

—John Martin.

Spring.

Driven by the strong south wind, fleecy clouds skim over the fields. There is a sound and a swaving in the tree-tops by the river. The breeze grows warm with a clearly-felt promise of life Down wooded hillsides leap the cold streams that draw off the last lingering snows of winter. The woods awaken. A restless spirit is manifest in the animals of the open. Red squirrels scamper in the high tree branches and birds flutter in the hedge openings with many twitterings. Even the insects know it is springtime and emerge to seek the broken limbs of maple trees dripping with sweet, sticky sap. The caw of the crow gains an exultant note. High in the top of a hemlock an owl has her nest; the young are ready to take wing, they were born in February. Then with burgeoning green buds bursting into leaves and the arrival of the southern birds—spring will be here.—Selected.

"A wise man built his house upon a rock---

and the rains descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and it fell not; for it was founded upon a rock."

Like rock house foundations, the essential quality of rock for monuments is durability. Other important qualities are beauty, legibility of inscriptions and adaptability to design. Granite is the only stone that fills these requirements, and many granites do not possess all these qualities.

Winnsboro Blue Granite

"The Silk of the Trade"

is a true granite, as pure a granite as is known. It possesses all of the above essential qualities for the ideal memorial, and it contains less deleterious ingredients—iron, lime, water—than other granites. It is, therefore, the most durable.

Be sure that you get the genuine Winnsboro Blue Granite. Like other high quality materials there are many inferior substitutes which resemble this granite on first appearance, but do not possess its lasting qualities and permanent beauty.

SOPHIE WHITE SOMMERVILLE.

On October 17, 1927, passed from suffering into eternal rest, SOPHIE WHITE SOMMERVILLE, youngest daughter of Dr. William Sommerville and Mrs. Maria Louisa Aby Sommerville, of White Post, Clarke county, Virginia. Thoroughly educated through study and travel, Sophie gave her life to teaching young children. Aesthetic taste, intense enjoyment of the delights of country life, and a keen sense of humor were outstanding traits in her character.

For more than five years she was afflicted with a distressing and incurable malady, which entailed upon her very great suffering, but she became very sweetly resigned and only rarely referred to her constant anguish.

A Presbyterian in her youth, she realized in later years that she was at heart more devoted to the Episcopal Church, and about two years before her death she was confirmed by the late Bishop Brown, of Virginia, as a member of the Meade Memorial Church at White Post. She found great solace in her religion.

She is survived by six brothers and sisters: Mrs. W. B. Bowen, Mrs. C. B. Welton, Mrs. A. S. Hatcher, Dr. C. W. Sommerville, Mr. J. A Sommerville and Dr R. C. Sommerville.

RESOLUTIONS

adopted by the Vestry of St. Paul's P. E. Church, of Suffolk, Virginia, on March 21, 1928.

In loving memory of the REV. JOHN FRANCIS COLEMAN.

The members of the Vestry of St. Paul's P. E. Church, of Suffolk, Virginia, desire to place upon record the deep sense of loss they have suffered by the death of their former Rector, the REV. JOHN FRANCIS COLEMAN, and to express, however inadequately, their love and admiration for him.

Coming to St. Paul's in 1910 Mr. Coleman soon made his way into the hearts of his people. For eleven years he gave himself unselfishly and untiringly to the work of this parish. He was a loving shepherd to the members of his flock, sharing their burdens, entering into their joys and sorrows and administering to their needs—and not only in his own congregation, but in the community as a whole, was his ministry exercised and his influence felt.

By reason of his wise administration of the affairs of the Red Cross in the days of the World War, and his widely exercised activity at all times, in furtherance of all enterprises for the betterment of the community, he was recognized as one of the city's foremost citizens, known, honored and loved by all classes of people.

In strong, unswerving loyalty to God; in fidelity to duty, in sympathy and patience; in kindly consideration and loving helpfulness he daily showed forth his Christlike nature. The sweet memory of his presence among us will be an inspiration to his people and will cheer and hearten them in many days of clouds and weariness.

We bless God's Holy name for the life of this true follower of Christ, and we pray that God's comfort and peace may be with his bereaved wife and other dear ones he leaves behind.

We direct that this little tribute of our love and admiration for him be spread upon the minutes of the Vestry; a copy be sent to his beloved wife, and a copy be published in the Southern Churchman.

Holy Week in Baltimore.

The increased observance of Holy Week is one of the notable features of the religious life of Baltimore. Many of the Protestant Churches now follow Roman and Episcopal practice, not only by observing Good Friday, but by services on other days of the week. The Federation of Churches is sponsoring a series of noon-day services at the Franklin Street Presbyterian Church, at which the preacher will be the Rev. Charles R. Brown, Dean of the Divinity School, Yale University. Dr. Brown will also preach in the evenings at the Mt. Vernon Methodist Episcopal Church. For the eight weeks preceding Easter, most of the Protestant Churches have united in a great Loyalty Campaign in an endeavor to increase Church membership and devotion.

Evangelism Keynote.

One hundred men of the Church gathered recently in Savannah for an interparochial meeting at St. Paul's Church, sponsored by the Men's Club of St. John's Church. The keynote of the speeches was personal evangelism and Mayor Hoynes, a vestryman of St. Michael and All Angels' Church, acted as toastmaster. The invocation and benediction were pronounced by the Bishop of the Diocese, and the invocation was followed by supper. Short talks were made by the President of the Men's Clubs of St. John's, St. Paul's and Christ Church. In his speech Mayor Hoynes emphasized the elevation of business ethics and the furtherance of Church work by personal effort and example. Mr. George W. Thames, Jr., Superintendent of the Church School of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, Fla., was the principal out-of-town speaker, especially invited to address the meeting, and he outlined the methods whereby his parish Church School had been able to develop its school into a successful religious and educational unit with 1,200 pupils attending.

A layworker of the Church Army of England, Captain Frank Bloxham, was present and gave a short address, pointing out the value of layworkers in evangelistic work. The rectors of the four city parishes were also present.

Healing Mission.

Beginning the Third Sunday in Lent, the Rev. Robert B. H. Bell, of Denver, Col., conducted a five-day healing mission at St. Mary's-in-the-Highlands, Birmingham, Ala., the Rev. Oscar deW. Randolph, rector.

At these services many hundreds were turned away.

It is estimated that nearly one thousand persons sought relief from bodily ills through Mr. Bell's guidance; and many of these have declared their health wholly or partially restored. Several cases of blindness and deafness were relieved, some of them of many years standing. The spiritual benefits of Mr. Bell's sermons on faith in God are incalculable. He has promised to return for another mission at a later date.

The building fever has laid hold on the Diocese of Alabama. In a single week three building schemes were undertaken: at Foley, Sylacauga and Fairfield. The latter is a place of over ten thousand inhabitants, where are situated several large plants of the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company. Here a beautiful lot has been secured, and the first unit of the proposed church and parish house is soon to be erected, according to plans prepared by Miller & Martin, architects of Birmingham. The entire plant, when completed, is expected to cost approximately fifty thousand dollars.

Personal Notes

On April 2, Dr. John W. Wood, Executive Secretary of the Department of Missions, returned to the Church Missions House from his visit to China, Japan and the Philippine Islands. Bishop Sanford, the other member of the commission sent out by the Department of Missions at the request of the Bishops in China, left Manila on February 15, returning to the United States by way of Europe. He expects to reach New York by April 23. After Easter, Dr. Wood is prepared to accept invitations to address Sunday congregations, mission clubs, diocesan branches of the Woman's Auxiliary, and other gatherings, concerning the Church's work in the Far East.

The Rev. George Victor Bell, now of Pocomoke City, Md., has accepted a call to the rectorship of five churches in the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, and expects to take up his new work about May 1. The group of churches of which he will have charge are: St. Luke's at Pedlar Mills; Emmanuel at Madison Heights, Amherst County; Trinity at Boonesboro, and Ivy Chapel, Forest, R. F. D. No. 2, both in Bedford County, and Christ Church at Schuyler, in Nelson County. The Rev. Mr. Bell will have his residence at Pedlar Mills. He is a native of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, Canada, and received his training for the ministry at Virginia Seminary. He has held charges in the Dioceses of Virginia, Montana, Maine and Easton, having served in his present charge since 1923.

The Rev. W. E. Phillips has resigned as rector of St. George's Church, New Orleans, La., and, after Easter, will be rector of St. John the Evangelist Church, New Brunswick, N. J.

The Rev. John Grainger, rector of Christ Church, Coronado, Cal., has resigned the rectorship of Christ Church, on account of ill health, to take effect May 15, 1928. After that date his address will be 1905 Linwood Street, San Diego, Cal.

AN EMERGENCY APPEAL

FOR THE NEWEST CHURCH SCHOOL IN OLDEST VIRGINIA

FIVE MARKS OF CHRISTCHURCH SCHOOL:

1. It re-occupies the earliest field of Anglo-Saxon civilization in America. It is located in Middlesex County, on the Rappahannock River, near its mouth—30 miles north of Jamestown and 50 miles east of Richmond, and has bus service twice daily from Richmond. It is the only standard boarding school for boys in Tidewater Virginia.
2. Its headmaster—the Rev. Dr. William Page Dame—is a really great leader of boys and is supported by a strong staff.
3. It has set up high standards of Christian character and academic attainment in a rural simplicity of life.
4. It has overtaxed its present capacity to house sixty selected boys, coming from homes of tradition and culture but ofttimes of slender resources. There is a long and rapidly growing waiting list for next session.
5. The fifth mark of the School—its very low cost ($600 covers all school charges)—can be maintained in one way only—by doubling the present enrolment; and the necessary building program costing $120,000 is now ready for immediate execution. Ground has been broken already on the first building, but for lack of funds the contract has been limited to partial completion.

Half of the required $120,000 is in sight, including a $20,000 subscription conditioned on the completion of the whole unified program in time for receiving sixty more boys next session.

Can sixty thousand dollars be raised immediately? With only seven years of history, the School must look to others than its few young alumni to care for its expanding growth. No organized canvass is possible, nor wide personal appeal; but this notice may arrest the attention of a few generous friends of such Christian education. Where possible, subscriptions should be followed by a personal visit to the School. Full reward will be realized in looking into the glowing faces of boys who will be Christian leaders of the next generation.

Cost per boy—Complete housing, $1,000; full furnishings, $100.

Gifts may be made memorials. Subscriptions (payable at convenience by check to Christchurch School Extension Fund) may be sent to

BIBLE INSTITUTE OF PENNSYLVIA

1418 NORTH SIXTEENTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA

SPRING TERM, APRIL 3 TO JUNE 22, 1928

PRINCIPLES

Interdenominational as to its Board of Trustees, Faculty and student body.

Evangelical, teaching the whole Bible as the Word of God.

Spiritual, pointing to Christ in the Bible as the Way, the Truth, and the Life, the source of all wisdom and knowledge in living and teaching.

Missionary, "And they went everywhere preaching the Word."

A TESTIMONY

The Bible Institute of Pennsylvania is a remarkable testimony to the power of God's Word. Scholarly and practical teaching, "rightly dividing the Word of Truth" in the power of the Spirit, has brought spiritual life and growth to those who have heard and assimilated it. Their contact with others has multiplied the work until hundreds have been efficiently trained and are bringing thousands into fellowship with our Lord.

Scores of our graduates are working as missionaries, pastors, teachers, and in other Christian activities throughout the world.

OPPORTUNITY FOR SERVICE

There is abundant opportunity for service in Missions, Outdoor Work, Sunday Schools, Personal Work, and through other methods of Christian endeavor.

EXPENSE TO STUDENTS

There is no charge for tuition. Administrative, teaching and general expenses are met by voluntary contributions. A charge of $9.50 per week is made to cover cost of room and board; a part of this amount may be earned by work in the buildings, for which students are paid by the hour. Books and stationery for the entire course would cost approximately $10.00.

SUPERVISION

By an Executive Committee, composed of the President, Dean, Associate Dean, and Executive Secretary. A general superintendent has charge of the buildings, of matters pertaining to room and board, and the practical work assignments of students. The dietitian is a graduate of the Bible Institute of Pennsylvania, and has had many years of experience; special attention is given to furnishing foods best suited to maintain the health of the students. An experienced matron endeavors to promote a spiritual fellowship and homelike atmosphere in the girls' dormitory.

The Story of the Prodigal Son
Told with Reverence and Boldness

By LOUIS TUCKER

WHEN HE CAME TO HIMSELF

Louis Tucker

The work of a brilliant scholar and story-teller. It gives a thousand graphic pictures of Palestine with its crowded roads and incredibly dense population; of Tiberius and Rome; of Herod and Herodias; of John the Baptist and Jesus; of what Jesus said upon divorce; of the Nazarites and of the Twelve.

The vividness of the style transports the reader as a living person into the greatest period of Christian history. A book which will raise a great controversy and be the most talked of religious novel in years!

ONLY a daring and adventurous spirit could have conceived this novel. And it could have been achieved only by much learning (carried as a joy and not a burden), by great insight into the hearts of men and women, and by a visual power strong enough to make the people and places of the first Christian century spring into life and color and three-dimensional reality.

The nature of this boldness is apparent when the cast of characters is considered: Jesus Himself, the Twelve, John the Baptist, Bar Abbas, Pilate and his wife, Herod, Herodias and Salome, Tiberius, Sejanus and others whose familiar names are a challenge to the imagination. To these are added the created figures in the personal drama of Bar Ad the Prodigal and his love for Karis—slave girls, gladiators, robbers, sailors, Jewish bankers, Roman patricians, Nazarites, soldiers, great ladies of the modish world.

A thousand vivid pictures are conjured up—of Palestine; of the fortress-palace of Herod; of Jerusalem, the streets through which Jesus walked to Olivet, the Temple and the Woman's Court; of Rome with its weltering poverty, ignorance and immorality; of Capri, Tyre and Cæsarea. The climaxes sweep from Roman arenas to the Cross of Golgotha and its amazing aftermath.

The Celestial Country

The world is very evil,
The times are waxing late;
Be sober and keep vigil,
The Judge is at the gate—
The Judge that comes in mercy,
The Judge that comes with might,
To terminate the evil,
To diadem the right.
When the just and gentle Monarch
Shall summon from the tomb,
Let man, the guilty, tremble,
For Man, the God, shall doom!

Arise, arise, good Christian,
Let right to wrong succeed;
Let penitential sorrow
To heavenly gladness lead—
To the light that hath no evening,
That knows nor moon nor sun,
The light so new and golden,
The light that is but one.

And when the Sole-Begotten
Shall render up once more
The kingdom to the Father,
Whose own it was before,
Then glory yet unheard of
Shall shed abroad its ray,
Resolving all enigmas,
An endless Sabbath-day.

There nothing can be feeble,
There none can ever mourn,
There nothing is divided,
There nothing can be torn.
'Tis fury, ill, and scandal,
'Tis peaceless peace below;
Peace, endless, strifeless, ageless,
The halls of Sion know.

THE ANGELICAN EPISCOPATE
OF CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND
By O. R. ROWLEY, Montreal.

Contains biographical sketches (not panegyric) of the official lives, together with half-toned portraits (4x5½) in Episcopal robes, of all Bishops consecrated for the Church in Canada and Newfoundland, beginning with Charles Inglis, formerly Rector of Trinity Church, New York, the first Bishop consecrated for Nova Scotia in 1787, and continuing to the present time; also portraits of Bishops or Priests who declined elections to Sees in Canada; with a Foreword by, and a portrait of, the Archbishop of Canterbury. There is a chapter on the Historic Episcopate, showing the line of succession from the Churches at Jerusalem, Ephesus and Rome, through Canterbury, the Church in Wales, the Church in Scotland, and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, down to the present Bishop of Montreal, to whom the book is dedicated. The book is replete with valuable information, and historical data regarding the Anglican Bishops of Canada and Newfoundland and the Church in those Dominions. It is a record of untold value, which does the Church high credit and good service. It is highly recommended by the Bishops of the Church in Canada. Churchman and libraries in the United States will be interested in this volume.

Price $3, in purple paper and $4 in purple cloth, postage additional.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Christ has turned every grave into a garden."

"The good deeds the Angels remember are oftenest those we forget."

The fullest life is that which is empty of self.

The clear conscience and the heart of faith will bring any man off from any field where he may be sent more than conquerer through Him who loves us.—Dean C. R. Brown.

Under what conditions the glory will be revealed to us I cannot guess. But I do not doubt that it will be revealed, for we forget sorrow, but we do not forget joy.—A. C. Benson.

In the game of life, nobody, however able or influential, can play our part.—Rev. Wm. Porkess.

Christ never sought to argue men into an acceptance of His teachings. He simply spoke as one having authority and His works were such as to make their own power of appeal. As He stands confronting Mary, saying, "Whom seekest thou"? and we hear Him say "Mary"! there comes the overwhelming impression that He is still alive: that He still gives life and power and inspiration. "My Master" . . . And nineteen centuries have verified it.—Presbyterian Banner.

Meditation is necessary to the mastery of life. We must live our lives inwardly in thought before we can live them outwardly in action. The architect thinks his building through from foundation to finish, he puts it all up in his brain before he erects it in steel and stone; and such inner preparation must always precede outer execution.—Exchange.

They slew Him. And those who had looked to Him for deliverance and hoped that He would end the long travail of man, sank into hopeless despair. But Easter morning dawned, and lo! His grave was empty. He was risen. The Father "had declared Him to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead".

When you have used your best judgment in deciding a question, never make the mistake of blaming yourself for not having decided differently. Nothing is more unjust than to reproach yourself for not being able to look into the future and to decide every question infallibly. When you have done your best, you have nothing to blame yourself for.—The Cross.

The great fact beyond our joyous celebration of Easter is the resurrection of Jesus. No book in the world has received keen criticism, searching study, wide publicity, and the ultimate test of daily use over a long period of time, as has our Bible. The fact is definitely established. Jesus was raised from the dead. And in that resurrection God put His seal and signature upon the life and teachings of Jesus to proclaim to us that those teachings and that life are eternally true.—Bishop Remington.

You may gain something by burning the "midnight oil", but the chances are your best thought will come to you as the light, in the dawning of the day.—Methodist Protestant.

DOES THE LOVE OF GOD, OUR HEAVENLY FATHER, OR MISERABLE SELFISHNESS AND LOVE OF MAMMON CALL MEN TO THE MINISTRY?

"IF ANY MAN WILL COME AFTER ME LET HIM DENY HIMSELF, AND TAKE UP HIS CROSS, AND FOLLOW ME."

Grotesque, unwholesome discussion has developed between Bishop Darlington, of the Diocese of Harrisburg, and the Rev. Guy Emery Shipler, the "Cleric" of The Churchman, New York City. When we recall the institution, purpose and beginnings of the Christian ministry and what that ministry is supposed to mean and to be, there is irresistible suggestion of humor, mingled with deep pathos, in the apparently unconscious, habitual tendency of both these gentlemen to regard the ministry as a business, or trade, in which the personal material gains or losses, profits or deficits, are first and chief consideration.

I am blest with the ingrained reverence for the office of bishop and respect for its occupant natural in an Episcopalian born and bred from many generations. Therefore, I very earnestly hope that Bishop Darlington was hurried by unconsidered zeal and the tendency of a strong and active mind to enlist every possible argument in support of a contention to temporary forgetfulness of the dignity and proprieties of his subject and that what he wrote in The North American Review for February regarding the attractiveness of the ministry did not express the real meditations of his heart, which he prays may be acceptable always to his Strength and Redeemer.

"The Christian ministry," the Bishop writes in the Review, "is a fairly well-paid calling. In fact, the minimum salary, in most dioceses, is $2,000 or more and a comfortable home." Then he goes on to tell of the mental stimulation, of the physical and social advantages and pleasures of parochial visits, including travel in an automobile, and probable "permanence of tenure". As a clincher, he recites that clergymen are exempt from being drafted for the army—he overlooked jury duty and road work exemption—and adds: "A discount of ten per cent is generally allowed them on clothing, books and other merchandise and they travel on half fare on the railroads."

All this bears unhappy resemblance to methods of recruiting sergeants seeking to snare yokels by describing the delights of army life, as told in older English novels. It is suggestive, also, of the vocal and literary activities of the more modern, energetic real estate agent intent on placing a choice corner lot in a new and promising suburb on an attractive prospect. The actual grotesqueness and sad humor of the utterance are brought to us with miserable vividness if we try to imagine St. Paul, going to stripes and stocks and prison and death; St. Luke, St. John, any of the early apostles and bishops, figuring carefully on probable salary, studying critically the furniture, equipment and conveniences of the rectory and the possible pleasures of visiting; when we visualize St. Peter, sentenced to be crucified and choosing to hang head downward because he was not worthy to die as his Lord died, speculating on half fares in traveling and ten per cent discount on his clothes. The Christian Church was given life, strength, organization, by the self-sacrifices and glorious courage of men and women inspired by the teaching and example of their Lord and Redeemer. It can be kept alive and strong only by the self-sacrifice and courage of servants and followers of the same Redeemer.

That, however, is an old-fashioned, fundamental view. It does not occur, apparently, to the Rev. Guy Emery Shipler, the 'Cleric" of The Churchman. That thrifty, energetic, enterprising salesman sees the subject from the commercial standpoint. Forthwith, he proceeds to controvert Bishop Darlington as "A Bishop in Blinders", and picture the situation of the clergy in colors dark and repellent as those of the Bishop are bright and alluring—from the business standpoint. In two extensive articles in The Churchman he describes the "Gloom of the Ministry". He presents lists and statistics to show how many ministers are ill paid or not paid at all, how uncertain their tenures, starved their minds, depleted their bodies. He seems to have organized a kind of ministerial employment bureau, or agency, for ministers out of work. The general tone of his articles suggests formation of a labor union of Episcopalian clergymen to demand more wages, less work, steady employment guaranteed, freedom from responsibility to vestries or congregations, especially deliverances from the "sacred vows", which Mr. Shipler finds infesting most parishes. That quoted expression "sacred cows" seems to be familiar slang with Mr. Shipler and his professional associates. Presumably it refers to the pious, active, revered women with whom most parishes are blest and its coarse flippancy seems to define the standards and status of the Rev. Mr. Shipler quite clearly.

Having printed his gloom articles in The Churchman—"sacred cow" and all—he promptly sends sheets containing them to clergymen through the country, to show them how eloquently and bravely The Churchman is disputing the Bishop, in their behalf, and a form letter calling their attention, and addressed and stamped postal cards on which to order sample copies or send subscriptions. A "real cute trick" almost any peddler of small wares would call this.

The Bishop's recital of the advantages, to purse and pleasure, of the ministry and the cleric's catalogue of their woes and wrongs and perils are alike destitute of hint of spiritual obligation, of whole-hearted devotion to the service of God, the Saviour of mankind. Both deal exclusively with the ministry as hard, dry, crisp business, a trade, or profession, like any other, in which success is to be estimated by the number of dollars obtained and sought by astute, adroit, management and judicious advertising. This is a strictly modernist attitude, strictly in accord with repudiation of the Divinity of Christ, denial of the power of the Creator to change at will the operation of laws created by Him and recitation of creeds and prayers as forms to be observed because required by the rules and customs of the craft. It rejects as obsolete, outworn, outthought, fundamentalism, the idea of self-sacrifice, of endurance of suffering and privation, of the possibility of the living fire of God in the human heart, the living love for God and man in a human soul.

Lord Bacon says prosperity is the virtue of the Old Testament, adversity that of the New. It is true that the times of prosperity and power and opulence, of getting on a business basis, are the times of worst danger for the Christian Church. When the Church of England became the established Church and was cursed with the patronage and wealth of monarchs, the hard-drinking, hard-swearing, free-living, free-thinking, parson, the parson complaisant to the vices of squire or lord on whom he depended for his living, developed widely. On a smaller scale we had like experience here in Virginia. Men sent here to perform the ceremonials of the Church sought gay and wealthy and worldly companionship, discredited the Church by disregard of its principles and precepts and neglect of their duties. In England, as here, there remained always a remnant of fundamentalists, some of them humble, poor, shabby, but devout, pure and high in life and thought—people of the plain living, high thinking, kind such as once were the glory and boast of New England, whom Wordsworth, even in his time, lamented as gone, but who yet are with us. They never have gone, never will go, always have been the keepers of the citadel and the conquering army of truth and righteousness. They kept vitality and purpose in the Church and restored it. They will continue to maintain it and to give it power.

In many a poor parish the minister of which is what Goldsmith, in the Vicar of Wakefield, tells us is the greatest object in the universe, a good man struggling bravely with adversity; in many rich and strong parishes, too, are men who no more count and scheme for dollars and favors than did Bishop Meade or Wesley or any of the many who have labored with and for the poor and weak and have carried the Gospel message to the wilderness, to the frontiers, to the heathen. These have taken up their cross and their work by impulse of the finest, noblest, sweetest motives known to humanity, motives which win love and honor from God Himself. These will keep the Church strong and going ever forward because they love Church and God and Saviour and their fellow creatures. Smug worldliness and materialism and commercialism will fail now to shake the Church's sure foundations as they have failed always.

As an humble layman, I record my protest against this unseemly controversy that has arisen and the manner of its conduct; recording also the confidence given me by faith in the Almighty and the predictions based on His promises and on history remote and recent.

GIFTS

Last year is noted in the newspapers as the greatest year for gifts, benefactions, in the history of the world. In 1927 men and women in this country gave far above two hundred million dollars—a sum which challenges the powers of our arithmetic and the arithmetical imagination of most of us—in large amounts for special purposes. Henry E. Huntington left forty millions for an educational foundation, to be named for him. Mrs. Mary E. Emery, widow of the inventor of the Emery wheel, a man who won justly and deserved fully the fortune that was his, left twenty million for charity and education. Henry Buhl, of Pittsburgh, left fifteen million for charity. We sent abroad uncounted millions for relief of destitutes and forlorn people whose languages we do not know, none of whom will be able, in this life, to see and thank us. Frank E. Campbell, of Atlantic City, gave a million for advancement of the welfare of youth. B. C. Dahlberg, of Chicago, a million to advance home ownership. Frederick R. Levenburg, of New York, a million for the building of model tenements for wage-working people. John Whalen, of Brooklyn, a million and a half for advancement of the charity work of the Roman Catholic Church. S. Friedman, New York, a million for Hebrew charities. R. F. Cutting, New York, a quarter million for cancer research. J. P. Morgan, $200,000 for search for a cure for sleeping sickness. The Fraternal Order of Elks, composed largely of theatrical and sporting people, two millions for fighting tuberculosis and care of orphan children.

Note the names of these givers—Teuton, Celt, Saxon, Protestant, Roman, Jew—strong people of the world in this country of strength and struggle and opportunity, assembled here, working here, some of them winning wonderfully in the strife for place and power and wealth. All, in their strength and power and success, native and foreign, Gentile and Jew, Protestant and Romanist, alike feeling the power and teaching of the gentle, loving, supremely valiant and generous Christ. Let the heathen rage. His spirit and teachings rule and prevail in this dominant land and dominate the world, more and more.

But—Yet. "And He looked up and saw the rich men casting in their gifts into the treasury. And He saw a certain poor widow casting in thither two mites"—a fraction of one of our cents, less than would buy two dead sparrows, but all she had. In all literature, history, poetry, is nothing more sublimely or delicately lovely than that episode, given us by St. Luke and St. Mark. The Son of the Supreme Creator and Master of the universe honoring this poor, shabby, pinched, patched, widowed woman, because she was doing from her devout heart the most she could, giving her meagre all for the service of God. It is not told that she was a believer, or follower of Christ, or that she saw or knew Him. He, with legions of conquering angels at His command for His deliverance, but come to earth to save, by His humiliation and agony and long pangs of death, the myriads of the human race, noted and crowned with immortal affection and admiration the nameless stranger and her gift, pitiful in sight of men, immeasurably splendid in the estimation of the supreme, inconceivable Power. Surely, it was fitting and inevitable that when men organized for reverence of womanhood, kindliness, respect for weakness and lowliness, dauntless championship of the oppressed against oppression, chivalry made the Cross its symbol, the meaning of the Cross its guidance.

Perhaps it was almost exactly nineteen hundred years ago when the rich men were casting their gifts into the treasury. Now they give so as to make the old gifts seem small and with breadth of bounty and purpose by comparison with which the greatest of the old contributions seem narrow. Yet, the lesson in nobility, in splendor, in beauty and tenderness, worthy of the God from whom it came, stands clear before us. "This poor widow hath given more than they all."

Infinitesimally petty must be a million of our dollars, given grudgingly or for ostentation, in sight of the Creator and Lord of worlds beyond our powers of enumeration

He measures by purpose and motive. With Him the million and the mite given with like intent weigh alike. We have, on His authority, assurance that the mite representing self deprivation for love of Him, obedience to Him, for His honor and cause, is larger and by far more precious than the most liberal bestowal from abundance.

Perhaps no other joy permitted to humanity is so pure and sweet and intense as that of a parent over the honorable achievement of a beloved child. Parables and many passages of Scripture entitle us to ascribe to Deity some of the best and highest of our own emotions. We may imagine Him and the hosts of angels rejoicing exultant over gifts made and acts done daily among us, unknown and unnoticed here. Men and women give all they have, literally lay down their lives, surrender ambitions, stifle with splendid valor natural cravings, toil in obscurity. With grandeur of spirit derived from Divinity they triumph—and some of them very poor and plain and humble people —over neglect by their neighbors and constant discouragement and obstacles and go on their chosen way, working for God and mankind—and straight toward Paradise and joyous welcome and everlasting honor and happiness there. We see and, justly, praise and admire the rich man giving in sums almost too large for us to grasp. Infinitely finer, more glorious and magnificent in sight of the All Seeing and All Knowing are the countless daily gifts of which we do not know. Very trivial in the view of Omnipotence, must be our denominational and social and racial differences, quarrels, jealousies, prejudices, very beautiful and splendid the community of love and loyalty and devotion which everywhere on our planet inspires Teuton, Celt, Latin, Saxon, Romanist, Protestant, people of all the diffused rivalries and contentions of doctrine and forms of worship, to unite for serving and doing duty to God and man. The rectors, priests, pastors, preachers, mission workers, the lay workers of many kinds and under many names, the devoted women, all striving, frequently in poverty and hardship and amid squalid and repulsive surroundings, sometimes in actual physical peril, to cleanse and save—all these give lavishly and constantly and bravely. These win the commendation and love of Eternal Power. What these have done, are doing, is not printed in newspapers. It is too usual and familiar to be news. It was done on each of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year, 1927, and the year before that. The story of the certain poor widow and her deathlessly fruitful and glorious two mites tells us that all this sacrifice and achievement in this world overlooked is recorded to live and shine in the annals that never shall decay nor be lost, to be repaid with glory that never shall fade and beauty and peace unending.

"BE CARFFUL TO MAKE YOUR CALLING AND ELECTION SURE"

"When God calls certain ones, sometimes the wrong man answers and he mistakes his calling."

We have received a letter from one of the partisans of the present faculty of the Virginia Theological Seminary, signing himself W. R. Moody, Lawrenceville, Va., which requests us to print same in our paper, but we will not print same as he has exceeded the bounds of gentility and has indulged in the language of street gamins and rowdies. His letter has been filed in our waste basket, and no communications from him will receive any attention from us. If W. R. Moody is a fair sample of the present output of the Virginia Theological Seminary, we think our complaints or criticisms may be fully justified.

Let me say The Southern Churchman has never attacked the personal honesty of our Virginia Seminary professors as Mr. Moody asserts. We can't say aught against the private character of these brethren, which we deem above reproach. We claim, however, the right to criticise the teaching at the Seminary. That belongs to the public and is subject to fair criticism to which there can be no objection. Such criticism is not mud-slinging, but the exercising of a right inherent in every religious paper to criticise the teaching and conduct of its own Seminary. If we have been misinformed, then our criticisms may be unjust. But our informants assert positively that we have just cause for complaint. Believing them true, we may have been aroused over the matter and expressed ourselves too strongly. But remember, when one believes that his house is being torn down over his head, he is not careful in the choice of missiles with which to drive away the intruders and destroyers.

As a result of recently acquired information we feel that we owe some apology to the Virginia Seminary for charging Karl Reiland to them, as we understand that he was there only a short time and was not regarded as a fair sample of the output of the seminary. P. G., praise God.

From the evidences now before us it seems to us likely that Mr. Karl Reiland might have been more correctly classed as a sample of the "put out" of the Virginia Seminary rather than the "output" of that institution.

If we can be assured that our spiritual house, as we regard the Seminary, is not being torn down, we will gladly modify our attitude. But we must be shown.

Meantime, we print that portion of a letter from Mr. Gill, which, we think, germane to the situation and worthy of print, because we believe the advocates of the present faculty should be given the chance to be heard.

THE SCRIPTURE UNION.
London, England.

M. C. Worthington.

The Scripture Union is a World-Wide Union of Bible Readers, for old and young. It was commenced in 1879 to promote Daily Systematic Reading of the Bible in connection with the Children's Special Service Mission. It has been prospered of God, and today there are about three quarters of a million members, and the cards are printed in sixty languages.

The Plan.—To read consecutively a Book in the Old Testament alternately with a Book in the New Testament. In the latter, with slight exceptions, the whole Book is read. A part only is taken of many Old Testament chapters, that the portions may not be too long, but to elder members it is suggested that they read the omitted verses. Readings lead up to Christmas and Easter seasons. There is no pledge.

The Motto.—"All Scripture is Given by Inspiration of God."

The Scripture Union asks its members to pray each Sunday morning for all the other members.

This Union—

1. Leads us to read ALL the Bible;
2. Will strengthen YOUR life;
3. Is a good basis for FAMILY prayers;
4. Is a BULWARK in any Church or Society;
5. Is a World-Wide PRAYER Union.
6. Represents NOBODY'S views.
7. Is used for Bible STUDY classes.
8. Allows ANYBODY to start a branch.

Daily Notes on the Portions are now being written by the Rev. W. Graham Scroggie, D. D., and come in monthly booklets, giving an exposition of about three hundred words for each day.

The Headquarters of the Scripture Union are at 3 and 5 Wigmore Street, London, England. Secretary, Mr. J. H. Hubbard.

Canadian Division Office—319 Bay Street, Toronto. Honorary Central Secretaries for Canada, Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Richardson.

In Virginia, U. S. A.—Honorary Secretary, Miss Margaret C. Worthington, 612 Maple Street, Charlottesville, Va.

Members' Cards are not sold, but issued only to those who promise to read, and sign up.

Minimum subscription, ten cents; bnt many members give more. Monthly Booklets of Daily Notes, thirty-five cents for twelve months. Almanacs, two cents.

Note.—In commending the Scripture Union, we regret that owing to lack of space and the fact that the Notes are copyrighted, we cannot continue their publication in The Southern Churchman. We hope that our readers have been so enlightened and helped by the masterly exposition by Dr. Scroggie that they will wish to purchase the booklets and read the daily portion under the illuminating guidance of his inspired pen.—Editor.

THE STONE WITNESS

By the Reverend W. Lamb

Burton Street Tabernacle, Sydney.

THE great Pyramid of Gizeh is the world's oldest building and the largest ever erected. It is estimated to weigh six million tons, and, had it to be moved away, sixty thousand locomotives, each drawing one hundred tons, would be necessary for the job. The wealth of Egypt would be insufficient to pay for its removal.

The remains of about forty other pyramids are to be seen in Egypt, but all available evidence indicates that every such structure was simply a defective imitation of the first. Seven great wonders were spoken of in the ancient world. At the head of the list of them always was named the Great Pyramid of Gizeh. The earliest historians have invariably something of interest to say in regard to it. Herodotus tells how in his day: "It was then one beautiful, glistering mass of stone, shining in the sun, and so reflecting its rays that it was supposed to be visible from the moon as a brilliant star on earth." The sacred books of the Hindoos speak of three great pyramids in Egypt, the greatest of which they call "the golden monument", the others being thought of as mountains of silver, and, therefore, in comparison less valuable. Of this one Lepsius wrote: "The builders of the Great Pyramid seem to assert their right to form the commencement of human history." And Prof. Piazza Smith claimed for it that "the world has no material and contemporary record of intellectual man earlier than the Great Pyramid". Asburn wrote of those with him, when they first beheld it, how "it burst upon us at once in the flower of its highest perfection. Its long shadow darkens the fields of Gizeh, and, when the spectator can obtain a distinct conception of its vastness, no words can describe the overwhelming sense of it which rushes upon his mind. He feels oppressed and staggers beneath a load, to think that such a mountain was piled up by the handiwork of man". A Greek traveler in our Lord's time, named Strabo, tells how it then looked like a building let down from Heaven.

Gizeh's Pyramid was erected six hundred years before Moses began writing the Sacred Scriptures. Imagination is profoundly stirred just to think of the myriad feet that have trodden the golden sand around it, and of those who have gazed in wonder at especially the former magnificence of this great monument. Traders from far distant lands, bringing merchandise of indescribable variety, appear for a little, then vanish slowly into the murky horizon of sand beyond. Mighty warriors from Assyria, from Babylon, from Persia, from Greece, from Rome and from other far away lands, defiled past this mighty unconquerable mountain of stone, without the least thought of the wonders held tight beneath its four shining sides. For it is only during the last century, and more especially within the last decade, that the real message of its hidden greatness has come to be realized.

Long caravans, heavily laden camels, sad-faced captives, cruelly torn from far-distant homes, to be sold as slaves in the market places of Egypt, and now closely watched by their swarthy guards, wearily lift their heads as they go by. Here appears the patriarch Abraham, with his great household, in days of famine, seeking food in a land that even yet provides six crops of clover in one year. Here also go past the Midianites with young Joseph, sold to them by his brethren for twenty pieces of silver. Then, one evening, as the sunset waned, and the afterglow faded into the clear, soft African night, here halted Mary and Joseph after their long, weary journey, seeking sanctuary for the Holy Child in Egypt from the malice of the treacherous Herod, down yonder in Judea. Many other successive generations of travelers have gone past, each of them always in complete ignorance of the astonishing mysteries shut away in the majestic edifice, the very appearance of which invariably filled their souls with deepest awe.

The Great Pyramid was made to endure. Built on a rock which rises some one hundred and fifty feet above the level of the Nile Valley, it has weathered the storms of more than four thousand years. The building of it occupied one hundred thousand men for thirty years, in addition to the ten years they spent in making a great causeway from the Nile bank to the Pyramid Hill, over which were moved to their final position the huge masses of stone that had been rafted down the river from the Mokattan Hills, twenty-five miles away. Some of the great stones used are estimated to weigh eight hundred and eighty tons each. There are stones in this Pyramid thirty feet in length, which are so closely fitted together that you may run a penknife over the surface without finding the breaks between them. No mortar was used to bind them together, and there is no machinery now perfect enough to make two surfaces, thirty feet in length, which will join together so exactly as do the huge stones in the Great Pyramid. It is the only building in the world that is perfect in orientation, that is, with its four sides facing exactly north, south, east and west. To get similar result the greatest care has been often exercised in regard to other structures, but only failure has resulted. The rock on which the Pyramid is built was first bevelled to the ratio of eight inches to the mile, which is, precisely, the exact curvature of the earth's surface. But, not with any others of the pyramids was such provision made, with the natural result that every one of them is found to be broken all over, while not a flaw or crack has developed in the Great Pyramid, after the more than forty centuries since it was built. The Great Pyramid was originally cased with polished marble, but the casings of the others were of granite. This would clearly indicate that the builders of the first were possessed of a knowledge that was lacking in those who erected the others. For while granite expands and contracts with heat and cold, marble is but little affected by either. Unfortunately, the great casing stones are not now there. The outside forms just a series of steep steps from the ground away up to the top. But there was a time when every one of these steps was filled in with their most exquisitely-fitting triangular casing stones, the angles of which were cut with most astonishing accuracy, one of them actually being cut to three tenths and the other to seven-tenths of a second. Such remarkable exactness had to be arranged by the architects before even one of the casing stones had been chiselled, and precisely maintained, by the army of skilled workmen right through to the finish.

Just think on the wonder of all this! To construct a pyramid, the first care would be to determine the length of its base. In the Great Pyramid the height was to be four hundred and eighty-six feet, with a base line of seven hundred and sixty-four feet, the four sides were to face exactly the four cardinal points of the heavens, the entire square of the base was to cover thirteen and one-half acres, and the area of each of its four triangular sides was to be about five acres, or exactly three hundred and sixty-five and one-fourth cubits. All of that was determined to an absolute infinitesimal fraction before even one stone was laid.

The measure used throughout was the cubit of twenty-five inches, called the sacred cubit, because it was precisely the same standard of measure used in the construction of Israel's Tabernacle in the Wilderness. The base line was fixed to be the length of 365.242 of these cubits; that is, the exact length in days to an absolute fraction of the mean solar year. Thus, the four sides together have the same number of sacred cubits, exactly, as there are days in four years, including what is called leap year. Then it has been found how the predetermined height was arranged with similar astonishing preciseness to be 232.520 cubits, with apparent remarkable results. One of these is that if the height of the Pyramid is divided into twice the base a most remarkable number is reached, 3.14159, which is the very number by which the circle is squared.

In the higher branches of mathematics such knowledge is known to be indispensable.

Here is another one of very many such astonishing features in regard to the Great Pyramid. In it the layers of stone are found to be of a varying thickness. Generally near the bottom they are thicker, and thinner higher up from the ground. But the thirty-fifth course of stone is found to be of a very remarkable thickness, especially in contrast to the preceding thin one. So clearly defined is it that this thirty-fifth course can be picked out by the trained eye from quite a long way off in the desert. To put that thirty-fifth course of stone up there it must have meant forty thousand tons of extra lifting up. That there was definite purpose in this matter is quite evident, for the discovery has been made that the top of this particular layer to the vertical centre line of the Pyramid, divided by ten, is the exact length in inches that the base line is in cubits. And when this thirty-fifth course of stone is divided by its height from the ground, again is attained that remarkable number, 3.14159, to its exact decimal, by which the circle is squared.

The height of the Pyramid, multiplied to the ninth power of ten gives 91,840,000 miles, which is the nearest, most recent calculation of the mean distance of the earth from the sun. Such a fact cannot be without significance when it is remembered that previous estimates have made this distance to vary from 10,000 up to hundreds of millions of miles. And all the time, this wonderful monument, erected over four thousand years ago, held for those able to read it the exact distance away of the sun from our planet.

Then, in inches the height of the Great Pyramid is 5813.03 inches. Now, suppose a rod were made just that length, and one end of it were placed exactly on the original apex of the pyramid, and the other end swung around this central point on a horizontal plane, the circle made in that great sweep would include within it, exactly to a fraction, the same number of inches as there are days in a century of years, namely 36,524.2. It can hardly be imagined that such wonders happened just by chance!

The Interior.

For what purpose, then, was this mighty monument set up? This is a great question. Ancient Egypt is filled with monuments that are covered over with hieroglyphics, which, in every one of them, ostentatiously proclaim their purpose. And it is only since the discovery of the ancient Rossetta Stone, A. D. 1799, on which is writing conveying similar expression in three languages—hieroglyphics, Greek and the common language of the people—that the writing on old Egyptian monuments could be read. But, here is the remarkable feature in regard to the greatest of all Egypt's monuments, the Great Pyramid contains not one word of hieroglyphics nor anything else either. The wonderful discovery that has been made is that in its huge structure the language of its message is conveyed through mathematical measurement, absolutely exact to the last possible fraction. Was this six million tons weight structure set up to be a tomb? Never! For the interior passages were found to have portcullis blocks of stone so closing up the entrances as to make absolutely impossible the conveyance of coffins anywhere towards the interior. The later imitation pyramids were clearly built for tombs, as within them have been found mummified remains. But never a relic of this sort has been seen within the precincts of the Great Pyramid.

For three thousand years it was sealed up. Not even the entrance was known. When in A. D. 825 the men employed by Mamond Pasha to break into it to obtain the treasure, until then imagined to be somewhere inside, they began digging through some considerable distance away from the proper entrance which was only afterwards discovered. Those desiring the entrancing story in detail would find my book, "The Great Pyramid Witness" (2/-), of deep interest.

What the diggers found was, first, a long, inclined, descending passage, one hundred and eighty feet in length, forty-four inches wide, forty-two inches high, leading away down into a rough, unfinished pit, dug into the rock. About one-third of the distance down was found, in the roof, another ascending passage, some two hundred and eighty feet in length, extending for one hundred and thirty feet: the dimensions were found to be the same as the descending passage; then, for the last one hundred and fifty feet, the height was seen to be seven times greater than in the first portion. This higher part has been called the Grand Gallery. At the top of it there is a large step thirty-six inches high. From then on the floor proceeds horizontally, though immediately a low passage has to be traversed to a high chamber called the Ante Chamber. Then follows another low passage which leads into what is called the King's Chamber. At the beginning of the Grand Gallery was discovered another horizontal passage which led straight into a chamber, which is now named the Queen's Chamber.

The Coffer.

Nothing whatever was found in either chambers or passages except a large empty stone chest, at the far end of the King's Chamber. It is a simple, rectangular, lidless trough, with no inscription or ornament of any kind on it, and, of such a size that not possibly could it be taken either in or out of this place since the Pyramid was first built. All its proportions are geometrical, and its sides and bottom are cubically identical with its internal space. The length of its two sides to its height is seen to be as is a circle to its diameter, while its external volume is just twice the dimensions of its bottom, and its whole measure is just the fiftieth part of the size of the King's Chamber. This stone coffer is found to be of precisely the same capacity measure as was the Ark of the Covenant, the designs for which were given by the Almighty to the children of Israel in the Wilderness. The Jewish Laver of Washing also was of exactly the same dimension, while the molten sea in Solomon's Temple at Jerusalem was just fifty times the capacity of the coffer. The length and breadth of it divided by its height gives again the number which square the circle, 3.14159.

Other Wonders.

If the length of the King's Chamber is made the diameter of a circle, then a square of the same area has 365,242 inches in each of its sides, which number we have seen is exactly the same as the number of days in the solar year. Add the length and height of the King's Chamber together, divide by the breadth of it, the result is the other remarkable number, everywhere found in the Pyramid (3.14159), the number which squares the circle.

But the whole structure contains a great multitude of the same marvelous mathematical expression. Space here forbids mention. But, is that all? Surely not! We have seen how the coffer relates to the Ark of the Divine Covenant. In the same way, the whole of this Great Pyramid is believed to connect definitely with the Word of God.

It is a witness against the evolutionary theory. For it shows that earliest man possessed knowledge afterwards lost to the race. It also gives out the clearest possible testimony in regard to the near return to this world of the Lord Jesus Christ. Isaiah 19:19 speaks definitely in regard to the time of this great event. "In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, a pillar at the border thereof." The Great Pyramid stands right in the centre of Egypt, and on the border line of Upper and Lower Egypt, the spot indicated by the prophecy. Then verse twenty says, of the Pillar of Witness: "It shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of hosts in the land of Egypt; for they shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressions, and He shall send them a Saviour, and a Great One, and He shall deliver them." The remainder of this chapter shows how, when this Deliverer has come, the Egyptians, the Assyrians and the people of Israel are all to be found in holy fellowship with God. All other Scriptures give clearest testimony of the same thing. The Son of God is coming again to this world. He is to sit upon the throne of David, which is to be once more set up. All nations and kings are to bow down before Him and serve Him.

Yet, before the appearing of God's Christ, the world is to go through the greatest agony ever known. "Then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved." "Immediately after the tribulation of these days, they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory" (Matt. 24:21-29). Many Christian people everywhere earnestly believe the great event now to be near. All the God-given signs of the times fully justify such anticipation.

The Pyramid's Witness.

The Great Pyramid clearly tells the commencement of human history, the very day of the giving of the law of God to Israel, the time of our Lord's birth, and His death and resurrection; also the beginning of the Christian Dispensation. The very day and hour of the commencement and also the termination of the Great War are also clearly indicated, and, if its witness can be accepted, the Great Pyramid also proclaims the solemn fact that this world is now in a short period of truce that must soon be ended by the beginning of world agony that only terminates with the appearing of Christ in glory.

The time for it seems near. Every believer may soon be caught up from the earth to meet the Blessed Lord in the Heavens. Are you ready for the great event? One shall be taken, the other left. You are not ready, if you have not believed in Jesus Christ as your only Saviour from sin. He was wounded for your transgressions. He was bruised for your iniquities. He loved you and gave Himself for you: God has set Him forth to be the propitiation through faith in His blood that your sins may be for ever remitted. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shall be saved. Doing that, you can wait with calmness the events of the time that is near.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart" (Psalm 119:11).

This week the following verse was submitted by Mr. J. T. Bougher, Reading Terminal, Philadelphia, Pa.:

> "And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever."—Daniel 12:3.

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES

Prepared by J. T. Bougher. Reading Terminal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

LESSON—No. 30.

TOPIC—The Distinction God Makes Between Believers and Unbelievers.

As we learned from our previous studies, which we would do well to review from time to time, God makes a very clear distinction between those who as believers are born into the family of God, and those who are not. Let no man deceive us in this, for many deceivers are in the world.—2 Peter 2:1; Jude 1.

How precious of our Heavenly Father that He has given us "the Written Word" to which we may ever turn as the unfailing guide to all truth. An unbeliever in the Scriptural meaning of the term, is one who has not received the Lord Jesus into his heart as his own personal Saviour and Lord. See John 1:12; John 3:16; Romans 10:9, 10; Eph. 3:17; 1 John 5:12. Let us therefore carefully note the following contrasts

THE BELIEVER.

1. Dead to sin.—1 Peter 2:24.
2. Saved from wrath.—Rom. 5:9.
3. Brought nigh to God.—Eph. 2:13.
4. No condemnation.—John 5:24.
5. Blindness removed.—2 Cor. 3:16.
6. A child of God.—Gal. 3:26.
7. Eternally saved.—John 3:16.
8. Certain of Heaven.—2 Tim. 4:18.
9. Awaits the glory.—Titus 2:13.
10. A glorious assurance.—1 Peter 1:3, 4.

THE UNBELIEVER.

1. Dead in trespasses and sin.—Eph. 2:1.
2. Under God's wrath.—Eph. 2:3.
3. Without God.—Eph. 2:12.
4. Under condemnation.—John 3:18.
5. Blinded by Satan.—2 Cor. 4:4.
6. A child of Satan.—John 8:44.
7. Eternally lost.—John 3:36.
8. Certain of hell.—Rev. 21:8.
9. Awaits the judgment.—Heb. 9:2.
10. A solemn warning.

The reader is lovingly urged to ponder over these two classes, for there is no neutral ground. You are either a believer, or an unbeliever. The Word of God recognizes no middle class. If up to this time you have been an "unbeliever", it is your high privilege to immediately become a "believer", by receiving the beloved Son of God as your Saviour and Lord, when by the sure mercies of God you will pass from death unto life; a partaker of the life of the Eternal Christ.

Having done this you are "a babe in Christ and need to feed upon the sincere milk of the Word, and to thereby grow in the grace and love of Him, in whom is hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. (See Lesson No. 16, on "What Must I Do to Be Saved".)

THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES

By the Right Reverend John Charles Ryle, D. D.

I MUST begin this paper with an apology. My subject may seem at first sight dry, dull, and uninteresting. But I ask my readers to believe that it is not so in reality. There are few points about which it is so important for English Churchmen to have clear and correct views, as about the nature, position, and authority of the Thirty-nine Articles.

Marriage settlements and wills are not very lively reading. Like all carefully-drawn legal documents, they are extremely unattractive to general readers. The language seems cramped and old-fashioned; the amount of verbiage and circumlocution in them appears positively astounding: yet none but a child or fool would ever dare to say that wills and marriage settlements are of no use. The happiness of whole families often turns upon the meaning of their contents. It is even so with the Thirty-nine Articles. Dry, and dull, and uninteresting as they may appear to some, they are in one sense the backbone of the Church of England. Surely some knowledge of them ought to be sought after by every sensible and intelligent member of our Communion.

Who is the "true Churchman"? That is the question which is shaking the Established Church of England to the very centre, and will shake it a good deal more, I suspect, before the end of the world comes. It is becoming a very large and serious question, and one which imperatively demands an answer.

It is not enough to say that everybody who goes to church is a "true Churchman". That reply, I think, will content nobody. There are scores of people occupying our pews and benches every Sunday, who know nothing whatever about religion. They could not tell you, if life depended upon it, what they believe or don't believe, hold or don't hold, think, or don't think, about any doctrine of Christianity. They are totally in the dark about the whole subject. Politics they know, and business they know, and science perhaps they know, and possibly they know something about the amusements of this world. But as to the composition of a "true Churchman's" creed, they can tell you nothing whatever. They "go to church" on Sundays; and that is all. Surely this will never do! Ignorance, complete ignorance, can never be the qualification of a true Churchman.

But perhaps it is enough to say that everybody who goes to church, and is zealous and earnest in his religion, is a "true Churchman"? That is a very wide question, and opens up an entirely new line of thought. But I fear it will not land us in any satisfactory conclusion. "Earnestness" is the attribute of men of the most opposite and contradictory creeds. "Earnestness" is the character of religionists who are as wide apart as black and white, light and darkness, bitter and sweet, hot and cold.—You see it outside the Church of England. The Mohammedans who overran the rotten Churches of Africa and Western Asia, crying, "The Koran or the sword", the Hindoo Fakir who stands on one leg for twenty years, or throws himself under the car of Juggernaut—the Jesuit, who saps and mines, and compasses sea and land to make one proselyte—the Mormonite, who crosses half the globe to die in Salt Lake City, and calls Joe Smith a prophet—all these undeniably were and are earnest men. You see it inside the Church of England at this very day. The Ritualist, the Rationalist, the Evangelical—all are in earnest. Mr. Mackonochie and Dr. M'Neile—Dean Stanley and Archdeacon Denison—Mr. Bennett, of Frome, and Mr. Daniel Wilson, in London—all are, or were during their lives, unquestionably earnest men. Yet every one knows that their differences are grave, wide, deep, and irreconcilable. Surely this will never do. Earnestness alone is no proof that a man is a true Churchman. The devil is in earnest. Infidels are in earnest. Deists are in earnest. Socinians are in earnest. Papists are in earnest. Pharisees were in earnest. Sadducees were in earnest. Earnestness alone proves nothing more than this—that a man has a good deal of steam and energy and "go" about him, and will not go to sleep. But it certainly does not prove that a man is a "true Churchman". What is the man earnest about? That is the question that ought to be asked, and deserves to be answered.

Once for all, I must protest against the modern notion, that it does not matter the least what religious opinions a man holds, so long as he is in "earnest" about them—that one creed is just as good as another—and that all "earnest" men will somehow or other at last find themselves in heaven. I cannot hold to such an opinion, so long as I believe that the Bible is a revelation from God. I would extend to every one the widest liberty and toleration. I abhor the idea of persecuting any one for his opinions. I would "think and let think". But so long as I have breath in my body, I shall always contend that there is such a thing as revealed truth—that men may find out what truth is if they will honestly seek for it—and that mere earnestness and zeal, with Scriptural knowledge, will never give any one comfort in life, peace in death, or boldness in the day of judgment.

But how are we to find out who is the "true Churchman"? some one will ask me. Men complain with good reason that they feel puzzled, perplexed, embarrassed, bewildered, posed, and mystified by the question. Rationalists, Ritualists, and Evangelicals, all call themselves "Churchmen". Who is right? The name "Churchman" is bandied about from side to side, like a shuttlecock, and men lay claim to it who on many points are diametrically opposed to one another. Now how are we to settle the question? What are we to believe? What are we to think? How shall we distinguish the good coin from the bad? In one word, is there any test, any legal, authorized test of a true Churchman?

My answer to all these inquiries is short, plain, and most decided. I assert confidently that the Church of England has provided a test of true Churchmanship, and one that is recognized by the law of the land. This test is to be found in "the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion". I say, furthermore, that the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion form a test which any plain man can easily understand, if he will only give his mind to a study of them. An honest examination of these Articles will show any one at this day who is the best, the truest, the most genuine style of Churchman. To exhibit the authority, nature, and characterists of the Thirty-nine Articles, is the simple object for which I send forth the paper which is now in the reader's hands.

COME UNTO ME.

Grace W. Kellogg.

"Come unto Me," the Saviour calls today,
"I am thy Lord, the same alway.
Lo! ever I am with thee to defend,
Come unto Me, I am your Friend.

"These wounded hands and feet that bled for thee
Rose from the dead in Victory!
Thrust in thy hand as in the days of yore,
I am alive forever more!

"Come unto Me, receive my gift to you,
Because I live, ye shall live too.
God's gift, eternal life, is in His Son,
Receive it now, on earth begun.

"Nor life, nor victory is earned by thee,
Cease thy dead works, and come to Me.
Without Me ye can nothing do, nor live,
Come unto Me, I freely give.

"Unseen by thee, My hands reach out to bless,
To lift thee out of thy distress,
My feet would smooth thy earthly path of life
To give thee peace amid its strife.

"Come unto Me, thy burden lay on Me,
My strength shall carry it and thee,
My love shall bear away thy weight of woe,
And in its place My joy bestow.

"Come unto Me, thou weary child, today,
I am thy Lord, the same alway,
Who changeth not unto the end,
Come unto Me, I am your Friend."

Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden and I will give you rest.—Matt. 11:28.

Jesus Christ the same yesterday and today, and forever. —Heb. 13:8.

WHEN THE SHADOWS FLEE AWAY.

(Song of Sol. 2:17.)

When the shadows in our pathway,
Seem to darken as the night,
And the joy of living, passes
Far beyond our earthly sight;
Let it be a sure reminder,
That the night precedes the day,
When behold "the morning cometh",
"And the shadows flee away".

When our loved ones all are absent,
And no more their voice we hear,
When the days and nights grow darker,
And our hopes give way to fear;
Let it be a sure reminder,
That the night precedes the day,
When behold "the morning cometh",
"And the shadows flee away".

When our trials and disappointments,
Seem much more than we can bear,
When our hopes are rudely shattered,
And real faithful friends are rare;
Let it be a sure reminder,
That the night precedes the day,
When behold "the morning cometh",
"And the shadows flee away".

It is joy to then remember
That our Lord and Great High Priest,
Is preparing in the Glory
Many mansions and a feast;
But alone to those who know Him,
Will the night be turned to day,
When the blessed "morning cometh"
"And the shadows flee away".

—J. T. Bougher.

RIDE ON!

(H. H. Milman. 1827.)

Ride on! Ride on in majesty!
Hark! all the tribes hosanna cry;
O Saviour meek, pursue Thy road,
With palms and scattered garments strowed.

WHAT DO THE LAITY WANT?

By Kenneth Mackenzie

A CLERICAL friend had accepted a call to a parish in a university town. Indeed, his church was to be in the heart of the university settlement. The exhilaration of moving, the experiences of locating in a new place so absorbed his thought and interest that not until Saturday night when the responsibilities of the coming day broke upon his mind, did he realize the situation. He would have in his congregation men of science, literature and philosophy. A sickening dread overcame him. Why had he not thought of this in his acquiescence to the invitation? Would that some cautious advisor had hinted to him that he might have escaped this embarrassment.

As his heart beat fast and his nerve threatened to desert him, a ring at the door brought into his presence a kindly man, who with benign countenance and winsome voice, said: "My dear young brother, I have called to welcome you to our midst. Having a suspicion that you might feel you must meet your congregation tomorrow on the plane of the university thought, I wish to assure that we professors do not expect you to discuss our problems in the pulpit. We have enough of that in the week. Give us the simple, sweet Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, as our fathers knew and loved it and we shall be well suited." My friend in reciting this to me, declared that he had never felt the weight of the ministry as at that moment; never before realized true perspective of the Christian calling.

In the recent conference under the auspices of the Student Volunteer Movement, the platform confessed to a distinct cleavage between it and the audience to which it ministered. The hearers were not prompt to accept the changed gospel which the platform would purvey. Not only did the platform experience disappointment, but a modified disgust at the evident stupidity of the listeners who were loth to follow the confidently asserted program. The difference may be capable of discussion; but to us who observed the incident, it is as though the old adage holds still, "One man may lead a horse to water; but twenty cannot make him drink". However, the platform has this consolation, that by insistent reiteration, the resistance may break down and the conquest be won through sheer exhaustion.

But the challenging aspect of the exigency suggested by these two incidents, demands a thoughtful consideration. Are the preachers and leaders of our day to compel the laity to think as they wish them to, or is the commission of the ministers of Christ still efficacious, "Take thou authority to preach the Word of God"? In the fascinating novelty of the new psychology, the alluring attraction of changing age conditions, are the foundations to be destroyed and the venerable and deeply cherished faith as held by the Church during all the centuries be thrown into the discard? The layman asks, "What has happened to make this malformation of the true Gospel into another? No angel from heaven has brought a contradiction of the received truth. The earth has not witnessed to it, for every excavation in the East confirms the Scriptural history. Has the science of astronomy, unfolding the vastness of the universe qualified it with prerogative of denying the faith? Has the character of sin changed? Is the nature of man different from that of the preceding ages? Can any measure of scientific advance invalidate the love of God for a penitent sinner, the cherishing of God for those who are in His Son? "The layman hears the long-drawn discussion of evolution and wonders why it was needful that instead of his being made in the image of God, he should find himself kin to an ape, when if there is a God at all, there must have been a so much better way for His bringing the race into being.

Then, the layman is confused and confounded by the shifting positions of the so-called scientists. What was confidently asserted yesterday becomes unworthy of acceptance today. The foremost evolutionist in America one year pronounces that the ape-origin of man is an incontrovertible fact; the next year his words are: "The ape-human theory of the origin of man is greatly weakened by recent evidence. I regard it as totally false and misleading. It should be banished from our speculations and our literature, not on sentimental grounds, but on scientific grounds; and we should now set our faces resolutely towards the discovery of our actual pro-human ancestors." So there we are today. What of tomorrow? Ridiculous is the acknowledged fact that the famous one million dollar tooth, which had been held as an evidence of the truth of evolution, is really that of a wild pig. How many expeditions have gone forth, financially equipped and splendidly manned, which have not yet made a report of success in the obtainment of the "missing link"? Science, let us be appraised, is "classified knowledge". But the vaporings which are puffing up our modern teachers with the pride of intellect are not classified knowledge; but as high and dry in the air as ever, utterly hypothetical and tortuous.

If the speculations which are so valiantly labelled as "assured results" could be of any spiritual value to mankind, the problem would be more nearly capable of solution. But the layman is asking, "What can all this do to build me up in my most holy faith? I must believe something; simply guessing about the mighty facts of life and eternity cannot help me. I am made to believe; the faculty of faith lies dormant in my being. Where shall I turn"? It would seem as though the cry of the day comes back all the way from the age of Job, "O that I knew where I might find him" (Job 23:3). Pity is it that He may be found, is nigh at hand, in the pure Gospel of our Lord Jesus, uncontaminated by the touch of human idiosyncrasies. And yet He is hidden in the fog of sophistries, His voice of gentle stillness drowned in the noises of the wheels of philosophical speculation.

Instinctively, we have ground for hope that in due time the Holy Spirit of God will win back to "the old paths" those who have been allured through novelty to depart from them. Meanwhile, in kindliness and faith, we who have never been tempted to deviate from them may patiently pray and wait. We know full well that the Gospel is not dependent upon science. For the truth "as the truth is in Jesus" (Eph. 4:21) is the testimony of God (1 Cor. 2:1). It has been given and cannot be improved or modified (Gal. 1:6-12; Jude 3). The simpleminded, not the boastfully scholarly are the recipients of it (Matt. 11:25; 1 Cor. 1:18-29). It centers in the Cross, radiates through the resurrection and its correlated sequences as a beam of crystal light, embracing redemption from sin, power by the divinely sent Spirit of God for true living and provides an inextinguishable hope for all eternity.

The laity, drawing these precious and enduring facts from their mothers' bosoms, still thirst for the milk of the Word that they may grow thereby. The men in the pews are common-sensed; they are business taught; they measure things in the scales of due proportion. And they resent with all their hearts, this trifling with the weighty things of eternal truth and imperishable destiny. In place of the varying guesses and almost impudent assertions of the modern teachers, the rank and file of the laity today are begging for "The Word of God which liveth and abideth forever".

During the fifteen years in which Deaconess Carter and Deaconess Clarke were at the Philadelphia Church Training and Deaconess House, there were ninety-five graduates and twenty-five special students; twenty-seven went to Alaska, fifteen to China, twelve to Japan, four to Liberia, three to the Philippines, twenty-one to different parts of the domestic mission field; seventeen went into parish work; five are working in city missions, one among Jews, and eleven in institutional or social service positions.

On the fortieth anniversary of the organization of the Church in Japan (Nippon Sei Kokwai), in February, the churches in Kyoto had a service and designated their offering as a gift to the Department of Missions in appreciation of the great help which the American Church has given in the development of the Japanese Church.

THE SURRENDERED LIFE---IN CHRIST

Conducted by the Reverend Frank Cox

THE greatest need in the Church today is a Spirit-filled ministry. No stream can rise any higher than its source, and no church can be any more active in the long run than its minister. When you see a parish that is struggling to get along, you can almost depend upon it that they have had a man in charge who has had no vision of God.

Some men enter the ministry today because they feel that it is a respected profession in which they will have a pleasant place. Some are trying to persuade men to enter the ranks on that basis. One leader of the Church recently put down a number of reasons why men should enter upon the ministry, these were among them—It is fairly well paid; they are so favored by the kindly attention of wealthy and leading parishioners that their children enter the highest social life; the pension fund will soon insure a comfortable old age. A writer commenting on these reasons says: "Would this attract a Polycarp? or a Wesley? Would it nave caused the closing up of a carpenter shop in Nazareth? We know that such a call would not. It will just increase the ranks of drones.

There are those in the ministry whose faith has been shattered. Once they knew God and walked with Him, then they began to think that they must revise their opinions to keep up with the times. The old fervor left, and they go on in the dull routine of an uninspired life, touching no one, helping no one. One young fellow who had been evangelical in faith, was telling the writer of the new views he was learning. He said that when he had grasped them fully he would be able to preach with great power. Instead he has been drifting from one place to another.

There are other men who have allowed themselves to become mere administrators of a large ecclesiastical plant. They are like business officials. They have been so engrossed with the routine of their office that they have no time for meditation and study, or personal contact and individual work. They have no prophetic vision.

Theer are still others who think that the Lord is well pleased if they can have the minutiae of the service exact. They are constantly exercised over burning questions of ritual and procedure. Their conversation dwells in the realm of vestments and incense. Religion to them conjures up a picture of postures and forms. They can go through a lifetime of such things without allowing their religion to change their lives at all. One of these men was recently showing a group of younger men how the service should be rendered. After he had finished he said: "Well, I am glad that that is over." A young man replied: "How can you expect to impress me when I see that you care nothing for it yourself?"

These men and any others who are in like condition need a real baptism of the Holy Spirit. No man is hopeless. We have these types with us in the Church today and because of them the Church is in her present desperate condition. There can be a change if they will consecrate their lives fully to God.

Nothing can be worse than the ministry when the sense of a Divine call is absent. There are those who face Sunday with dread. Preaching is a bore to them. On the other hand nothing is more blessed than a ministry that is Spirit-filled. May God grant that those whose ministries are at present lifeless, and joyless, may surrender themselves fully to Christ. The Spirit can then fill them with new and marvelous power, and their fruitfulness will be increased an hundred fold.

HISTORIC PERIODS OF FREDERICKSBURG—1608-1861.

Mrs. Vivian Minor Fleming.

Fredericksburg Founded 1727—Col. Henry Willis—Col. Byrd's Visit—Thorntons, of Fall Hill.

Fifty-six years after the grant of 1671, the City of Fredericksburg was incorporated and named for Frederick, Prince of Wales, son of George II, and its streets named for members of the royal family. In the meantime, John Buckner and Thomas Royston had died and the title of the leaselands were vested in their descendants or kinsmen, Robert Buckner and John Royston.

Settlers were coming in rapidly, but the act of the House of Burgesses, 1727, speaks for itself: "Whereas, great numbers of people have of late seated themselves and their families upon and near the Falls, and great quantities of tobacco and other commodities are every year brought down to the upper landings to be transported to other parts of the country," "So we, the inhabitants of the county of Spottsylvania have made humble application to the General Assembly that a town may be laid out in some convenient place near the falls of said river."

In the meanwhile Col. Henry Willis had moved to this section and established himself on Willis Hill, near Marye's Heights. Col. Willis deserves a paper to himself, for he was a most interesting character. His ancestors were from Oxford, England, learned gentlemen of wealth and distinction. Francis Willis was the first who came to Virginia and he held various honored positions in the colony and died in England in 1691. He left the bulk of his large landed estate in Gloucester County to his nephew, Francis Willis (having no children of his own), who was the father of our Henry Willis, of Fredericksburg, also of Col. Francis Willis, of Gloucester. Henry Willis was born in 1691 and died on September 14, 1740. He married first Anne Alexander, widow of John Smith, of Purton. The earliest date mentioning him in the records of Spottsylvania is 1716, or thereabouts. His wife's aunt married one of the Buckners, and her first husband was one of Lawrence Smith's kinsmen. So their coming may have been a family affair. Anyway, Col. Henry was very much in evidence with his five children and his second wife, the widow Brown (Mildred Howell), whom he married the year before Fredericksburg was founded. She lived six years and left three children, one of whom, Elizabeth, is the ancestress of the Cobbs, of Georgia. Col. Willis married his third wife, Mildred Washington Gregory, two months after his second wife's death, and he was her third husband.

The trustees of Fredericksburg were John Robinson, Henry Willis, Augustine Smith (a relative of Henry Willis' first wife and nephew of Major Lawrence Smith), John Taliaferro (whose ancestor, Robert Taliaferro had taken up large grants of land on our river conjointly with our Major Lawrence Smith), Henry Beverly, John Waller and Jeremiah Clowder. Do we recognize some of the "Knights of the Golden Horseshoe" in this company, and by the way, why didn't Col. Henry Willis go on that quest?

Well, we have gone far afield from the act of incorporation. It goes on to say that fifty acres belonging to John Royston and Robert Buckner were to be set apart and divided into lots, and that these two were to have a percentage off of each lot and were to be given two lots each. John Royston was to take as his two lots the land he had leased to William Livingstone, upon which had been erected home and improvements and warehouses, which were doubtless the ones referred to in Spottsylvania records as the "Royston Warehouses".

The A. P. V. A. found out in 1916 that these lots were on Water (Sophia) Street, between Commerce (Prince William) and Amelia and that was really the earliest improved part of the town and so described by Col. William Byrd on his visit in 1732 to "Col. Henry Willis' new town of Fredericksburg".

William Livingstone died in 1729, but his wife, Susannah (called elsewhere Sukey Livingstone), was there, as doctress and coffee woman. All the buildings were of wood except the prison, "which is strong enough to hold Jack Sheppard". Can't we think that the big stone building. with barred windows, near the bridge was this prison? It is conjectured to have been a tobacco warehouse, but it is much more like a jail. Sukey Livingstone, by the way, bought herself a lot or two lots, also land in the county. She had no children and left her property to Philip Rootes, who had grants of land in this locality, and also was a connection by marriage of these same Smiths.

The Thorntons, of Fall Hill, came from Francis Thornton, of Caroline, who acquired land "near the Falls of the Rappahannock" in 1720. His son, Francis, married Frances Gregory, daughter of Mildred Washington and Roger Gregory, and they lived at Fall Hill as early as 1736. They were gentlefolk, with means and education, and their descendants have been among Fredericksburg's leading people, as well as scattered abroad to "make other states great".

So in this locality were not a few families with birth, breeding, beauty and books (some of these are still extant), and they enjoyed life in spite of the rough surroundings, for they had good servants, good food and good company.

FAITH AND ORDER: Proceedings of the World Conference, Lausanne, August 3-21, 1927. Edited by H. N. Bates, Canon of Carlisle. George H. Doran Company, New York. Cloth. Pp. 534. $2.50 net.

This is the complete and official record of the World Conference on Christian Unity last year at Lausanne. In addition to an historical introduction, it gives a complete review of the entire Conference, with verbatim reports of the chief speeches and a full account of the discussions and reports of the Commission. The personnel of the Conference included some of the most distinguished leaders other than Roman Catholic of the Christian Churches throughout the world.

The Conference discussed the Call to Unity, the Gospel, the Nature of the Church, the Church's Confession of Faith, the Ministry, the Sacraments, the Unity of Christendom. The volume is of very great importance to the earnest student of the supremely important problem of how a Christendom—"divided and rent asunder"—may in time heal its "unhappy divisions" and bring about the realization of our Lord's high-priestly prayer, "That they may all be one".

THE ETHICS OF THE GOSPEL: By Frederick A. M. Spencer, B. D., M. A. Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee. (Printed in Great Britain by Unwin Brothers, Ltd., Woking.) Cloth. Pp. 252. Index. $3.00.

An exposition of Christ's moral teaching in the light of modern ethics and psychology. Our Lord's views on the use of force, on property and wealth, on marriage and the sex instinct, on the nature and development of sin, are clearly set forth. The bearings, especially the social bearings, of Christ's teaching upon the life and civilization of today are pointed out. The main systems of modern ethical philosophy are viewed and criticised in the light of the ethics of Jesus. The book ends with the suggestion that the liturgical worship of the Church should be re-modeled in the spirit of the Lord's Prayer, wherein we offer ourselves to do God's will for the coming of His Kingdom. "If we really desire the new world that the Son of God announced, we must pray to be enabled to fulfil our part in the making of it."

CHRISTIAN ETHICS: The George Dana Boardman Lectures, 1927. University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia. Cloth. Pp. 151. $1.50.

Christian Ethics, the practical application of the precepts and behavior of Jesus Christ to every-day life, is the greatest of the sciences. What avails it to know everything in space from atom to star, everything in time from protoplasm to Deity, if we do not know how to manage ourselves amid the complex, delicate, ever-varying duties of daily life? In this volume, five Christian men, although differing in matters of Creed, unite in discussing the practical ethics of true followers of Christ. The lecture on the Originality of Christian Ethics, by the Rev. Dr. George C. Foley, Professor of Systematic Divinity at the Philadelphia Divinity School, sums up that originality thus: "His reaffirmation of old ideas in new forms and with unprecedented strength; His presentation of few conceptions and alignments of duty; His simplifying of the life-struggle by reducing it to a root principle; His provision of new inspirations and injection of new powers; above all, His embodiment of Himself as the moral ideal. All these exhibit . . . His unequivocal originality."

DEVOTIONAL OFFICES FOR GENERAL USE: Compiled by John W. Suter, D. D. The Century Company, New York. Cloth. Pp. 118. $1.00.

This is the second volume of the Century Devotional Library, being published under the editorial direction of the Rev. John W. Suter, Jr., Director of Religious Education, National Council of the Church. The first volume, Family Devotions, compiled by Howard Chandler Robbins, Dean of the New York Cathedral, was of an equally high order with this. The complete library will consist of seven volumes printed and bound in uniform style. The aim of this book of Devotional Offices for General Use is to place in the hands of Christian people, clergy and laity, forms of service which can be used on many occasions in church, parish house, school, home cottage, or camp. The attempt has been made with commendable success "to clothe with the dignity of liturgical form thoughts that express the religious needs of modern life". We highly recommend it to the clergy and to other religious leaders.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

"ALLOW ME TO SUGGEST."

Mr. Editor:

Your reference to Dr. Reiland in the issue of the twenty-fourth brings to my mind two ministers who held charges in this diocese; one rejected the creed in toto, but repeated it because, as he said, the rubric compelled him; the other told his congregation that he did not believe the creed, and remarked to me that he accepted it with reservations. Both of these were from the Virginia Seminary in recent years. Was their faith destroyed there? If not there where did they imbibe the spirit of unbelief?

Allow me to suggest, in lieu of Dr. Randolph's proposition to send a delegation of laymen to the General Convention to protest against the modernistic clergy and their teaching, that the laymen in every parish refuse to call any man who is ever so slightly tainted with this modern infidelity; or if such be already in a charge to tell them the very first time they aired their modernistic opinions that unless they adhered strictly and sincerely to their ordination vow and to the faith once delivered to the saints, they must resign. It is in the parish that the layman can make his power and influence felt; it is his castle, his home which gives him the right to defend it.

St. John, in his first epistle, says: "Try the spirits whether they be of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the Spirit of God, Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God; and this is the spirit of antichrist."

In his second epistle he writes: "For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver, and an antichrist . . . whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in this doctrine (that Christ is come in the flesh) hath not God . . . If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed; for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds."

Likewise Paul, Rom. 16:17 writes: "Mark them that cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly."

L. R. Combs.

SHOULD NOT MISSIONARY DISTRICTS HAVE A VOTE?

Mr. Editor:

May I suggest consideration by the General Convention as to whether the disbarment of the deputies from Missionary Districts from voting on Amendments to the Constitution and on Prayer Book Revision should be partially removed in the light of the response of these Districts to the General Church Program quota.

Presumably the reason why the Districts were precluded from a vote was because they were considered wards of the Church owing to the fact that they were not financially self-supporting and as such could not expect to have a vote along with the dioceses.

The General Church Program has brought about a change in this condition. While the Districts still receive aid from the National Council, for which they are grateful, yet at the same time each accepts a quota and many, after considerable effort, meet it. In other words, the Districts today have a measure of financial independence and are taking their part in the whole program of the Church.

I suggest, therefore, that this changed condition might well be recognized by according the Missionary Districts a quarter vote on Constitutional Amendments and Prayer Book, such as they already possess in a vote by orders.

"AS AN ALUMNUS."

Mr. Editor:

I have been reading, with a great deal of sorrow and regret, the continued criticism of the Virginia Seminary by The Southern Churchman, and the resulting flow of letters from people evidently influenced by these criticisms to give voice to unfounded rumors and unreasonable fears about the soundness of the Seminary's teaching.

As an alumnus of the institution under criticism, and one jealous for its fair name, allow me to say that I have visited the Seminary and listened critically to lectures by the faculty which is at present under criticism. I believe that as teachers of men who are destined to go out and face alone the questionings and attacks of this age of unrest, the Seminary Faculty spare no pains to place before their students the whole trend of thought, both pro and con, regarding the particular subjects they are teaching. It would be manifestly unfair to their pupils, and to the Church the Seminary serves, to send out into the ministry men unarmed for the defense of the faith, uninformed as to the position and methods of the enemies of the "truth as it is in Jesus Christ". But the most striking characteristic of the lectures I heard during my visit to the Seminary was a definitely Christo-centric note. The students were given all that was available on both sides, but invariably brought back to the Divine Son of God, and that in no uncertain tone.

It has not been my misfortune to encounter any recent graduate or student of the Virginia Seminary, and I have seen quite a few of them, who felt that his faith had been in any way adulterated by the teachings of the Seminary faculty, or who seemed to be lacking in love for and loyalty to the Christ of the Gospels. But we should all bear in mind the fact that there must always be occasional students, who from inability to weigh arguments, or from preconceived notions of what a theological course should be, or from mental conceit, may excuse their own failures and disappointments by accusing some professor of destroying a faith which was really never their own. The student in any professional school is necessarily called upon to make certain readjustments in mental attitude when introduced into wider ranges of truth. A clergyman is charged with the duty of teaching the truths of religion, and this he cannot do with clarity, charity and conviction until he has won that faith for himself, and knows what he believes. There will always be casualties in the ranks of theological students, and there will always be those who will try to excuse their own weakness by accusing their teachers.

The seminaries of the Church are training grounds for religious leaders, and they are recreant to their duty when they fail to exercise their students in meeting every conceivable question that can be directed against the faith they are being trained to teach and to defend. No one criticises a medical faculty for exposing its students to contagious diseases while training them to combat their attacks upon the people they are to minister to after their graduation.

The Virginia Seminary, I sincerely believe, is teaching its students to think accurately and along orthodox lines. Should they be subjected to lectures from outsiders, who in the opinion of The Southern Churchman or others, are not strictly sound in the faith, and this, of course, may happen at times, there is little to fear if the students have been taught to think for themselves, and to check new opinions by the Creeds which are our ultimate standards. If they are not taught to do this one wonders what will happen to their faith when they go out into the world alone to do battle for the Christ against His enemies.

If you who fear for or doubt the orthodoxy of the Seminary faculty would only take the time to go there and with open mind and Christian charity hear the lectures of the Faculty, observe the life of the student body, and catch something of the real spirit of the place, I feel sure that your fears will be dissolved, and you will become convinced, as I am, that never in its history has the Seminary had a finer spirit of devotion to Jesus Christ, a deeper spiritual life or a greater loyalty to the teachings of the Church. A visit will do more good than a ream of critical and uninformed editorials. . . . .

"ANGLO-CATHOLICS DO NOT HESITATE."

Mr. Editor:

Some one has favored me with a copy of "The Pastoral", a weekly bulletin issued by Holyrood Church, New York, of which publication the Rev. Arthur P. S. Hyde is editor.

In this bulletin appears quite an article entitled, "The Thirty-nine Articles". This article contains what is apparently intended as an attack on my pamphlet, "Shall the Protestant Episcopal Church be Destroyed"? but I do not care anything at all about that, because Mr. Hyde was evidently afraid to attempt to deny a single statement of fact contained in the pamphlet.

The reason I am directing attention to this article is that it affords such a splendid example of the charge I have so often made in these columns, that "Anglo-Catholics" do not hesitate, when it suits their purpose, to make misleading statements concerning the doctrinal law of the Church, evidently depending upon the laity to swallow, hook, bait and sinker, what they are told, without investigating for themselves.

I take just two statements from that article as illustra- Mr. Hyde says:

> "The Articles have no binding effect upon the American Episcopal Church."

That statement is absolutely untrue, because Article X of the Constitution of the Church positively declares:

> "The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments . . . . and Articles of Religion, as now established or hereafter amended by authority of this Church SHALL BE IN USE in all of the Dioceses and Missionary Districts of this Church . . . . ."

Dr. Hyde is fully aware of this Constitutional provision, but what do Constitutions or any other legal enactment mean to the "Anglo-Catholic" when they stand in his way?

The point is, however, that, as I have repeatedly charged, "Anglo-Catholics" do not hesitate to mis-state the Constitutional or doctrinal law of the Church whenever it suits their purpose. "The end justifies the means."

Then Mr. Hyde proceeds to make an attack upon an address recently issued to the laity of the whole Church by representative laymen and laywomen in various parts of the United States, in which they express the belief that the vast majority of the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America are not in favor of the introduction into the Church of the Mass, Purgatory, etc., and then he proceeds to say:

> " 'Opposed to the introduction into the Church of the Mass!' What do these good people mean? Have we not the Mass, and have we not always had it? Does not our Prayer Book say, and do we not teach our children, that Christ hath ordained two Sacraments, as 'generally (i. e. universally) necessary to salvation, that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord'? Turn to the title of that service in the first reformed and revised Prayer Book of the Church of England and we read: 'The Supper of the Lord and the Holy Communion, commonly called the Masse.'"

This statement constitutes a gross reflection upon the intelligence of any Protestant Episcopalian who thinks for himself.

In the first place, the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America has a Constitution. This Church legislates for itself. This Church, does not use the "First reformed and revised Prayer Book of the Church of England". This Church, by Constitutional enactment, as just stated, expressly makes the Articles of Religion part of its doctrinal law, and Article XXXI expressly declares that "The Sacrifice of Masses" are "blasphemous fables and dangers deceits". Mr. Hyde could not have been ordained in the Church without swearing "to conform to the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America". If he took this oath with mental reservations, was he honest with the Church and its people?

This Church has established its own Book of Common Prayer, in which, as Mr. Hyde and all of his associates in the "Anglo-Catholic" movement very well know, the Church makes no reference to the Mass, except to brand it as a "blasphemous fable and dangerous deceit".

When we find "Anglo-Catholic" bishops, clergy or laity making assertions such as those contained in the article in question, which fly squarely in the face of the fundamental law of the Church, I leave it to your readers to determine whether they are guilty of deliberate and willful misrepresentation.

As an illustration of what is actually transpiring in the Church, I now have on my desk a letter from a very reliable and responsible layman, residing in one of our largest cities, and who renders to the Church valuable service with his talents as a musician. Speaking of a certain parish, he says:

> "They have now for several years had the High Mass with Communions. Morning Prayer is never used in the Church any more, unless it is said possibly in some out of the way side chapel, with perhaps no one at all present, or at most one or two who happen to know about it and demand to hear it; but even then it would be without any real spirit of devotion, and in a sing-song manner, without any music, the whole thing lasting not more than eight to ten minutes, and in the end amounting to nothing more than a burlesque. I have been instructed, rather I should say commanded, to use the most simple and most unattractive music and hymns that I could find in one parish where the people insisted upon having the Morning Prayer on two Sundays of the month, then, in contrast, to have the most fascinating and lovely music at the Mass. The ladies of the Altar Guild were not allowed to place any flowers on the Altar on the Morning Prayer Sundays. 'They insist on having a Protestant service in a Catholic Church, so I will see to it that they get just what they ask for, and I will fill their belly full of it until they get so sick of it that they will beg for the Lord's own service, so it will be as plain and crude as I can possibly make it. The end justifies the means.' Those were the exact words of that priest."

This is a fair sample of what is going on in the Protestant Episcopal Church in this broad land of ours, not in one section alone, but in many. It is the same pitiful story told in letters coming to me from widely separated points.

As stated by Bishop Harris, of Michigan, in his able address to his convention, "The time has come for us to make our choice. We may attend our Church to find the Prayer Book displaced and strange Masses uttered by strangely attired Clergy. We may awake to find the Church of our Fathers gone, our Church buildings housing those who loathe the Reformation and revile the very name of the Church which is their spiritual mother, men who have forgotten our fathers and the Constitution they brought forth."

May Almighty God help Protestant Episcopalians to awaken to the danger threatening their spiritual home and ACT!

C. L. Marsilliot.

FROM AN ANGLO-CATHOLIC.

Mr. Editor:

Mr. C. L. Marsilliot, of Memphis, Tenn., has favored me with a carbon copy of a letter he has written to you, in reply to an editorial which recently appeared in "The Pastoral", the weekly paper of Holyrood Parish, New York, entitled "The Thirty-nine Articles".

I do not know whether his letter has yet appeared in print, but I am writing at once for the purpose of making two comments, only.

It is commonly acknowledged that a partial quotation is unfair, and more often than not, misleading. Referring to the petition being circulated among the laity of the Church, and the deleted paragraph which, so far as the New York daily papers were concerned, was given equal publicity, Mr. Marsilliot quoted as follows from my editorial:

> "'Opposed to the introduction into the Church of the Mass!' What do these good people mean? Have we not the Mass, and have we not always had it? Does not our Prayer Book say, and do we not teach our children, that Christ hath ordained two Sacraments as 'generally,—i. e. universally—necessary to salvation, that is to say, Baptism and the SUPPER OF THE LORD?' Turn to the title of that service in the first reformed and revised Prayer Book of the Church of England and we read: 'The Supper of the Lorde and the Holy Communion, Commonly called the Masse.'"

Had he continued the quotation to the end of my paragraph, as follows, the point I emphasized in my editorial would have been perfectly clear, and is perhaps more germane to the subject matter than his further comments:

> "Whether celebrated with a soap box for an Altar and a tin cup for a chalice amidst the mud of the trenches in France, or in the most magnificent cathedral with all the accompaniments of majestic music, gorgeous vestments and stately ceremonial, the service is the same, the 'holy mystery, the pledge of His love'. His own Presence beneath the veils of the Bread and Wine, are as much a part of the one as of the other. After all, there is much truth in the saying that 'A rose by any other name would smell as sweet'."

The only further comment I desire to make is this: It seems quite unfortunate that the anti-Roman complex of some controversialists causes them to substitute prejudice for a sympathetic inquiry into interpretations differing from —howbeit quite as legitimate as—their own.

As Mr. Marsilliot's letter of criticism and his original paper are both directed against the Anglo-Catholic position, I believe that the concluding words of my editorial will fitly close this rejoinder: "The strongest bulwark against the Church of Rome is the Anglo-Catholic movement within our own communion and fellowship, for as we are truly Catholic in the highest and purest sense, why should any of our people look elsewhere for Catholic privileges?"

Arthur P. S. Hyde.

STRANGE CONFERENCES.

Henry Sloan Coffin permits Atheist to lecture to his class and Russell Bowie permits sale of infidel leaflets in Grace Church, New York, at 25 cents each. "Ye cannot serve two masters."

Mr. Editor:

I was glad to see your own outspoken words against the wisdom of inviting Dr. H. S. Coffin to speak at the Virginia Seminary. Dr. Coffin is Dean of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, an institution founded by the old fathers in the Church who believed in the FULLY INSPIRED Bible and gave their money for its support. Its teaching has been completely changed and now some of the rankest free thinkers and liberals are invited to speak to the students, among them Conybeare of England, and Professor Lake of Harvard Theological School, a veritable hot-bed of unbelief. A very fine young man in this city told me he took a course of one or two years in this Harvard School and would have become an infidel if he had remained there. He said if the laity generally knew what was taught in that place, there would surely be an upheaval against it. Dr. Coffin is quoted by Ernest Gordon, son of Rev. A. J. Gordon of blessed memory, as saying that: "The denial of the Virgin Birth is an absurdly unimportant heresy." Dr. Slaten, pastor of the West Side Unitarian Church, was invited to speak to the students of Union some time ago and a young man who was present told me he began by saying: "I tell you frankly that I do not believe in God, but the idea it represents is still valuable in Society." We do not have prayers in our church, but sentences of aspiration. This same Dr. Slaten invites atheists to speak in his pulpit. It is likely true that the Faculty did not invite this man to speak to the students, but that he was invited by the student body, but I believe the Faculty usually has the right to veto and Dr. Coffin must have known the views of Dr. Slaten, since they are located in a few blocks of each other and the latter's views are aired in the papers quite frequently.

Union Seminary seems to be a veritable Cave of Adullam, where many theological malcontents are gathered to disseminate their views without fear of harm or loss of salary. I have heard that Union has had a number of men almost as bad as these mentioned, and I am told that a number of students from there marched in procession with the Reds and other like minded people in this city some time ago. I have heard of no protest from the Faculty against such action.

I attended a meeting some time ago of The Fellowship of Faiths in Grace Church, the Rev. W. Russell Bowie, rector. As I listened to what was said, I wondered what the old fathers would say if they could have listened in. Young people were going up and down the aisle selling tracts or booklets on Buddhism and other cults, telling us that it would explain to every one very clearly this teaching—and only cost a quarter!

(This text may have come to my mind: "My house shall be called a House of Prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves," who are robbing God of the honor that is justly due Him only.)

I listened to three speakers. The one for Buddhism boldly said that "Men would be able to rise by its teaching till they could say: 'I and my Father are one.'" Next came the Champion of Christianity. I was hopeful that he might act like a Christian Goliath and put the enemy to flight. Not so. He began by saying: "I did not get my ideas from the Bible or history," all of which I did most steadfastly believe, after hearing him! I lowered the curtain at this point and hurried to another service where men and women were testifying to the power of the Holy Ghost in their lives and the praise of God in Jesus Christ was running strong. This service was also in an old historical parish of the Diocese of New York. Sitting in Grace Church, I recalled the words of St. John in the twentieth chapter and verse thirteen: "They have taken away my Lord and I know not where they have laid Him." In the other meeting I thought of the twentieth verse of same chapter: "He shewed them his hands and his side. Then were the disciples glad when they saw the Lord." I hope you will "lay on Mac Duff," etc. I hear many warm commendations of The Southern Churchman since it arose from the dead!

COINCIDES EXACTLY.

Mr. Editor:

I have just read your editorial on "Bible Leaders versus The Propaganda Sheet", in the issue of The Southern Churchman of March 24, which you were kind enough to send me. I think you for letting me see your utterances on this subject.

Your statement that you do not wear the collor of any clique of Modernists, Fundamentalists or Romanists, coincides exactly with my convictions. I feel that it is absolutely essential to accept the Bible as the rule and guide of our faith, and to enthrone Jesus Christ as the King of Kings and Lord of Lords. In other words, I am no Fundamentalist or Modernist, but, in the language of one of our bishops, "I profess to be a Christian".

I also agree in your statement concerning Dr. Reiland and his obligations under the oaths he took when he was ordained to the diaconate and to the priesthood. A man has a right to his own views, but he has no right to hold the orders of a great Church and preach doctrines contrary to the teachings thereof. Common honesty demands the surrender of ones credentials when one cannot be loyal to the Creed of the Church in which one ministers.

With best wishes, I am,

Your friend,

STANDARD OF PROTESTANTISM.

Mr. Editor:

The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States owes you an everlasting debt of gratitude for holding high the standard of Protestantism. The last issue of The Southern Churchman and, in fact, every article of the same, headed by your editorial appeals strongly to me. Each number of the paper is better than its preceding number. Another good feature is, our Church (through your paper( is at least taking seriously the fact of the second coming of our Lord.

Long may you live to guide our Church.

Sincerely yours for the cause,

"Reader."

Examining Chaplains and Their Work.

By the Rev. W. L. De Vries, Ph. D.

The polity of our Church in the United States providing for much local and diocesan freedom along with the maintenance of the unity of our Church as a whole in this country, every now and then involves issues which turn up in unexpected quarters, for instance, in examining men for the ministry. Here great divergencies in the methods of interpreting and applying our general Canons in the various dioceses sometimes result in the acceptance of a man in one diocese who would be rejected in another and vice versa.

The Commission on the Ministry, which operates in connection with the General Department of Religious Education, has endeavored to solve this problem in a new pamphlet, which sets forth a series of rules intended to aid boards of examining chaplains all over the land to work along harmonious lines, while retaining the capacity for adjustment to local conditions guaranteed by the Canon Law of our Church in America.

These rules may be had from the General Department of Religious Education, Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, gratis.

Among their chief features are provisions for the due organization of diocesan boards, their making comprehensive report to the Annual Diocesan Convention and the use of carefully considered system in all their operations. This should put an end to casual and hasty examinations such as have been too often the case in the past, and also gives the clergy and laity, as well as the bishop, opportunity to discuss the methods and activities of examining chaplains in accepting or rejecting men for holy orders. These rules, which, be it remembered, are authorized under the regulations of the present Canons, emphasize corporate rather than individual action on the part of examining chaplains in reaching decisions, whether men coming before them at the various stages, from candidate to priest, are apt and meet for ministry. This safeguards both the Church and the individual and reduces the risk of the rejection or acceptance of men for partisan, personal or individual reasons.

These new rules possess a new and valuable feature in that they require that the board obtains from men who are being prepared in theological seminaries the judgment of the faculty as to their proficiency and take this into account in rendering decisions. One of the defects of our system hitherto has been the failure to link up a man's record in his seminary studies with the decisions of boards of examining chaplains. It is hoped that this provision will remedy this condition.

Yet another fresh provision, or perhaps it had better be called recommendation, is that examinations be held some time in advance of ordinations, at least a month if possible. Too often men are called upon to go direct from the emotional experience of examinations to the most sacred service of the laying on of hands, without opportunity for devotional preparation. And sometimes when men are not passed for ordination at the last moment, even though it be for good reasons, yet the lateness of the decision involves painful embarrassment and serious hardships.

It must be borne in mind that the rules recommended in this pamphlet by the Commission on the Ministry are not intended so much as laws to bind as a program to guide, and also that they are not of authority in any diocese until adopted by its board of examining chaplains and approved by its bishop. Thus local freedom is not invaded, and yet it is hoped that this program, drawn up by men of experience and based on the usages of many dioceses, will come into general use throughout the country.

Churches Asked to Suggest Next Steps Toward Unity.

All the ninety-five nation-wide churches which sent representatives to the World Conference on Faith and Order held last August in Lausanne, Switzerland, have been asked to express their opinions as to the next step in carrying forward the Christian Unity Movement. This request is made in a letter mailed by the International Continuation Committee appointed at Lausanne to the executive officers of each church. The letter transmitted officially the full reports received by the Lausanne Conference from the committees, or sections, appointed to draft recommendations concerning Christian Unity, the Gospel, the Nature of the Church, the Creed, the Ministry, the Sacraments and kindred subjects.

The letter is signed in behalf of the Continuation Committee by Bishop Charles H. Brent, of Buffalo, chairman; Dr. Alfred E. Garvie, of London, vice-chairman, and Ralph W. Brown, of Boston, general secretary. The communication was mailed to the principal Protestant and Eastern Orthodox bodies in thirty-seven countries, in every quarter of the globe.

Since the governing bodies of many of these churches met only at long intervals, considerable time will elapse before a consensus of these opinions can be obtained. Meanwhile, the educational work of the movement is being carried on by local meetings in every country represented in the Conference and by world-wide dissemination of literature. The Business Committee meets frequently in New York City.

The letter to the churches says in part:

"It will be remembered that the Lausanne Conference did not attempt to define the conditions for an organic union of the Churches; its object was to register the apparent level of fundamental agreements within the Conference and the grave points of disagreement remaining; also to suggest certain lines of thought which may in the future tend to a fuller measure of agreement.

"It is the hope of the committee that the work inaugurated at Lausanne may be carried forward from the point which it has now reached, and that the Churches will discern, from the material now transmitted, the deep significance of the Lausanne Conference, the serious will to unity which found expression there, and the necessity of thorough and fraternal discussion in continuance of the labors thus begun.

"The committee would therefore ask, not only for the examination of the substance of the Lausanne reports, but also for a considered judgment upon the steps which should now be taken in furtherance of the work of the Conference, and if possible for an assurance that the Churches are prepared to continue their cooperation. It is suggested that where such action has not already been taken, each Church should appoint a commission to cooperate with other similar commissions in advising the Continuation Committee as to the next steps to be taken."

The Churches addressed are asked to send in their suggestions by July 1, if possible, and also the names and addresses of their Committees on Church Cooperation or Union. In concluding the letter, Bishop Brent and his associates say:

"The Lausanne Conference has been a real venture of faith. That faith was sustained by the manifest tokens of the divine presence in our worship, our deliberations and our whole fellowship. In the same faith, and with humble prayer for continued guidance, help and inspiration, we submit the present results of our work to the Churches upon whose cooperation the future of the movement toward Christian unity depends."

Sewanee Summer Training School.

The Sewanee Summer Training School will hold its session this year August 2-30 inclusive. The order of the two divisions will be reversed from the arrangement of former years; the Adult Division will have its session first, August 2-16, and the Young People's Division will follow, August 16-30.

Dr. Mercer P. Logan, who has been the head of the school for the past eighteen years, will be president again this year. The Director of the Adult Division will be Rt. Rev. E. A. Penick, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of North Carolina. The Director of the School of the Prophets will be Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop of South Carolina, and the Director of the Young People's Division will be Rt. Rev. Frank A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop of Florida.

Among the many speakers will be Bishop Darst, of East Carolina; Bishop Gailor, of Tennessee, and Bishop Campbell, of Liberia.

Special afternoon conferences will be held during the Adult Division on all phases of Church Work—especially the Woman's Auxiliary.

Several special courses are being added this year for counsellors. It is hoped that those who are working with young people or are planning to do so will take advantage of these courses at Sewanee. There will be limited space for counsellors, so it will be necessary to register early.

Sewanee will be the gathering place of Church workers for nearly six weeks consecutively this summer.

The Sewanee Conference on Religious Education will be held July 27-31 and will be attended by the diocesan chairmen and other leaders. The Provincial Departments of Religious Education, Social Service and Missions will meet July 31-August 1 and the Provincial Council will meet August 1-2. The above will precede the opening of the Sewanee Summer Training School on August 2. After the close of the school on August 30 the National Federation of Episcopal Young People will meet August 31-September 3.

The Executive Secretary of the Sewanee Summer Training School is Miss Emma Twiggs, 2015 Sixth Avenue, North, Birmingham, Ala. Requests for programs, blanks for enrollment, etc., should be addressed to her.

People Want Family Record Bibles.

So many requests have been received by the American Bible Society from flood sufferers in the Mississippi Valley for Bibles containing Family Record pages, in order that the entries may again be made while the old and damaged records are still in mind, that the Society has issued some thousands of Bibles with Family Record, specially inserted. Owing to the destitute circumstances of many of the families, the distribution of these will have to be without financial return.

Visiting Lucerne.

For the benefit of our Church people who contemplate traveling abroad this summer and visiting Lucerne, Switzerland, it is announced that Church services begin there in Christ Church, the Rev. G. H. Kaltenbach, rector, on Trinity Sunday, and continue until the second Sunday in September.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett. D. D., Bishop.

Miss Mabel R. Mansfield, Missionary-in-Charge at Grace House on the Mountain, in the Associate Missions Field, is visiting her family at Tuxedo, N. Y. While there she is making several addresses on the general subject of her work in Southwestern Virginia. She expects to return to her work in Wise County about April 17, coming by way of Berea College, Kentucky, where she will visit a number of young people who are students there from her own community.

VIRGINIA.

The Virginia Summer School of Religious Education.

The Virginia Summer School of Religious Education will be held again this year in Sweet Briar College, Sweet Briar, Va., June 18 to 29. This school is one of the largest of our Church, and has for a number of years been held each year by the three Dioceses in the State of Virginia. It has been a great power in the development of the educational work, especially in the Virginia Dioceses. The faculty has always been the best that could be procured, and chosen because of wide experience and learning; the curriculum has been of a practical nature in order to meet the practical needs of the Church. The major subjects taught have been those that deal with the Church (Sunday) School, provision being made for each of the units of the National Accredited Teachers' Association; but at the same time courses are given in Social Service, Woman's Auxiliary, Young People's Organizations, Missionary Instruction to Children, etc.

At the present writing the program is practically complete and is as follows: The Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D., will teach "Introduction to the Whole Bible" and "Church Teaching in the Creeds and Catechism". The Rev. R. E. Gribbin will teach "Principles of Social Service" and "The Program of the National Council". The Rev. Edwin R. Carter, D. D., will teach "The Study of the Pupil" and "The Religious Life of the Family". The Rev. J. C. Wagner, "Principles of Teaching" and "Comparative Study of Religions, Past and Present". Mrs. John Loman, "The Curriculum of the Church School" and "Methods and Materials for the Junior High Department". Miss Bessie Sims, "Methods and Materials for the Primary Department". Mrs. Walter Ruan, "Methods and Materials for the Junior Department" and "The Church School Service Program". Miss Ruth Butler, "Organizations for Young People". Mrs. W. W. Wishart, "Study of the Missionary Text Book" and "The Woman's Auxiliary in Action". The chaplain, "Introduction to the Prayer Book". In addition to these regular courses there will be daily conferences for the Young People and for the Woman's Auxiliary, and mass meetings each evening with missionary speakers, stereopticon lectures, etc.

Sweet Briar College is one of the most beautiful educational institutions in the South. It is quiet and just adapted to a summer conference, and have all the facilities for recreation, such as lake for swimming, tennis courts, gymnasium, etc. This school has always been one in which the old and young mingle for mutual benefit and understanding. Now is the time

Collect for First Sunday After Easter.

Almighty Father, Who hast given Thine only Son to die for our sins, and to rise again for our justification; Grant us so to put away the leaven of malice and wickedness that we may always serve Thee in pureness of living and truth; through the merits of the same, Thy Son, Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Easter Evening.

All Easter mornings hold the light
Of lilies and clear pealing bells.
But I have loved its evening hour
Recalling one sweet tale it tells.

"Behold two of them went that day
To Emmaus—and as they walked
In strange bewilderment, they talked
Of One
And of the things that had been done."

And then—He came—
A stranger to their holden eyes:
"How is it that thou doth commune
In this sad wonder-wise?"
He questioned—and one made reply:
'Thou art a stranger, then," he saith,
"Else thou didst know concerning One—Jesus of Nazareth—"

. . . . . .

And after long slow miles were past,
Came evening—and the setting sun
Shone on a hamlet's small low roofs,
And that strange April day was done.

"Abide with us," thus they besought
The One who walked with them
From far away Jerusalem.
And lo, He came,
And when they saw Him break the bread.
They knew His name!

. . . . . .

O our dear Master, and our Lord,
How often have we walked with Thee?
How often have our tired eyes
Been holden—and we could not see?

But now, this Easter evening, Lord,
We know Thee—looking in Thy face,
O let our low roof shelter Thee,
Above our humble loaf—say grace.

"Who Abolished Death."

Jesus Christ abolished death in the only way in which a stubborn fact can be abolished—by showing that it is not what it appears to be. Death appears to be the seal of failure, it is the condition of success; it appears to be an end, it is also a beginning; it appears to be a humiliation and a curse, but its cleansing waters purge the soul of her travel-stains, and land her refreshed upon the farther shore.

Death, says the Book of Genesis, is a punishment. Death, says science, is a law of nature. Death, says Jesus Christ, is nothing save the gate of everlasting life. Death is a punishment, if we will have it so. If we turn into ends what are meant to be instruments; if we give a false and spurious substance to shadows whose nature is to come and go, and to desires which, so idealized and intensified, can never be satisfied, then death, which dissolves these cloud-palaces, will be a punishment—a punishment for mistaking shadow for substance, and attempting to slake the divine thirst of the soul in the waters of a mirage.

Death is a law of nature, certainly. Many have resigned themselves to it in the spirit of Marcus Aurelius. "Depart then satisfied, since he who releases thee is satisfied." If there is nothing more than this to be said, the brave man can bear what he must.

And yet, if we will have it so, death is the gate of life. Why did St. Paul look forward to finish his course with joy, instead of only to "depart satisfied"? What made him sure that to die is gain? His belief in the resurrection, no doubt. But this belief rested not only on what he saw in the clouds on the road to Damascus, not only on the reports of the Twelve and the survivors of the Five Hundred Brethren, but on the overpowering conviction that death has no sting to those who know the hidden laws of life. The passage from death unto life is no unique portent; it is the open secret of the universe, which Christ brought to light. In the world without, it is exemplified in the harvest field, when the grain dies as a seed and comes to life again as a blade. In the world within. St. Paul knew what it was to die and be buried with Christ, and to rise again to newness of life.

There is only one way in which the values of life can escape the doom of the existences to which they are attached; and that is by constant transmutation into values of a higher quality. Cling to them as they are, and they fade and perish; let them go, make a living sacrifice of them, and they will still be yours transmuted and enhanced. That which we receive in return for what we have given up is never the same as what we surrendered. In St. Paul's words, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain. The new life is always life on another plane. And if we make a living sacrifice of ourselves in reasonable service to God, the new man whom we shall put on in return for the old man whom we have put off, is not just our old selves back again, but a new creation, nearer to the image of God.

This mysterious law of the spiritual world, the law of death and rebirth as the condition of growth and permanence, has been dimly perceived by nearly all religions. If there be a "key to all mythologies", it is here. And after the Christian revelation, it remains the chief foundation of our faith in human immortality. Without undervaluing the argument from divine justice, or the confident claim of love, which as the supreme attribute of the Deity must have the quality of everlastingness, so that neither death nor life nor any other creature can separate us from love, whether human or divine, or extinguish our capacities of loving and being loved, I still think that the strongest argument for immortality is the unquenchable conviction that in the mind of God spiritual values are indestructible facts. Whatever has value in God's sight is safe for evermore; time and change cannot touch it. And so far as we can make our own those things which are precious in His sight, we have the assurance that for us too death has no importance—that in the words of a high-minded Oxford thinker, "Death does not count". It does not count, in this sense, that we need not trouble ourselves about the length of the span allotted to us. There are many of whom it may be said, "They in a short time fulfilled a long time, for their souls were dear to God". —Dean Inge, in Church of England Newspaper.

Prayer.

Prayer comes nearer to being at the heart of our religion than does anything else.

When we read the Bible we may be interested only in its historical information, or in its literary value or in its theology. When we pray we are talking to God. We must assume that there is a God to whom we may talk. We act on that assumption and we bring ourselves solemnly into His presence, we are dependent upon no one else, we are leaning on no one else. We are not dealing with other peoples' theories nor with their actions. In Prayer we come directly into the Presence of our Creator.

We may pray anywhere. Of course the building hallowed by the prayers of a congregation is a place set apart for prayer. But we may pray elsewhere. The street, the avenue, the shop, the home, the woods, the seashores are all places available for prayer. The nearness of others or their absence does not affect the prayer.

The opportunities for prayer are not limited. We may pray when we kneel, when we sit, when we walk, when we ride, when we swim, and presumably when we fly.

Our moods for prayer are many. Of course when we are solemn, when we are overawed. And yet when we are full of joy, we may pray also. Like a child we may romp into the Father's Presence and tell Him our good news. When we mourn, we come to Him for comfort, when we sin, we come to Him for strength and for forgiveness, when we play, we come to Him for joy, when we laugh we come to Him who made our frame and knows what is good for us.

Day time and night time alike are times for prayer. The dim religious light has no more to do with religion than has the brightness, of the noonday sun. In fact, one man was converted in the sunlight, for prayer is always at hand, the acceptable time is the ever-present now.

Prayer is available to all. The learned man and the ignorant man may pray. The busy man will find prayer a help and the idle man will find prayer a stimulant.

The man who trusts God, the man who wants to serve God, the man who wants to be godly, will seek to talk with God and to hear what God has to say to him.

The old man and the young man, the men, the women, and especially the little children, are able to pray.

What a preparation for the Hereafter is the life of prayer. What a bringing in of infinite resources into the limitations of earthly life is the habit of prayer. What a shield and protector along the ways of a strange earthly life is the result of prayer.

Prayer takes one into the realm of the abiding and enables a man to live as one who has a definite purpose that is for eternity and not just for today.

We Episcopalians are known as people with a Prayer Book. Surely we ought to be the leaders of the world in the art of prayer. We ought to be known as a Praying People. Let prayer be the center of our life for all time.—Berkley Churchman.

A Little Ghost Walked in Her Garden.

Helen Bayley Davis.

The hand of spring
Tossed into her garden a host
Of fragrant things—and the little shining ghost
Of last year's April crept
Among the singing branches that had slept
Through winter's night.

It hung the white
And pink-lipped buds upon the bough
Of a dogwood tree; wisteria blossomed—I wonder how!
It shook the twisted fern
And breathed into the lemon-tinted urn
Of an orchid-flower.

At midnight hour,
Beside a pool it paused to rest,
Stooping to touch the water's lily-covered breast—
And then . . at the stirring of day . .
The little April phantom crept away . . .
I heard it sing!

Christ the Lord is Risen.

"Christ the Lord is risen." To us is the promise and to all that are afar off.

The words sound of life here and now. They satisfy in some new fashion our thirst for knowledge of how to live, not our curiosity about death. Old things are passed away; all things are become new. But we ourselves are not new creatures. The old uncertainties still cling to us. We have followed too much the devices and desires of our own hearts. We have left undone those things which we ought to have done; and we have done those things which we ought not to have done; and there is no health in us.

It is not enough to endeavor to imitate Jesus. We have tried to walk in His steps, but men do not see Jesus Himself. They see us.

We need to be born again. Yet how can a man be born when he is old? The winds of heaven breathe upon the waking earth; we hear the voices, but we have never seen the home of the winds. Even so the spirit of the living God is born within the heart of a person. The Son of Man is lifted up before the eyes of a waiting world, and we see the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. We know the power of the resurrection, and it is no longer we that live, but Christ lives in us.—Selected.

The Warning.

C. B. Bush.

"Come," called the householder,
The man who built upon the rock,
"Come to my house; take refuge;
Welcome all."
But they refused to leave their pleasant home
Upon the sand:
Their pleasure garden full of bright-hued flowers.
"Come," called the householder;
The clouds are gathering fast,
Wait—not the thunder's shock;
The storm comes on apace."

They heeded not His Voice,
Nor heard the tempest's roar.
But, laughing, turned away and closed their door.

Remember Thy Creator.
(From Eccles. 12.)

Gene Scott Wright.

Remember thy Creator now in happy hours of youth,
Ere yet the evil days shall come to fill thy soul with ruth—
While still the glorious sun may shine to bless thee with his light,
And moon and stars have not for thee been quenched in endless night.
Ere yet the silver cord be loosed, broken the golden bowl;
Shattered the wheel—the pitcher, too—and none to make them whole.
For dust to dust shall soon return—the spirit, to its God:
Pause—ere He call thee to account, and use His chastening rod.

Orange Blossom Honey.

Helen Louise Benson.

I know all children enjoy sweets of all kinds and I'm sure that honey is counted as a general favorite with all young people. I want to tell you a little about the honey that the bees make here in Florida.

My home is in an orange grove. The trees have been in full bloom for the past month and the fragrance in the air is delightful. Right near us there is a vacant lot filled with bee hives. What a feast those busy little workers have been having during the month of orange blossoms! Buzz! buzz! zoom! zoom! the fragrant air is filled with the sound of the bees hovering in swarms over the orange blossoms gathering the honey. The odor of the flowers is so very sweet that you can imagine how delicious honey made with the help of the orange blossoms must taste. It is delicious, too, for the owner of the bees gave us a jar of the honey the other day and it has a different taste from ordinary honey that you buy in the stores. It has a sparkling light amber color so clear that print can be read without trouble through a jar of it.

Our friend, the bee-keeper, has seventeen hives placed at regular intervals around the lot, all square shaped box hives slightly raised from the bottom boards. The bees light on the bottom board from which they enter the hive.

Orange trees fragrant with bloom surround this apiary, the name of the home of the honey-bees. With such sweetness all around, the bees do not have to fly very far to get nectar from the flowers in great abundance. It has been proved that bees find their honey from the perfume of the flowers. Where there is no perfume a bee pays no attention to the honey in a flower. Certainly the delightful fragrance of orange blossoms must be a wonderful help to the bees.

The bee-keeper has a great love for his bees and tells me he has no trouble handling them. Whenever he finds they are a little "angry" as he calls it (by that he means they seem rather restless and excited), he burns a little charcoal to make a smoke near the hive and that quiets the bees so that he can handle them without any trouble. Many bee-keepers wear veils when they work with the bees, but our friend never covers his face. I think the bees must know he is fond of them and, of course, are gentle when he handles them.

The other day he showed us the queen bee, the largest bee in the hive. There is only one queen in a hive and she lays all the eggs, usually about fifteen hundred to two thousand a day.

Then there are the workers and they do just what their name indicates—work, work, work, all day long. When you see bees flying around over your flower beds and around your fruit trees, you can be sure those are the worker bees. They feed the young bees, clean and guard the hive and go out in search of honey. They never rest a minute. These are the bees that people mean when they say to you children.

"My! my! you're as busy as a little bee."

And then come the drones. They are the lazy bees, for that is what the word, "drone" means. They do not assist in the work of the hives and oftentimes the workers drive them out of the bee-hive. We saw some of the workers carrying a drone out of the hive the other day. They carry them out of the hive by their wing and fly away with them about a hundred feet or more and drop them. Usually the lazy drone does not come back to the hive, but if he does, the worker bees carry him off again. You almost never hear of a drone being killed by the worker bees, which shows the busy bees are kind as well as busy. So you can be pleased when people call you a "busy bee". Don't ever let them call you a "lazy drone" though.

I was watching the bees the other day and I noticed several bees with a big spot of yellow on their backs.

"Oh! there is a new kind of bee!" I exclaimed, "look at their big yellow spots."

"That is pollen on their backs and they are the same old bees," explained the bee-keeper.

I must tell you about this for it is wonderful. The bees have little baskets attached to their legs and they collect the yellow dust from the flower stamens and put it in these little baskets, which are attached to their legs. This pollen is carried to the hive and the bees make it into a food called "bee bread" which is fed to the young bees. Isn't that a wonderful thing for little bees to do?

The bee-keeper told me the other day that he had been having a little trouble with his bees. Some of the boys in the neighborhood had been seen near the bee-hives and he noticed several objects lying near the hives as though they had been thrown there, also he found the bees rather excited and hard to manage. And another thing, too, he told me, was that the dragon-flies, or mosquito-hawks as they are called in the South, had been bothering his bees considerably. These insects are enemies of the bees for they swoop down on their lacy wings and catch the bees as they fly into the hive.

"Now, he said, "I've thought of a plan. Some of those boys are experts with whips. I was wondering if they couldn't catch those mosquito-hawks with their whips. They are crack-shots at it. Here comes one of the boys now. I'll ask him."

No sooner said than done. The boy eagerly ran home for his whip and was back in a very few minutes. By this time the mosquito-hawks were circling around the hives watching for the bees to arrive with their honey.

The boy stood within a few feet of the hives and then, crack! crack! crack! that whip flashed through the air and down came one destroyer of the bees. Crack! crack! again another mosquito-hawk was caught with that flashing whip. It was quite exciting.

"All the other boys can catch mosquito-hawks with whips just as good as I can and they'll come over and help, if you want us to," said the boy eagerly.

"I'd be very grateful for your help," said the bee-keeper, "and when I gather the honey, you shall all have a share, for its your help that is going to save the honey this season. Unless I get rid of these mosquito-hawks, there will be no honey to gather."

Every day after that until the mosquito-hawks disappeared the boys faithfully came with their whips and helped the bee-keeper. And from that time on the boys grew to love the bees and understand what wonderful little creatures they are and the bee-keeper never again found that his bees had been disturbed during his absence, on the contrary, he found that he had gained a little band of helpers to guard and protect his bees and how the boys enjoyed the delicious orange-blossom honey when it was gathered. The bee-keeper found at the end of the season that it was the best harvest of honey he had ever collected.

Her Easter Vision.

John T. Theodore.

PART I.

On the southern slope of one of the foothills of Sunset Range stands a group of small, attractive cottages, surrounded by fields and gardens. As one approaches them on a summer evening there may be heard the happy voices of young girls playing circle games on the velvety grass or "hide and seek" among the shrubbery.

But the gently sloping hill has not always echoed to the merry laughter and the singing of happy children. Only a few short years ago it was merely a prosperous-looking farm where Mr. Albertson, a professor at the State College, came with his wife and daughter, Theodora, to spend happy vacation days. "We live on the farm," they were accustomed to say, "and spend the winters in the city." Then came the plague known as influenza, beginning in a small section of the old world that had never been cleaned up, and its deadly germs spread rapidly over the earth, claiming more victims than did the great World War. When Mrs. Albertson came again to the farm she and Theodora were alone. The young widow's charm and tact and her many kindnesses endeared her to all the people of the communityl, while Theodora's winsome smile and dancing blue eyes radiated joy and happiness wherever she went. The children of the rural school looked eagerly for her coming and crowded one another for a place beside her. The simple-hearted country folk called her "Sunbeam" for her presence brought light and gladness into lives that were usually dull and toil-hardened.

Then one day at school Sunbeam suddenly left her playmates in the middle of the game and started slowly homeward. The next day she did not come, and the teacher said that the child was very ill. On their way home the children with solemn faces lingered long before the Albertson farm house. A famous physician came from the city but his skill was of no avail, and one day as the sun sank below the western hills the pure flame of Sunbeam's spirit went back to God from whom it came.

Weeks and months passed by and the bereaved, lonely mother languished and knew no consolation. Words of comfort from loving friends failed to lift the cloud of sorrow that had settled upon her soul. To good Dr. Heath, her pastor, at last came an idea and he hastened to make the suggestion to her. "Why not take a trip to the Holy Land?" he urged. "The ocean voyage, the change of scenes, a visit to the places made sacred because of their association with the life of our Lord will surely bring a measure of peace to your troubled heart." So a few weeks later Mrs. Albertson stood waving farewell from the deck of an ocean steamer which was headed toward the ancient, mystical East.

As the days passed by the calm of the sea seemed to soothe and the ocean breezes to bring healing to the lonely mother. New surroundings and kindly traveling companions diverted her mind; her sorrow mellowed and a halo was cast around her cross. The party landed in Beirut, Syria, and their first visit was to the American orphanages. At the sight of thousands of children working and playing her heart began to bleed afresh; and as they traveled through Sidon, Nazareth and Jerusalem and met the thousands of boys and girls, once abandoned, helpless orphans now well and strong and clean, because there were those in America who cared, she repeated over and over again in endless refrain: "O God, why do these children live and I am bereft of my only one?" Had she remembered that these children are but the remnants of a nation, that they have witnessed scenes of massacres, and have suffered untold miseries, she might have rejoiced in the great philanthropic work of her own land. Had she remembered that men and women from her country had brought safety and health to these children and had poured into their famished hearts all the love and happiness that some of them had ever known, she might have found some consolation in her sorrow; but she saw only "children" and she sadly missed her own child. She turned away and bitterness flooded her soul.

After a few days of continuous travel and sight-seeing the already weary tourists reached Bethlehem where they gathered in the Church of the Nativity for a simple service to commemorate the advent of Jesus. "Unto us a child is born . . . " Mrs. Albertson's thoughts flew away to her own child and quietly she began to weep. The voice of the reader grew fainter and fainter. Soon she seemed to hear the happy laughter of the orphans which mingled with the strangely droning voice of the preacher. Then earthly sound and sights vanished and a wonderful panorama opened before her. There were trees and shrubs such as she had never seen before. The blue waters of a lake shimmered in the distance and there were mountains and valleys mantled with glorious radiance. Soft music floated out on the air.

"Where am I? What is this place?" she asked in wonderment.

"This is the Garden of God," replied a voice. "It is where the spirits of the blessed dwell after they leave their earthly habitation."

"Have I left my earthly habitation?"

"No, you have not; but you are granted the privilege of visiting this garden for a short time. Go wherever you desire."

A thought flashed through her mind and she almost shouted:

"Oh! tell me! Do the spirits of children come here, too?"

"Yes, they do."

"Where are they? Can I see my child, my own little daughter? Tell me where I can find her," she pleaded with outstretched arms.

"Yes, she is here. Follow this lane between the jasmine trees until you come to a fountain; then turn to the left and you will see her with other children."

With joy in her heart and buoyancy in her steps she hastened down the lane. There were numberless children on the velvety green fields, some making garlands of the flowers they had gathered, others engaged in innocent frolic and merriment. There was laughter in each voice and radiance in each face.

"I never imagined that my child had come to such a happy and beautiful place," she murmured and hurried on. Passing by the fountain she turned to the left, and at a little distance beyond saw a sight that well nigh froze her blood. The whole vast field before her was barren and parched. No grass, no flowers, no beautiful trees in this desolated place, but there were children and more children, not in a happy and mirthful mood but solemn and sad. They moved about listlessly. Their voices were low and lifeless.

"O God," she moaned, "surely my little girl is not among these."

But Sunbeam was there.

"My child, my child!" the mother cried; "why are you sorrowful? Why are you not with the other children yonder?"

Sunbeam turned two big, sad eyes to her and said:

"I cannot go there to play with them, Mother, because you put me here."

"I?" the mother gasped.

"Yes. Come, I will show you. See these cups!" The child pointed to rows and rows of cups that stood upon marble stands; "each one of us has one. When mothers and fathers spend their days and nights weeping these cups fill to overflowing and the tears wither everything they touch. When fathers and mothers complain and harbor bitter thoughts their words and moods rise up here in black vapors and blight the trees and flowers and all the beautiful things. That is the reason this spot is a desert. There, that cup is mine. It is running over! Now dip the flower in your hand into it. See! Its petals shrivel up. Can I be happy while you weep and sorrow without finding any comfort? A girl over in the green fields told me that she finds in her cup trust and patience and loving deeds done in memory of her. Everything around her blossoms as the rose and she and her companions are not sad-faced like us, but happy and joyous. Mother dear, won't you love me in that way?"

"O God, forgive me; I have allowed my grief to make me a selfish woman," sobbed Mrs. Albertson. She stretched out her arms to embrace her child. Then her eyes opened wide in astonishment. Instead of Sunbeam's blue eyes two big brown eyes were timidly staring at her.

A VERY PERSONAL LETTER TO MEMBERS AND FRIENDS OF THE ASSOCIATION

Summit, N. J., January 15, 1928.

The most important matter, beyond all question, to be considered at the General Convention in the City of Washington next October, is the report of the Joint Commission on "the whole problem of divorce," affecting as it does, not only the continued existence of the family as a divine institution, but also the very existence of the State and civilization itself.

In view of this fact, and the lack of intelligent knowledge among both clergy and laity, the Executive Committee of the Association has ordered the publication of five articles to be mailed consecutively to all the parish clergy and the lay deputies of the Convention.

Four of these articles have already appeared in The Living Church, the titles of which will be found on the last page of the enclosed Bulletin. A fifth article on "The Marriage Canon in the Light of the Betrothal of the Virgin Mother," is yet to appear. It is because newspaper publication reaches only a small portion of the membership of the Church, and because such articles are not always preserved for reference, or even read there, that the Association has taken steps to place the papers as Bulletins in the hands of as many of the clergy and laity as they are enabled to reach. Only in this way can intelligent action be taken on the subject at Washington, instead of the trifling, irrelevant, and almost contemptuous way in which the House of Deputies at New Orleans treated the respectful Petition of the Association, with its "Seven Reasons," not one of which has ever been challenged, either in the House or in any of our Church papers.

Each 6,000 of these Bulletins will cost $275 for printing and mailing, a total of $1,375. Of this sum $422 has already been received from fifty subscribers. The question now for each person receiving this statement, or a copy of a Bulletin, is, "Do you care enough, not only for the honor of your Church, but for the very existence of your country as a civilized nation, to contribute one dollar or twenty dollars to this vital cause?"

The writer asks you to bear with him in a very personal statement concerning his own part in this work. He has just completed, by the mercy of God, eight years of almost daily labor and anxious thought, in correspondence (public and private), writing, typing, and publishing, not only gratuitously, but at the cost of serious illness and gifts of money, all of which, measured by any commercial standard, would be represented by many thousands of dollars.

In view of the appalling consequences of allowing this American Church, set here by God's providence for the upholding of the full Christian faith and the Christian standard of morals among our multitudes in this great land, to separate herself in this matter, contrary to the clear teaching of our Lord, her Prayer Book, and her Constitution, as she has done since 1868 from all the rest of the Anglican Communion, no intelligent Churchman who fails to study the question and to aid can be counted blameless.

For sixty years the Church has been sanctioning by her canon what she denies by her Prayer Book. By that false "proviso" or "exception" she keeps proclaiming continually that there is always one sure way for remedying rash or unfortunate marriages, and this the very easiest of all ways, as every Judge knows, namely, by the commission of a single act of adultery, or even only the production of circumstantial evidence of its assumed commission!

The extent to which the Association or its Secretary, as your servant, can carry on this work must depend on the character of your individual response. The total sum asked is a mere minimum. Much more can be done if more is given.

Very sincerely yours,

WALKER GWYNNE,
Secretary-Treasurer.

THE LATIN AMERICA EVANGELIZATION CAMPAIGN

Incorporated 1921

OBJECT

This is an independent, interdenominational work on faith lines, which has been founded under the guidance of God, to reach the unevangelized millions of Latin America by a forward movement of aggressive evangelism, carried out in co-operation with the missionaries of all denominations working on the field.

DOCTRINAL BASIS

The Directors and Executive Council of the Latin America Evangelization Campaign adhere to the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures, as originally given; the Virgin Birth and Deity of Christ; His bodily Resurrection; the doctrine of Salvation through the Blood of Christ, whose vicarious sacrifice is the only remedy for man's lost condition; the doctrine of the eternal salvation of the regenerate and the eternal condemnation of the unregenerate; the scriptural doctrine of a life of victory over sin through the power of the indwelling Holy Spirit of God, and the imminency of the pre-millennial coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

ADMIRAL JAMES HARRISON OLIVER.

REAR ADMIRAL JAMES HARRISON OLIVER, retired, first Governor of the Virgin Islands and member of the Naval Board of Strategy during the World War, died at Shirley, his historic estate on the James River.

He served the U. S. Navy forty-four years and served God always and in every walk of life was found faithful, hence he has won the crown of life.

Rear Admiral Oliver was formally nominated Governor of the islands previously known as the Danish West Indies by President Wilson on March 28, 1917.

For the remainder of his career he was on duty in the Navy Department at Washington, his retirement taking place in January, 1921. He was born seventy-one years ago in Houston County, Ga., was graduated from Washington and Lee University in 1872 and from the United States Naval Academy five years later.

A series of steady promotions brought him to the rank of Captain in 1910, and three months before the declaration of war with Germany he was made a Rear Admiral. His career included nine cruises, averaging more than two and a half years each.

In 1893 he married Marion Carter, of Shirley, Va., where he made his home.

Admiral Oliver was one of God's noblemen and of him it can be truly said "High erected thought seated in a heart of courtesy".

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

His was a beautiful, joyous life, pure and clean, and as a member of Christ's Church, a child of God and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven. We know that he has heard his Saviour's welcome saying, "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

He is survived by his parents, McDonald Wellford and Frances Myers Wellford, a brother, McDonald Wellford, his sister, Frances Wellford, and his grandparents, Major E. T. D. Myers and Mrs. Myers and Mr. B. Randolph Wellford and Mrs. Wellford.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

for parishes to be making plans to send at least one representative from each parish organization, and as many of the teachers of the Church (Sunday) School as possible. Let the parish pay the expenses and they will find it money well spent, as even one person can bring back to the parish an enlarged vision, greater enthusiasm and a knowledge of better methods for carrying forward the work of the Church. The expense will be a matriculation fee of $3 for each pupil outside the State of Virginia, no fee for those in the State; board $22 for the entire period; and reduced rates on all railroads within the State.

St. Alban's Parish.

At a recent meeting of the vestry of St. Alban's Parish, it was decided that the new parish building soon to be erected should be called the "Satterlee Memorial Parish Hall". The location of the Cathedral within the confines of St. Alban's Parish, the close association of Dean Bratenahl, former rector of St. Alban's Church, with Bishop Satterlee, as well as that of the present rector, the Rev. Charles T. Warner, and Bishop Satterlee's keen interest in the future of St. Alban's Parish, were reasons which brought the members of the vestry to this conclusion.

Contractors have been authorized to begin work and it is hoped that this much-needed addition to the work of the parish may soon begin to take definite shape.

Woman's Auxiliary.

The annual evening meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was announced for April 7, in the Parish House of the Church of the Epiphany. The right branch of the Woman's Auxiliary of Epiphany Church acted as hostess.

At the meeting it was proposed to introduce to the Episcopal women of Washington a new form of church work, that for and with foreign-born Americans. The speaker was Dr. Thomas Burgess, Secretary of the Foreign-Born American divisions of the Department of Missions of the Episcopal Church, with headquarters at the Church Missions House in New York. To carry on this work in Washington Mrs. William D. Hurd, Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary, has appointed a committee, of which Mrs. T. J. Howerton, of All Souls' Church, is chairman. The work will be carried on largely through those parish churches which have foreign-born members in their congregations.

Mrs. Hurd plans to assemble in Epiphany Parish House at 7 P. M. the various heads of committees who are working for the success of the Triennial Convention of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Episcopal Church in America, which will be held in Washington in October next at the same time as the General Convention of the Church. The Woman's Auxiliary will meet in the rooms of the Mayflower Hotel, holding its mass meetings in the Washington Auditorium. About twenty committees of women have been at work for several months. Each chairman made a brief report of the work accomplished. About 2,000 women will attend the Convention besides a considerable number of women missionaries at work in the foreign field.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Coadjutor

Bishop Murray was in his Diocese over Easter and brought fittingly to a close a Lent and Holy Week which had been widely and deeply observed. The noon-day services at Old St. Paul's featured the downtown observance of the season. Each day the great church was crowded to the doors with worshippers listening eagerly to messages from some of the leading clergy of the country. Throughout the Diocese there was constant week-day worship and the usual exchange of pulpits, while many Maryland clergy filled special preaching appointments in other dioceses. Holy Week was a climax to this period of special devotion. Practically every church held daily services; many sacred cantatas were rendered, and the three hour service on Good Friday was very generally observed.

On Easter Sunday morning, following the practice of many years, Bishop Murray celebrated at the early service at the Pro-Cathedral. At 11 he confirmed at St. Mark's-on-the-Hill, Pikesville, a notable day in the history of this parish, the beautiful new stone church being in use for the first time. In the evening he confirmed a class at the Pro-Cathedral and again at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, on Monday evening. Meanwhile Bishop Helfenstein also held a confirmation service at the Church of the Resurrection on Easter Day.

A notable meeting to discuss the "Cause and Cure of War" was held in Baltimore at the Southern Hotel on March 30. The plan was made possible by the Maryland Cooperative Committee on which many Church and College and Women's Clubs were represented. From the Episcopal Church, the Woman's Auxiliary and the Church Service League cooperated. Through their efforts there was a large representation of church people, despite the opposition of certain ultra-conservative elements which labeled the gathering "pacifistic".

The discussion lasted a full day, with luncheon served at noon, at which time Dr. James T. Shotwell, the Director of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, spoke on the "Heart of the Peace Problem". Dr. Shotwell treated the problem very sanely and constructively, discussing among other things whether force is, after all, an effective means of getting what we want. He showed that war is no longer an instrument that can be carefully regulated and restrained, but is a contagion; no longer a method of settling disputes between two nations, but an industry which may involve the whole world.

In the afternoon there was a round-table discussion on Latin America, led by Professors from Johns Hopkins, Goucher and the Catholic University. Mr. Drew Pearson, the Foreign Affairs Editor for the "United States Daily", caused considerable stir by averring that the bankers were not responsible for the present intervention in Nicaragua, but that it was in line with the foreign policy of the present administration in protecting the Panama Canal.

An echo of the intense feeling aroused by the Sacco-Vanzetti case was heard in Baltimore when the Rev. C. W. Whitmore accepted a position as Executive Secretary of the Roosevelt Park Recreation Centre. The Rev. Mr. Whitmore resigned from his parish at Leonardtown, St. Mary's County, Diocese of Washington, as a result of his outspoken opinions regarding the trial and will now do extra parochial work in Baltimore, not under the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Maryland.

J. A. M.

At St. Paul's, Baltimore, more than 32,600 persons were recorded at the week-day services during Lent, 1928.

The Easter communicants numbered over 1,100, and in the parish this spring seventy persons have been confirmed. The rector, Dr. Arthur B. Kinsolving, conducted the three hours' meditation upon the Passion and the large church was completely filled throughout this period. The offerings around Easter amounted to about $2,500, which was divided between the Endowment Fund of the Church and General Missions.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

Now that Lent is past, one hears from various parts of the diocese estimates of a profitable result of its observance. Especially in the cooperative efforts of uniting parishes, congregations have been good, preachers effective, results positive.

Bishop Stires was the preacher at the three-hour service on Good Friday at the Church of the Messiah, Brooklyn; the Rev. J. I. B. Larned, of the National Council, preacher of the three-hour service at St. George's, Flushing; and the Rev. Fr. Hawkins, O. H. C., at St. George's, Brooklyn.

Successful Mission in Flushing.

A children's mission recently held in St. George's, Flushing, by the Very Rev. Francis S. White, Dean of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio, is reported to have been remarkably successful. From the interesting account given in "St. George's Sword and Shield", the parish paper, one gathers that Dean White made a deep impression on adults as well as children, and really set forward the religious life of the parish.

Through Prayer.

An unusual leaflet was distributed on Easter Sunday to the parishioners of Calvary Episcopal Church by its rector, the Rev. Samuel M. Shoemaker, Jr.

Next to the church is going up Calvary House, which is to serve when it is completed the working needs of the parish. Here the rector and his assistants will live. There is to be a floor for men workers and one for women workers, and the usual assembly and work rooms. Calvary is not a rich parish, for it is not in a residential neighborhood, and for years the much-needed parish house was not undertaken because humanly it seemed impossible to raise sufficient money to build it. Last summer, as the result of constant prayer on the part of the rector, the staff, members of the vestry, and friends of the parish, plans were drawn up for Calvary House and later the contract let. Mr. Shoemaker believed that the house was needed for God's work, and that if this was so the money would be provided. On the basis of faith the building was commenced. The vestry decided to have no drive for funds, and to spend no money in employing publicity people to raise funds. In the Christmas offering $79,518 was given. The rector has made no further appeal, for he believes that a building that was started by prayer can be finished by prayer. The leaflet that was given to his parishioners reads as follows:

"Calvary House, which is now in process of construction next to the Church, is to be a House of Fellowship. A busy company of happy people will be there to welcome all who come in. The primary work of this church is changing the lives of people who need Jesus Christ, and an increasing number in search of vital religious experience are coming to us for help.

From Calvary House groups of men and women will go out to carry His message to other centers. This building was begun through prayer. Let it be finished through prayer. Will you join with us in daily prayer that the money needed to finish it without debt, may be given by willing people before the end of the year?"

ORDINATIONS.

On Palm Sunday, in St. James' First African Church, Baltimore, the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, Bishop of Maryland, admitted the Rev. Edmund B. Trotman, Cumberland, Md., to the Priesthood. The Rev. Dr George F. Bragg, rector of the parish, delivered the sermon, presented the candidate, and assisted the Bishop in the service of Holy Communion.

Dear Friend:

"Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever." (Ps. 23:6.)

You will rejoice to hear that the students and helpers continue to grow in grace and that reports from former students show increasing fruitage from their lives. Two former students now in a foreign field report the conversion of two hundred and ninety-six men, women and children last year.

It is probably as great a privilege to help train surrendered lives for service as it is to support them on the field. To become intimate with Jesus Christ our Lord and to learn how to bring others under His controlling influence, is of supreme importance.

We are thankful that our average expenses for an enrolment of nearly two hundred in the day and evening classes, on our very economical basis of operation, are only about fifty dollars per day.

THINGS FOR WHICH TO PRAISE

That many have been added to our Institute Family, composed of those who sustain the work by prayer and gifts.

That we are enabled to confidently enter into His victory and to experience the joy of His working with us.

THINGS FOR WHICH TO PRAY

That our Institute Family may have increased power in prayer.

That young men and women in large numbers may be moved to submit surrendered lives to be trained for His service.

That if it is the Lord's will, increased facilities may be provided for the three large evening classes which have been crowded out of our building.

That a fund may be provided to assist needy students.

Please advise us if you are praying with us in order that we may know who is having fellowship with us.

Yours in His grace,

JOHN B. COLE,

Christ and Romanism

"It is the paradox of the ages. Christ wore a crown of thorns—His vicar wears a golden crown of political power. Our meek Redeemer knelt to wash the feet of His disciples, while His chief earthly representative extends his foot to be kissed. Our divine Saviour was unjustly accused of proclaiming Himself king of the Jews, and His vicegerents for ten centuries maintained an army to keep them secure in their Italian kingdom. The Son of man had not whereon to lay His head; but His chief minister dwells in a palace, surrounded by Oriental splendor. The Redeemer of the world, with bleeding feet, bore the heavy cross up Calvary; but His pope, arrayed in the splendor of Solomon, is borne upon the shoulders of his servants." . . . "In truth, Christ seems to have had no thought of creating dignities in His church. . . . His only gems were the crimson drops of blood, which He shed out of love to mankind."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Never be afraid of giving up your best and God will give you His better.

The time to enter eternity is now, and the place to enter it is here.

"The Lord is risen indeed!
He is here for your love; for your need;
Not in the grave, nor the sky,
But here, where men live and where men die."

Do not call secular any calling in which you can work together with God. —Selected.

When we need the ladder, we shall have the ladder. When we require the army, we shall get it. We shall have grace to live by, while we are called to live. We shall have grace to die by, when we are called to die.—G. H. Morrison.

"Comrades, close up the ranks!
No dirge be ours! Psalms of victory sing!
Rejoicing at twilight, let us give thanks
For being soldiers of a conquering King."

"Not the mere paradise below;
The heaven of heavens is opened now.
And we its bliss regain;
Guarded so long by fire and sword
The gate stands wide, the way restored,
The veil is rent in twain!

I lift my eyes to see
The Hand that leadeth me,
And lo! it is the Hand which long ago
Was wounded for me, and I know,
Although I tread a strange, uneven way,
It cannot lead astray.

—Selected.

It is only by intercession that that power can be brought down from heaven, which will enable the Church to conquer the world. Let us stir up the slumbering gift that is lying unused.—Murray.

God's supreme strength cooperates with His children in their weakness. After they have done their best they leave only imperfect work behind, but having done their best the Master Himself enters unseen and beautifies and glorifies what has been done, until in His sight and ours it becomes a thing of beauty.—Dr. H. T. Kerr.

A mature Christian experience involves much more than mere intellectual apprehension of the truth of the gospel. It involves a personal revelation of God to the soul as real, though different in character, as that which came to the prophets and saints of old. Beloved, let us make sure that we too have had our apocalypse, our vision! —A. B. Simpson.

Do today's duty, fight today's temptation; and do not weaken and distract yourself by looking forward to things which you cannot see, and could not understand if you saw them.—Charles Kingsley.

ALTARS

April 25, 1821, almost exactly a hundred and seven years ago, a clergyman of the English Church who had visited the United States wrote to a friend at Derby of "The Episcopal Church in America". The letter was published in Church papers of the time and may be found in some old collections. Incidentally, it said there were eleven dioceses in this country, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont and Rhode Island constituting one, the others New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Ohio. Most of the bishops were rectors of parishes, their horse hire and other travel expenses paid by parishes they visited, but depending for their livings chiefly on their salaries as rectors. One, combining the duties of bishop and rector, subsisted on an income of $600. The state of the Church had been very low, partly because of prejudice against it as an offspring of the Church of England, but new life and strength had been given and the growth had become as rapid as that of any other denomination.

The special point to which attention is asked here is an allusion to the Church in Virginia. Explaining that each rector decided who in his parish should be admitted to the Holy Communion, the writer said:

"In Virginia no man who lives without family worship can be a communicant."

This was a hundred and twenty-one years ago.

The People of Virginia perhaps clung more closely than any others of the early immigrants to the finest and highest of the traditions and customs of the finest of the British peoples, transmitted them to descendants and communicated them to neighbors, kin and connections. One of the best and sweetest of the customs thus inherited was that of regular family worship, brought down from the time when each great house had its private chaplain. Yet it was not confined to the great families. Warren, in "Ten Thousand a Year"—which is the Book of Job brought to modern conditions, with interludes of intense drama and of humor, sometimes subtle, sometimes broad—gives what probably is the most vivid and intimate pictures of the life and manners of the cream of the British country gentry to be found either in history or fiction. Telling of Yatton, the home of the family around whom the story is woven, he says: "Mrs. Aubrey (venerable mother of his hero), having read prayers before the assembled servants, as usual, nearly an hour before—a duty her son always performed when at the Hall—"

Robert Burns tells of the same duty at the distant extremity of the island and the opposite end of the social scale in "The Cotter's Saturday Night"—

> "Then, kneeling down to Heaven's Eternal King,
> The saint, the father and the husband prays;
> Hope springs, exultant, on triumphant wing
> That thus they all shall meet in future days;
> There ever bask in uncreated rays,
> No more to sigh or shed the bitter tear
> Together hymning the Creator's praise"—

Humble, proud, honest, pious people, gathered from their week of toil as farm laborers and servants, the father reverently opening the Bible that was his father's most loved possession, holding the same faith, praying to the same God as the high-born flower of England hundreds of miles away.

Burns personally did not pretend to piety, but he was a practical philosopher and close observer. He moralized on his Saturday night picture:

"From scenes like this old Scotia's grandeur springs."

Families of the kind he described, he continued, made the small nation strong at home, revered abroad; and from them would rise a ring of fire, if needed, to hold the land safe against invasion or oppression.

Some yet living remember when in every plantation home in Virginia the family and the house servants were gathered morning and evening as the head of the household read from the Scriptures and offered prayer. Thousands of city families continued the inherited habit. General Jackson used to conduct family prayer for his hard-fighting, fast-marching, brigade—

> "Silence! Ground arms! Kneel; all caps off!
> Old Stonewall's going to pray;
> Strangle the fool who dares to scoff".

And better the foe had ne'er been born, the verses continue, who gets in Stonewall's way.

How many families now retain the sweet, gracious, lovely old custom? A census of the subject would be interesting, probably depressing. It might cause for responsible heads of families some deep searching of hearts. Modern conditions make adherence to the tradition difficult sometimes; but can not contrivance and management we use to overcome obstacles to our pleasures and desires remove all such difficulties? Or does it happen that younger members of families are influenced too much by those who from intrinsic ill-breeding, or carelessness, or breathless anxiety to be entirely up-to-date deride all the old ways with vulgar sneers or cheap badinage and so discourage and overpersuade the elders? Or is it that the elders yield weakly and cravenly to the temptation to seek ease and dodge responsibility by committing the care and training of their children to teachers and professors of whose characters and principles they know nothing?

From the household altars have gone, generation after generation, strong men and noble women who have given our national character and government all that is good and high in them. The impulse and habit of worship and faith, of devotion to duty, clear perception between right and wrong and rigid allegiance to right, can be taught nowhere else as in the privacy and intimacy of home, in no other way so surely and so thoroughly as at the family altar. The memories, affections and aspirations acquired and the words learned there live through life to sweeten and glorify death, come it soon or late. With the tendency of increasing wealth and luxury and ease to coarsen manners, to vulgarize social life, to intrude common smartness and foppery into our religion, is it not especially incumbent on all wishing to give to the world devout, well-behaved, useful and creditable men and women to get back to the finer principles and better customs of our fathers and stand to them staunchly?

Alfred B. Williams.

Through error in our office the translator of the Celestial Country, Dr. John Mason Neale, Warden of Sackville College, Sussex, England, was signed to our first page verse (April 14) of the Celestial Country, instead of Bernard De Morlas, Monk of Cluni, who lived about 1150 A. D., at Morlaix in Bretagne. This Bernard De Morlas, author of the Celestial Country, should not be confounded with Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux and Saint in the Romish Calendar. The "Celestial Country" is, in our opinion, among the most lovely as the "Dies Irae" is among the most sublime of all poems.

I.

NOW, first of all, what are the Thirty-nine Articles? This is a question which many will be ready to ask, and one to which it is absolutely necessary to return an answer. It is a melancholy fact, explain it as we may, that for the last two hundred years the Articles have fallen into great and undeserved neglect. Thousands and myriads of Churchmen, I am fully persuaded, have never read them, never even looked at them, and of course know nothing whatever of their contents. I make no apology therefore for beginning with that which every Churchman ought to know. I will briefly state what the Thirty-nine Articles are.

The Thirty-nine Articles are a brief and condensed statement, under thirty-nine heads or propositions, of what the Church of England regards as the chief doctrines which her chief members ought to hold and believe. They were, most of them, gathered by our Reformers out of Holy Scripture. They were carefully packed up and summarized in the most accurate and precise language, of which every word was delicately weighed, and had a special meaning. Some of the Articles are positive, and declare directly what the Church of England regards as Bible truth and worthy of belief. Some of them are negative, and declare what the Church of England considers erroneous and unworthy of credence. Some few of them are simple statements of the Church's judgment on points which were somewhat controverted, even among Protestants, three hundred years ago, and on which Churchmen might need an expression of opinion. Such is the document commonly called the Thirty-nine Articles; and all who wish to read it will find it at the end of every properly printed Prayer Book. At all events, any Prayer Book which does not contain the Articles is a most imperfect, mutilated, and barely honest copy of the Liturgy.

When and by whom were these Articles first drawn up? They were first composed by our Reformers in the days of that admirable young King, Edward the Sixth. Who had the chief hand in the work, history does not reveal; but there is every reason to believe that Cranmer and Ridley, our two most learned martyrs, had more to do with it than any When first sent forth, they were forty-two in number. Afterwards, when Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, they were reduced by Archbishop Parker and his helpers, of whom Bishop Jewell was probably the chief, to their present number, with a few unimportant alterations. They were finally confirmed and ratified by Crown, Convocation, and Parliament, in the year 1571, and from 1571 down to this day not a single word in them has been altered.

The object for which the Articles were drawn up is clearly stated in the title of them, which any one will find in a proper Prayer Book. They are called "Articles agreed upon by the Archbishops and Bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy, in the Convocation holden at London in the year 1562, for avoiding diversities of opinion, and for the establishment of consent touching true religion". About the real, plain, honest meaning of this title, I think there ought to be no doubt. It proves that the Thirty-nine Articles are intended to be "the Church of England's Confession of Faith". Every well-organized Church throughout Christendom has its Confession of Faith; that is, it has a carefully composed statement of the main things in religion which it considers its members ought to believe. Every reading man knows this. The Augsburg Confession, the Creed of Pope Pius IV., the Decrees of the Council of Trent, the Westminster Confession, are documents with which every student of ecclesiastical history is familiar. Common sense shows the necessity and convenience of such Confessions. In a fallen world like this, the terms of membership in any ecclesiastical corporation must be written down in black and white, or else the whole body is liable to fall into disorder and confusion. Every member of a Church ought to be able to render a reason for his membership, and to say what are the great principles of his Church. To do this his Church supplies him with a short creed, manual, or Confession, to which at any time he may refer inquirers. This was the object of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. They were intended to be "the Churchman's Confession of his Faith".

The substance of the Thirty-nine Articles is a point on which I shall say but little at present, because I propose to dwell on it by and by. Let it suffice to say that they contain most admirable, terse, clear statements of Scriptural truth, according to the judgment of our Reformers, on almost every point in the Christian religion. The titles speak for themselves:

A Table of the Articles.

1. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity.
2. Of Christ the Son of God.
3. Of His going down into Hell.
4. Of His Resurrection.
5. Of the Holy Ghost.
6. Of the Sufficiency of the Scripture.
7. Of the Old Testament.
8. Of the Three Creeds.
9. Of Original or Birth-sin.
10. Of Free-will.
11. Of Justification.
12. Of Good Works.
13. Of Works before Justification.
14. Of Works of Supererogation.
15. Of Christ alone without Sin.
16. Of Sin after Baptism.
17. Of Predestination and Election.
18. Of Obtaining Salvation by Christ.
19. Of the Church.
20. Of the Authority of the Church.
21. Of the Authority of General Councils.
22. Of Purgatory.
23. Of Ministering in the Congregation.
24. Of Speaking in the Congregation.
25. Of the Sacraments.
26. Of the Unworthiness of Ministers.
27. Of Baptism.
28. Of the Lord's Supper.
29. Of the Wicked which eat not the Body of Christ.
30. Of both kinds.
31. Of Christ's One Oblation.
32. Of the Marriage of Priests.

33. Of Excommunicate Persons.
34. Of the Traditions of the Church.
35. Of Homilies.
36. Of Consecrating Ministers.
37. Of Civil Magistrates.
38. Of Christian Men's Goods.
39. Of a Christian Man's Oath.

Some of these points are handled in a more firm, strong, and decided manner than others, and the curiously different one of the Articles, according to their subject-matter, is a matter on which I shall have more to say by and by. But taking them for all in all, as a Church's statement of things to be believed, I think that no Church on earth has a better "Confession of Faith" than the Church of England. I have no wish to find fault with other Churches. God forbid! We have faults and defects enough to keep us humble within the Anglican Communion. But after carefully examining other Confessions of Faith, I find none which seem comparable to our own. Some Confessions are too long. Some go into particulars too much. Some define what had better be left undefined, and shut up sharply what had better be left a little open. For a combination of fulness, boldness, clearness, brevity, moderation, and wisdom, I find no Confession which comes near the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England.*

So much for what we mean when we talk of the Thirty-nine Articles. For dwelling so much on the point, I shall make little apology. The intrinsic importance of it, and the singular ignorance of most Churchmen about it, are my best excuse. The times we live in make it imperatively necessary to look up and ventilate these old questions. The perilous position of the Church of England requires all her sons to spread light and information. He that would know what a true Churchman is, must be content to begin by finding out what is meant by "the Thirty-nine Articles".

*The famous historian Bingham, in his curious book on the French Protestant Church, quotes a remarkable testimony to the Articles from the French divine Le Moyne, a man of great note in his day: "No Confession can be contrived more wisely than the English is, and the Articles of Faith were never collected with a more just and reasonable discretion."—Bingham's Works, Oxf. Edit., vol. x., p. 95.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed.—"Thy word have I hid in my heart" (Psalm 119:11).

This week the following verse was submitted by Mrs. L. M. Wayland, Bayonne, N. J.:

"Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me" (St. John 14:1).

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

BUNYAN OF BEDFORDSHIRE

By the Reverend William H. Matthews

LAST summer I made a visit to Bedford and Elstow, England, to secure material for the American Tract Society to assist the churches, libraries and various other organizations in celebrating the Three Hundredth Anniversary of John Bunyan's birth.

As a Presbyterian clergyman, I had thought of the great dreamer as a man with a strong hostility toward the Established Church. I returned from my visit with the feeling that the Church of England had just as much right to claim Bunyan as my own denomination. Bunyan belongs to all believers. The Established Church is recognizing this great fact and all over England is assisting in making the year 1928 memorable for its demonstration of appreciation of this dreamer, author and preacher, who is said to have written the only Seventeenth Century book which has survived the changes of three centuries to such an extent that it is thoroughly appreciated by the educated reader of this generation.

Within the past few weeks, a modernistic clergyman whose name is known throughout the world, conducted a service in honor of another well known man of God who had been called to the Celestial City. Attempting to give the highest tribute of which he was capable, he compared this clergyman to Mr. Standfast of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress". My readers will also remember that, when Theodore Roosevelt was asked to state what character was in his judgment the greatest in all literature, he immediately replied: "To my mind the greatest character in literature is John Bunyan's 'Great Heart'." Apparently President Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, appreciates the permanent value of "Pilgrim's Progress", as much as Mr. Roosevelt did, for in answer to our letter, asking him for his estimate of Bunyan, he says: "If one is to seek for that bit of English prose which has entered most largely into the mind and heart of the vast mass of English-speaking people during the past three centuries, he will find it in 'Pilgrim's Progress'. It stands side by side with John Milton's 'Paradise Lost', and has been more widely read than that . . . . He has given us an indelible picture of the stumblings and onward marchings of the human heart and of human faith. 'Pilgrim's Progress' will be gratefully read so long as the English language endures."

Recently a representative of the Religious Tract Society of London, a member of the Established Church, lunched with the officials of the American Tract Society. I asked him concerning the interest of the English Church in the Bunyan celebration. He said that the Church of England was taking an enthusiastic interest in this event. Largely for members of the Established Church, his Society is printing 150,000 copies of "Pilgrim's Progress", and other publishing firms in England are putting new editions of Bunyan's books on the press.

The question has often been asked me, "Just what month in 1928 is best for the celebration"? The answer is "any month"; but Bunyan was born at New Harrowden, near Elstow, in November, 1628, so November is an especially appropriate time for local celebrations. My friend, the Rev. C. Bernard Cockett, M. A., minister at Bunyan Meeting, Bedford, writes me that "the Pilgrimage from Bedford to Bunhill Fields, London, where Bunyan was buried in August, 1688, will be held on Friday, August 31, 1928. Bunyan Meeting has set aside November 25, 1928, as Bunyan Sunday". Mr. Cockett says that there will be a great celebration in Scotland and Ireland, and a number of local ones—at Harlington, Hitchin, Reading and other points in England.

From letters recently received by the American Tract Society, it is apparent that thousands of clergymen of all evangelical denominations will preach either a sermon or a series of sermons on Bunyan's life and "Pilgrim's Progress". Some expect to preach as many as ten sermons on "Pilgrim's Progress". But they should not forget the message of the "Holy War", which Lord Macaulay said would have been the best religious allegory ever written if Bunyan had not produced "Pilgrim's Progress". They should also read "The Life and Death of Mr. Badman", which Prof. William Lyon Phelps says would have the place of honor as the first English novel, instead of Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe" (1719), were it not for the fact that Bunyan's book, published thirty-nine years earlier was intended as a tract and not a novel.

Kipling felt that Bunyan's "The Holy War" had a special message for the English people when they were engaged in the World War. He therefore wrote a poem on "The Holy War", with seven verses of the same style as the following:

"All enemy divisions,
Recruits of every class,
And highly screened positions
For flame or poison-gas;
The craft that we call modern,
The crimes that we call new,

John Bunyan had 'em typed and filed
In Sixteen Eighty-two.
"A pedlar from a hovel,
The lowest of the low,
The father of the Novel,
Salvation's first Defoe,
Eight blinded generations
Ere Armageddon came,
He showed us how to meet it.
And Bunyan was his name!"

The special claim of the Established Church to Bunyan rests first on the records of Abbey Church, Thomas Bunyan, the father of John, was baptized and married in the Abbey

Church, at Elstow. John Bunyan was baptized in the same church in November, 1628. These records, together with the register of the baptism of Bunyan's mother, are to be seen at the Abbey Church. This church also has a beautiful Bunyan Memorial Window. Second, it was to Abbey Church that Bunyan's wife brought her young husband after she had succeeded in getting him to read the two books that were left to her on the death of her father. This young woman was a devoted Christian and a faithful member of the Abbey Church. When she, a poor orphan girl, married Bunyan, he was known for his profanity and untruthfulness, habits formed in very early childhood; but she persuaded him to read "The Practice of Piety" and "The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven", and finally succeeded in bringing Bunyan to church.

There he heard the sermon of Vicar Christopher Hall, on Sunday Sports, which changed his life. When he went out on the Village Green, just across the street from the church, that Sunday afternoon, he heard a heavenly voice saying, "Wilt thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or have thy sins and go to Hell?" Like Paul, after his vision on the Damascus Road, he became a new man. Unlike the spot where Paul heard the heavenly voice, the exact place where Bunyan saw that vision can be located by the position of a pillar which stands on the Village Green. The nearby Moot Hall, where Bunyan danced with the village maidens, is still standing. It is almost unaltered since the days when Bunyan played around it, at archery, leap-frog, tip-cat, and other games. Only a personal examination of the enduring beams and other wood in this quaint old structure shows why it has withstood the wear of three centuries.

In the Abbey Churchyard, just a few feet from the entrance, is the original Bell Tower, where Bunyan loved to ring the bells. Just, why, after his conversion, he thought that this was a sin, we do not know. Perhaps it was because the bells were rung for Sunday sports as well as for Sunday services.

Abbey Church and Original Bell Tower, Elstow.

When Bunyan heard the sermon on Sports at the Abbey Church, he had before him the gate, the archway of which is still preserved in the present edifice, which gave him the suggestion of "The Wicket Gate" through which Christian had to pass at the beginning of his journey to the Celestial City. The people of Elstow say that the ruins of Hillersdon's Porch, near the wicket gate, gave him the suggestion of the beautiful palace pictured in "Pilgrim's Progress".

The Bunyan Cottage (much altered), where the blind daughter Mary and her sister Elizabeth were born, is only a short distance from Moot Hall. Indeed, you can walk all over the village at Elstow in about ten minutes. It is interesting because it is much the same as in the Seventeenth Century.

A third claim of the Established Church on Bunyan might be made on the basis of the baptism of several of his children in the churches of Elstow and Bedford. Mary, the blind child, was baptized in Elstow, at the Abbey Church. Elizabeth's birth record is there, and it is quite probable that she, too, was baptized at the same church. Then comes the strangest fact of all: after Bunyan became a Baptist and was immersed in the River Ouse, the river that he later looked out upon from the iron-barred window of the jail on the Bedford Bridge, he had his boy, Joseph, baptized at St. Cuthbert's Church, Bedford, November 16, 1672. I have no less an authority than the Rev. C. Bernard Cockett, M. A., the present pastor of Bunyan Meeting, for this statement, and it is confirmed by the records of the church. Mr. Cockett and I went over to St. Cuthbert's and saw the stone font where Bunyan's boy was baptized. On our way there, we passed the cottage, which now stands on the site of the house where Bunyan lived when he was minister of the Bedford Church.

Still another reason why I give a great deal of credit to the Established Church for producing Bunyan is in the fact that at the time when Bunyan united with "holy" John Gifford's Church, Gifford was rector of St. John's Church and master of the hospital connected with it. The Bedford Corporation presented Gifford with this living in 1653, even though Gifford had not been a parish minister They recognized the fact that he had been pastor of a

St. Cuthbert's Church, Bedford.

Free Church congregation formed by him in 1650, and let him bring his congregation with him. In other words, John Bunyan became a member of St. John's, a parish church. His name is the nineteenth on the list of members. Gifford continued as rector of St. John's until his death in 1655.

These years when John Gifford was his minister were the formative period in the life of John Bunyan. During this period, Bunyan sat at John Gifford's feet, just as Christian sat at the feet of Evangelist. In "Grade Abounding", Bunyan says, "At this time, I sat under the ministry of holy Mr. Gifford whose doctrine, by God's Grace, was much for my stability". But the words which Bunyan heard from the lips of "holy" Mr. Gifford, which influenced him most, were those spoken in the refectory of the hospital.

Dr. John Brown, the minister of Bunyan Meeting for many years, and the most reliable biographer of Bunyan, in describing St. John's and the Hospital, says: "The old hall and dining room—with windows looking out upon the churchyard and to the south, are part of the original hospital. The dining room, which was the ancient refectory, was entered from the south end, as late as 1760, when Cole, the antiquary, saw it, was connected with the church by a cloister running under its north wall to the chancel door. This room, with its oaken beams, is interesting, not merely as being a portion of perhaps the oldest dwelling house in the town, and as the living-room of the master and his co-brethren of the hospital for centuries, but also as the place where Bunyan and Gifford were often in conference together, as the seeking Pilgrim and the guiding Evangelist of the time."

If Gifford had not been supported by the Established Church during the two formative years in Bunyan's life, it is quite probable that he would not have had the time to devote to this pilgrim, who required so much instruction. Further, the atmosphere of peace and happiness which Gifford's refectory furnished was quite different from what Bunyan would have enjoyed if the Spiritual conversation of Mr. Gifford, a prince among men, under the compulsion of poverty, had shrunk "into the present tense, unkinged by foolish bread and butter".

St. John's and St. Cuthbert's Church at Bedford have great interest for the pilgrim to the shrine of Bunyan, but it is at Bunyan Meeting House that we find the records, relics, books, tablets, etc., which throw most light upon Bunyan's life. I preached there on Sunday morning, June 26, 1927, and in the evening went over to Elstow to conduct a service in Bunyan Memorial Hall, a building which has little of real church equipment, except the Bunyan Memorial Windows, which are not attractive enough to reflect very great honor on the memory of such a man as John Bunyan.

As I entered Bunyan Meeting House, at Bedford, I stopped to examine the beautiful bronze doors, given by the Duke of Bedford in 1876. They represent ten scenes in the life of Christian in "Pilgrim's Progress" and they are in every way worthy of Bunyan. The Duke of Bedford also erected a fine monument to the memory of Bunyan in Bedford. It stands at St. Peter's Green.

At Bunyan Meeting, I found a tablet to the memory of the great granddaughter of Bunyan, a part of a long Communion Table, a copy of the Order for his arrest, dated November, 1660, issued just after the signing of the Act of Uniformity by Charles II.; Bunyan's will, leaving everything to his wife, but undiscovered for one hundred and fifty years after his death; and the church records during the period that he was pastor of Bedford Church, 1672, until his death in 1688. Under the Sunday-school room, I saw the old pulpit from which Bunyan preached to crowded congregations at Zoar Street Chapel, Southwark, London.

Bunyan Meeting House needs a Museum; at present most of the priceless relics connected with Bunyan's life are in the combination church-parlor and museum. Here, on the shelves, are volumes from many of the earliest editions of his writings in English and in foreign languages. On one of the shelves, I saw his mug, his walking-stick, and the tiny cabinet in which he put most of his important papers. In this room stands the Vestry Chair he occupied and half of the long Communion Table which ran almost the full length of the aisle of the church of Three Ridges, built in 1707, to take the place of the building in which Bunyan preached for sixteen years after his release from the Bedford Jail, where he was confined for twelve years.

Bunyan published sixty books, one for each year of his life. "Pilgrim's Progress" was written in the winter of 1675 and 1676, when he was imprisoned again for a period of six months. By this time, Bunyan had, by careful study of the King James' Version of the Bible, and writing books and sermons, made himself master of the English language. The story that the world's greatest religious allegory was written by an ignorant tinker has no foundation. It was written by a self-educated man, who knew his Bible and knew men. Bunyan's education in the schools was limited by a few years in the grammer grades, probably at the Bedford School, established by Sir William Harper in 1556, and now one of the best schools in all England, but then in charge of unworthy teachers. He says he was grateful to his parents for the fact that "it pleased God to put it into their hearts to put me to school to learn both to read and to write".

Bunyan said the little he learned he lost, but this is probably one of the unconscious exaggerations into which he fell under the influence of his "inferior complex", probably developed in childhood by his lowly birth. The fact that Bunyan's father was a "whitesmith", a mender of pots and kettdes, gave the boy no social standing whatever. As a side line, his father "kept what we would call a saloon. Born amidst such surroundings, it is no wonder that 'Even as a child', Bunyan had few equals in cursing, swearing, lying, and blaspheming the holy name of God".

This boy became, through his complete change of heart, the surrender of his wild imagination to God, and the bringing of every thought into captivity to God, a close student of the Scriptures. In them he found that which captured his imagination and made it serve the highest ends. In them he discovered words which so enriched his vocabulary that the temptation to emphasize his statements with oaths completely passed from him. Even Sunday sports lost their attraction for Bunyan and he found his greatest pleasure in writing and preaching.

Bunyan, after his experience on the Village Green, became a very serious young man. He sought the companionship of serious men and women among the Puritans of that period; but, unlike the Puritans, he never lost his sense of humor, although the sense of humor in Bunyan was partially hidden for many years by a Puritan publisher who, in 1701, published Bunyan's Poems for Boys and Girls, or "Country Rhimes for Children", throwing out twenty-five of the seventy-four rhimes, as too humorous, and changed the name of the book to the serious title, "Divine Emblems". Even George Offor, who edited a three-volume edition of Bunyan's Life and complete works failed to see the trick that the Puritan publisher had played on the public. A new edition, with the full seventy-four poems, is now being printed by the American Tract Society. It is interesting to young and old and helps to re-discover Bunyan.

"Pilgrim's Progress" was written in jail for Bunyan's own entertainment. At first he had no thought of letting the world read it. When he published the first edition, he was astonished at its sale. Of that first edition, only five copies now remain. One is the property of the New York Public Library, and will be shown when this Library, in conjunction with the American Tract Society, puts on its six months' exhibit. A second of these copies belongs to the British Museum; I saw it last summer in a glass case side by side with a first edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost".

"Pilgrim's Progress" has been translated into one hundred and twenty-four languages and dialects, but most of these are out of print because Protestant people fail to perceive the value of the printed page. The various Atheistic organizations seem to fully realize what a book, tract or pamphlet can do and so they are appealing to fellow Atheists for $85,000 a year, to print Atheistic literature. Their last catalogue lists three hundred books warranted to confirm doubters in their disbelief. Many of these books were written years ago. The American Tract Society proposes, as a part of the Tercentenary celebration of the birth of John Bunyan, to raise $50,000 to print Bunyan's books in languages in which these books have not been reprinted because of lack of funds. The Society is ready to furnish material to all ministers, who plan to preach on Bunyan or any of his books.

The little new Indian Church, St. Elizabeth's, at Ketchikan, Alaska, was consecrated by Bishop Rowe in February. Seventeen Indians were confirmed at that time, and three hundred attended the services, banquet, etc., some of them coming over from Metlakatla. The clergyman at St. Elizabeth's is the Rev. Paul Mather, an Indian. His people built the church themselves.

I had a delightful evening in the remote village of Harmondsworth; forty-two confirmation candidates. The rector and his wife eagerly competing in Bible classes; she had fifty women, but he had beaten her by one hundred and thirty-seven men. And then people talk as if the Church were a failure everywhere.—The Bishop of London.

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES

Prepared by J. T. Bougher. Reading Terminal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

LESSON—No. 31.
TOPIC—The Origin of Man.
(Read Gen. 1:1-31.

The Holy Bible does not leave us in the dark concerning the origin, nature, and destiny of man. In fact, it might be said to be the burden of the entire Book, along with the revelation God has given us of Himself and His Son, the Lord Jesus, and His wonderful plan of redemption for a sinful world.

False teachers and unbelieving "Professors" departing from the Word of Truth, have advanced idle and foolish theories concerning the origin of man, commonly known as "Evolution". But the rejector of God's own record of the origin of man, has no Bible, for upon the book of Genesis rests the entire structure of the written Word, and to reject the foundation, is to reject all.—1 Cor. 2:7-14; Jude 1:18; Rev. 22:18, 19.

Happily, the Word of the Lord outweighs all argument, and to the true believer the entire Holy Book is indeed precious. Let us, therefore, consider a few vital Scriptures on the subject before us:

1. Man was created by God in His likeness.—Gen. 1:27.
2. God's crowning act, at the creative period.—Gen. 1:27.
3. Made a living soul.—Gen. 2:7.
4. Male and female created He them.—Gen. 1:27.
5. Created for the glory of God.—Isa. 43:7.
6. Man's heredity traced to God.—Luke 3:38; Psalm 138: 14-16.
7. This record confirmed by our Lord.—Matt. 19:4.
8. Given preeminence over all other forms of creation.—Gen. 1:26-29.
9. By Divine act made different from brute creation.—Gen. 2:7.
10. Man's intelelct and spiritual nature surpasses all other forms of life.—Eph. 4:23, 24; Col. 3:10.
11. God's purpose was of the highest manifestation of his love and grace.—Eph. 2:7.
12. God saw that everything He made was good.—Gen. 1:31.
13. God's reward for sinless man is suggested in the experience of Enoch and Elijah.—Gen. 5:24; 2 Kings 2:11.
14. Man was recognized at creation's dawn.—Titus 1:2.
15. When man fell and thus brought sin and wretchedness into the world, the unchanging character of a righteous God is revealed through His great plan of redemption; which through grace and love is still held forth to a sinful world.—John 3:16; Jas. 1:17.
16. The high privilege of being restored to the Heavenly Father's favor is open to all, by a new birth, through belief in the sacrificial death, burial, and resurrection of the beloved Son of God, Christ Jesus our Lord.—John 3:5-7; 1 Cor. 15:1-4.

The transforming power of the Holy Bible is a sublime demonstration of its Divine authority and absolute integrity. Let us believe it to be wise, and follow it to be safe, for all are under condemnation who trifle with its sacred contents. Its call is, "Come, and let us reason together."—Isa. 1:18.

IT would seem that this year is to be a memorable one. To the Lord's own blood-bought children nothing should cause alarm. We are in His hands, and He permits only His own purposes to be carried out. What a privilege to rest on this fact, and what peace it gives to the soul. The Lord always does the best for His own and He never makes a mistake, and all "happenings" are by His gracious permission, so we can rest and not be perturbed.

Sometimes trouble or sorrow comes to His saints, but if we could see the end from the beginning we would have to acknowledge that it was right, although for the flesh it was hard to bear. What poor unbelieving creatures some of us are! We have an omnipotent and an omniscient God upon whom we can cast our every burden, and has He not promised to sustain us? Flee, therefore, unbelief, and let us trust our God more fully this year than ever before. He is worthy and will not fail us.

May the year bring much blessing to all our friends.

The Secretary's Travels.

It is good to be sitting at the desk again after fourteen months of travel. "Surely," I can say with David, "mercy hath followed me." Yes, I have experienced 62,000 miles of journeying mercies, and during the whole time, with the exception of two or three days' slight indisposition, almost at the end of the journey, I have enjoyed the best of health, and was able to fulfill all my engagements.

His Object.

The object I had ever before me was not only to visit the missionaries with whom I had been in correspondence for so many years in connection with the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, but also to endeavor to deepen an interest in the Word of God and a deeper belief in its power through the operation of the Holy Spirit to win souls to Christ .(even apart from the human voice) amongst all who were engaged in Christian work in all counties which I had the privilege of visiting.

Close of Financial Year.

Many friends ask us to remind them when their subscriptions become due, and we take this opportunity of mentioning the fact that our year closes on March 31. We shall welcome your annual gifts before that date in order that we may include them in this financial year.

Bunyan Tercentenary.

It will be interesting to note in connection with the Bunyan Tercentenary celebrations that it was the Book Society which published the very first penny edition of Pilgrim's Progress.

Native Bible Workers.

May we remind our readers that we have several native workers in China and India who spend their time in distributing and preaching the Word of God.

These workers are supported by friends of the Scripture Gift Mission, and represent them in their various fields. The salary necessary, owing to the cheap cost of living, is comparatively small. In most cases £9 to £15 per annum would be sufficient. We shall esteem it a privilege to arrange for some more of our readers to be thus represented in the Foreign Field. Those chosen will be men and women of God, and reports of their work will be sent from time to time. We have been asked for several such workers recently by missionaries.

It grieved and distressed me to find missionaries (?) to the Moslems, for instance, who did not believe the whole

Bible. Naturally, the first difficulty they encounter is how to answer the Moslem who challenges them. "Why," they ask, "do you come to us with an imperfect book, if it is as you say, when we have a book (the Koran) which came down direct from heaven" To this they have no reply It is worse than useless to send out such men to India or anywhere else.

I was also much interested in the great interdenominational churches in the States. The new Moody Church is a unique building which seats over 4,000 people. The Church of the Open Door in Los Angeles is another work of the same kind. The Rev. John MacNeil (the well-known Scotch evangelist) is the pastor. It is conducted on the old evangelical lines, and is always well filled.

Broadcasting by wireless is used very largely in the States by the different Churches, and it has become a question whether this is not one of the causes of the falling off of worshippers. Probably a great deal of good is done where the Gospel is faithfully proclaimed, and it is true that souls have been brought under conviction of sin by means of the wireless, therefore, it is difficult to judge in the matter. Nearly every church of note in the States has its own broadcasting system.

It was my privilege on two occasions during my visit to broadcast.

THE ORIGINAL FISHERMAN'S CLUB IN LOS ANGELES

As Told by a Friend

With the modest purpose of receiving Biblical instruction and inspiration for the winning of souls, seven young men, on Monday evening, April 24, 1906, assembled in Immanuel Presbyterian Church, Los Angeles, under the leadership of the Rev. T. C. Horton. The now famous "Fishermen's Club" is the direct outgrowth of this nucleus, and the Bible Institute of Los Angeles is itself an outgrowth of the Fishermen's Club.

The Club was organized (it may be said reverently) along the lines and for the same purpose that gave birth to the First Fishermen's Club, called by the Master "to catch men alive" (Luke 5:10 Greek). The Monday night gathering has never once been omitted. It has invariably been an evening of exercise in evangelistic Scripture and doctrine, and in methods and aspiration for winning souls —"catching men" for Christ. These fishermen have never on such occasions toiled all the night, and taken nothing. In their meetings they are free and joyful, and voluntarily stand up and tell, for the benefit of others whom they have brought to the meeting, the delight they have found since taking Christ into their lives.

A remarkable percentage of the membership has gone into specific Christian service, or are now pursuing a regular theological course as candidates for the ministry or missions. And of right good quality they are—being rooted and grounded in the revealed and vital Word of God. Of the hundreds of members who have passed through the Club, scores are scattered throughout the world doing business for the King, as evangelists, pastors, missionaries, etc., in the home and foreign lands. The Club has demonstrated beyond any question of doubt that the Bible is of itself sufficient to draw and hold young men during these crucial years when, according to popular opinion, they must be feted, feasted and entertained.

A member, having been pledged by the Fishermen's Club copyrighted badge to propagate the work to which it is called, if found guilty of conduct unbecoming a Christian will, like the soldier of his sword, be stripped of the pin. One has well said of the Club: "There has never been any weak, sentimental, goody-goody teaching in this Club. There has never been a coaxing of fellows to come, or trimming of the Gospel for fear of hurting their feelings. There have been straight, shoulder-hitting messages given in love. There has been abundant and abiding evidence of the tremendous grip of the Gospel upon the hearts of young men. Men have been faithfully, fearlessly and lovingly dealt with. The Club has produced some young men whose faces have been set like a flint for righteousness. Preachers, teachers, evangelists and missionaries have grown out of the class as naturally as the oak springs from the acorn. Years have not diminished its influence. It grows sturdier and stronger. It is getting a new and wider vision of the call of God. It is rising to a higher estimate of the purposes of the Master. It has learned through the life of surrender to God how to stand with heart bared and head bowed in the sacred presence of the Captain of the Lord's hosts, and to do with loyal obedience His loving will. The Club has honestly and heartily sought to magnify the name and glorify the person of Christ the Lord."

Briefly the following may be said of the Club:

It has never had an entertainment.
It has never had a secular lecture.
It has never had an entertainment.
It has never had any schemes for getting members.
It has never sought to be popular.
It has never depended upon popular speakers.
It has never had a musical program.
It has never had office-seeking members.
It has never had any dues.
It has never pandered to any worldly influence.
It has had faithful officers.
It has had praying members.
It has held hundreds of meetings.
It has made thousands of converts.
It has helped to support missionaries.

It has a definite statement of belief, to which every member subscribes.

It has had a definite object, and high ideals for its membership. Its spirit is evangelistic and soul-saving. Even an anniversary turkey dinner of the Club ended with an evangelistic service in which fifty young men gave themselves definitely to the Lord's service.

An International Organization.

For fifteen years the Fishermen's Club of Los Angeles steadfastly refused to grant permission to use either the incorporated name "Fishermen's Club" or to wear the copyrighted emblem of the Club, fearing that some such organization might lower the original standard and thus bring the reputation of the Fishermen's Club into disrepute.

However, in view of the condition now existing in the world and Church, and the need, as never before for definite, aggressive, soul-saving work for young men, the Fishermen's Club felt that there was a definite call for further extension and development of its work through an International work, based on the same statement of doctrine, the same constitution and using the same copyrighted emblem as the original organization.

Consequently, new articles of incorporation under the State of California were taken out on January 22, 1926, under the name of The International Fishermen's Club, which articles give power to this corporation to establish and issue charters to subordinate clubs throughout the world; to have full control of all Fishermen's emblems, and to recall charters of subordinate clubs if necessary.

The object of the Club as given in its Constitution in Article 2 is as follows:

The object of this Club shall be (1) to study God's Word and to create an interest in and love for the Bible especially among young men; (2) to do active, aggressive personal work for Jesus Christ and in addition to the regular week-night meetings of the Club, hold Sunday afternoon meetings and engage in other active, aggressive evangelistic work for men whenever and wherever practical; (3) to uphold the fundamental and evangelical doctrines of the Bible and the Church as follows: :

We believe:—

The Trinity of the Godhead—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

The personality and Deity of Jesus Christ, begotten of the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary, truly God and truly man.

The personality of the Holy Spirit.

The reality and personality of Satan.

The supernatural and plenary inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, that they are inerrant in the original writing and that their teaching and authority are absolute, supreme and final.

The origin of man as recorded in the opening chapters of Genesis.

The sinfulness of man.

That Jesus Christ became the sinner's substitute, before God, and died as a propitiatory sacrifice for the sin of the whole world.

The resurrection of Jesus Christ; that His body was raised from the dead according to the Scriptures and that He ascended into Heaven and sitteth on the right hand of God as the believers' Advocate.

The premillenial and personal return of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The necessity of the new birth.

The evangelization of the world. The supreme mission of the people of God in this age is to preach the Gospel to every creature.

The resurrection of the body, both of the just and the unjust.

The everlasting blessedness of the saved and the everlasting punishment of the lost.

All applicants for membership shall be between the ages of sixteen and thirty years, inclusive. There is also a provision for honorary membership.

Applications for charters are being received from many different places and new Clubs have been formed. Mr. W. R. Hale, formerly Assistant Superintendent of the Bible Institute of Los Angeles, is now giving his whole time to this work, as Field Secretary, and organized a number of Fishermen's Clubs on the Pacific Coast during the first few weeks of his affiliation with the Club.

The Primary Purpose of the Fishermen's Club is the saving of the souls of young men. Its motto is the command of our Lord Jesus Christ "Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men." Soul-saving is the greatest need of the day. The Lord gave it first place, though too often in church and school it has the second or no place. In the Fishermen's Clubs has been demonstrated what can be done. May these Clubs soon be chartered in every city and town in our own country and extend around the globe.

Full information will gladly be sent to all inquirers. Address: V. V. Morgan, Secretary, 4220 Chestnut Avenue, Long Beach, California.

HISTORIC PERIODS OF FREDERICKSBURG—1608-1861.

Mrs. Vivian Minor Fleming.

Historic Period No. 6.

St. George's Church—Parson Marye—The Washingtons, Etc.

On April 10, 1732, Col. Willis contracted to build two churches, one in Fredericksburg and one on the Mattaponi. Col. Byrd tells us that during his visit to Col. Willis "Parson Kenner edified us with his company". The reverend gentlemen had been gotten rid of by his vestry in a very unceremonious manner by giving him notice—"That he need not give himself any further trouble to come and preach in the parish". He was the rector of the earliest church upon Mine Run.

The first rector of St. George's Church was Patrick Henry, uncle of the orator, but he only remained two years, not long enough for his nephew and namesake to visit him and "run about these streets barefooted", as was announced here once by a prominent speaker. He was succeeded by the Rev. James Marye, a Hugenot, from the settlement in Goochland. He and his son, James Marye, Jr., held this pastorate for forty-six years and were the ancestors of the Marye family of this section of Virginia. Parson Marye was a classical scholar and kept a school, frequented by many men, who afterwards achieved distinction. This school is said to have been on the square where now stands the Baptist church. As both preacher and teacher he served well his day and generation.

It is said the Washingtons belonged to a church in Falmouth, Overwharton Parish. They often crossed the river to St. George's. George went to school in Falmouth to Master Hobby, the sexton in a cottage adjoining the church, riding there every day.

Augustine Washington had bought land in Stafford County in 1722, and lived here several years with his first wife, Jane Butler, and her three children. She died in 1729, and March 6, 1730, he married Mary Ball, and moved to Wakefield, then to Mt. Vernon, coming to Ferry Farm, Stafford, finally in 1729.

The plantation adjoining the Washingtons in Stafford belonged to the Strothers, and little Jane Strother was one of George's early sweethearts. The first ferry authorized by law between Stafford and Fredericksburg was in 1748 and was between the land of Anthony Strother and the tobacco warehouse (the stone building by the bridge). Augustine Washington owned three lots in Fredericksburg, 33, 34 and 40. Lawrence, the elder half-brother, made a present of his share in them to his brother, George.

But to return to an earlier date. When the Washingtons settled in Stafford, there were six children, George, Betty, Samuel, John Augustine, Charles and little Mildred, who died when she was fourteen months old. Here, just across the river, all of George Washington's youth was spent; here he cut down the cherry tree and here he threw the dollar (Spanish) across the river. After Master Hobby, of Falmouth, and a Mr. Williams, near Wakefield, he went to school to Parson Marye in Fredericksburg, and here his first cousin, Lewis Willis (son of Henry Willis and Mildred Washington) testifies to his "industry and assiduity". While his brother, Samuel, and his comrades were at "Bandy" or other games "he was behind the door ciphering". His romping once with one of the larger girls "excited no little comment among the other lads".

Henry Willis died in 1740 and three others of the original trustees of Fredericksburg had either died or resigned, so in 1742 Augustine Washington was elected trustee or feoffee of the town. Perhaps that was why he bought the lots. On April 12, 1743, Augustine Washington died, after a brief illness, of rheumatic gout.

But to return. In 1738 the House of Burgesses passed a law authorizing fairs to be held in Fredericksburg twice a year, "For the sale of cattle, provisions, goods, wares and all kinds of merchandise". Fine gatherings these for all the surrounding counties.

In 1739 the trustees found it necessary to buy land from Henry Willis and John Lewis and enlarge the original boundaries of the town. About this time they began to build better houses.

We don't know when Fielding Lewis moved into this section. He was here in 1746, living in a house on Charles Street, where his son, Robert, Mayor of Fredericksburg, lived at the time of Lafayette's last visit in 1824. He was of distinguished family, the son of John Lewis, of Gloucester. His first wife was Catherine Washington, a member of the Washington-Lewis family. By this marriage there was one son, John. Colonel Lewis' second wife was Betty Washington, whom he married in 1750 and for whom he built Kenmore. Betty Washington had eleven children and seven were brought up right here in this community and every one of them turned out well and their descendants have been useful, patriotic, distinguished citizens in many localities.

George Washington left home when he was fifteen but he was often a visitor. The Lewis descendants say he was here after his brother Lawrence's death until the death of his niece, Anne, left him the owner of Mt. Vernon. He was deeply interested in the building of Kenmore and planted in the grounds many of the trees and shrubs, some of which are still living. Charles Washington lived here many years at "The Falls". He built the Rising Sun Tavern and was a vestryman of St. George's in 1766.

Many families had moved into Fredericksburg and the surrounding country and names prominent then are some of them still prominent—John Taliaferro, Robert Carter, Larkin Chew, William Bernard, Charles Dick (evidently a universal friend, for he was godfather, guardian, executor, witness and vestryman oftener than nearly any one in the records). Then there was John Allen, a rich old bachelor, and Roger Dixon, another friendly man, after whom Dixon Street was named; Doctor Mortimer, beloved physician, who built General Wheeler's house in 1764; Doctor Hugh Mercer, who fought at Culloden and lived next to Charles Dick, whose house on Princess Anne Street, now occupied by Mr. Masters, is the oldest home in Fredericksburg—built in 1745.

Some time between 1730 and 1740 John Gordon moved here. He was not one of the merchant princes of Falmouth, but he had a capable and intelligent wife, and dying left her executrix of his entire estate and guardian of his two little girls, Catherine and Isabella. The young Scotchman, Hugh Mercer, fell in love with Isabella and married her and George Weedon married Catherine. Dr. Mercer kept an apothecary shop on corner Main and Amelia Streets.

There were Crutchfields, Frenches, Pattons, Minors, Hollidays (John Holliday came to this country in 1702, and he, his son and grandson held the position of tobacco inspector for Fredericksburg for more than fifty years); Stannards, Spottswoods, all living in the county by this time, and other names equally well known.

Philip Fithian, tutor at Nomini Hall, mentions the races at Fredericksburg in his diary. This was the gathering place for all the youth, beauty and fashion of the surrounding country, though the country people held themselves vastly above those who lived in town, and did so up to the period of the War Between the States.

THE GREAT PYRAMID.

The following is an extract from the introduction written by Mr. J. Clemishaw for the book, "The Great Pyramid—Its Divine Message", by D. Davidson, M. C., M. I. Struct, E. and H. Aldersmith, M. B. (Lond.), F. R. C. S.

That the Message of the Pyramid is meant for the present time, or present civilization, is indicated by all three systems of Messianic prophecy—the ancient Egyptian, the Pyramid, and the Hebrew prophecies. These unite in giving the date of December, 1557 A. D., as the date of the beginning of the final phase of acceleration towards the establishing of the Messianic kingdom.

This date ushered in a period of development such as the world had never known, and that culminated in the great European War. The dates of the beginning and ending of the Great War are given to the day by the Pyramid's system of astronomical chronology, and the symbolism indicates that this is a period of chaos and oppression. Similarly, the period from the eleventh of November, 1918, to the twenty-ninth of May, 1928, is symbolized as "Truce in Chaos", and the ancient Egyptian Messianic imagery defines the locality symbolizing this period as the period of the "Triple Veil", a period in which something tangible is to be revealed concerning hidden things and purposes. After the "Truce in Chaos", it is indicated that a new period of chaos and oppression will begin which will continue until the sixteenth of September, 1936. What this date relates to, and what are the logical arguments leading up to the conclusions outlined above, can best be seen and understood by reading the book itself.

The Great Commission

BISHOP CREIGHTON WRITES OF VISITING SOME MOUNTAIN MISSIONS.

While work in some of our other fields in Mexico is curtailed by existing conditions, the Nopala field offers the best opportunity to keep in touch with the native work, particularly the Indian work. The field is scattered and all but two of our missions are in mountainous country far from the railroad. There is, however, a devotion on the part of our congregations and an evidence of sincere and faithful work on the part of our missionaries which will eventually enable us to report a degree of progress and an increase in communicants amply justifying our efforts in this difficult and sparsely settled region.

On February 23 I left Mexico City for Maravillos, where we have a well-built church and a small but loyal congregation. Presbitero Samuel Salinas for many years has been our faithful missionary and friend to these congregations, assisted by his brother, Pbro. Ruben Salinas.

The service was Holy Communion, and a more reverent and helpful observance could not be imagined. After the service we went to the home of the Guerreros, where we enjoyed a most ample repast, which fortified us for the ride to Nopala, the first stage of our journey. In the evening there was a delightful fiesta in the school room at Nopala, including selections by a local orchestra whose most interesting member was a small boy who played the "traps" with style and spirit.

Friday, February 24, we started for Humini at an early hour, accompanied by our Deacon Gomez. The ride up the mountains to this most interesting mission was never so beautiful. We had sun, but not too much; the views were lovely and, although the trip is hard, we arrived at eleven o'clock not the least weary, and ready to greet the splendid congregation which gathered when the bell rang its summons out over the valley.

Pbro. Samuel Salinas, who preached, called attention to the fact that though three orders of the ministry were represented in isolated Humini that day. There were many communions, and at the close of the service I met a confirmation class and spoke to them briefly.

After an ample lunch, al fresco, we left at mid-afternoon for the long ride to Encinillas, arriving about six at the hospitable home of Sr. Ezequiel Romero, where we spent the night.

On Saturday, February 25, although we had to wait some time for the people to arrive, we finally had a sizable congregation and a most hearty and helpful service. Pbro. Ruben Salinas left us for Popotla, where he had a service the next day.

On Sunday we left Encinillas at six for San Francisquito, where a small but eager congregation were waiting for us in their little church. After service we rode to Buena Vista, the home of Sr. Alvarado Narvaez, where we had breakfast. By this time our company had increased to at least a dozen people, all of whom except Deacon Gomez were going back to Nopala with us for an 11 o'clock service. At Nopala a large crowd was present, some from Debego and some from El Campamento. There were many communions and a beautiful service conducted by Pbro. Salinas. Following the service there was a delightful luncheon, with many guests, in the Salinas home.

Monday, February 27, up bright and early to start with Pbro. Salinas and the deacon, who had rejoined us, for Santiago Loma, twenty-three miles away. The riding was hard and by this time there was a touch of weariness which made the mountains seem higher and the distance greater. However, they had to be climbed and a good spirit may shorten distances even for a travel-sore missionary Bishop. A huge crowd was present at Santiago Loma. There was a marvelous inspiration in the service. Two were baptized, and many were received, before and after the Celebration. I had a chance to renew acquaintance with our agrarian friends, some twenty of whom were present. We reached Chapantongo, nine miles away, at six o'clock, and sleep beguiled me immediately after supper.

On February 28, Tuesday, there was an early service at Chapantongo. Here also there was a baptism and several were received. After the service I saw the new church which I will return to dedicate within a few weeks, or as soon as it is finished.

We left Chapantongo at 9:30 for San Bartolo, where Sr. Cruz greeted us and rode with us to the church. A splendid congregation was present and again there was a hearty service with many communions.

After an ample though hurried lunch with our friends, we left for Sayula, which is on the National Railroad. The road was bad, in some places almost impassable, huge rocks and deep tepetate ruts barred our way and made riding difficult, but we reached Sayula without adventure, and after abrazas from Pbro. Samuel Salinas and those who accompanied me, I was at last safely settled in the train for Mexico City, having visited eight missions in six days of hard though profitable riding.

In each case the service was conducted by one of our clergy duly registered for the locality. I vested and sat in the chancel, speaking to the people after the services.

HILARY BRENT.

It will be of interest to many readers to know that the infant son of Dr. and Mrs. Hilary Clapp, of Bontoc, Philippine Islands, was baptized a few weeks ago, and given the name, "Hilary Brent". For those to whom this means little, it should be added that years ago when Bishop Brent was Bishop of the Philippines, the Rev. Walter C. Clapp, an early missionary who gave many years of service there, was godfather to a wee scrap of an Igorot boy, christened Hilary Clapp, who has since grown up, taken a doctor's degree, and is now ministering to his own people. Little Hilary Brent is his son.

ICHANG AND SHASI.

Bishop Roots writes in the Hankow Newsletter of a private school for girls, in Ichang, which has been weathering the storms: "In accordance with an arrangement made last spring, between Miss Li Yu-yuin and the Mission, this private school has been conducted for the past term in the quarters of our School of the Holy Spirit. I had no idea until I saw Miss Li in the school premises at Ichang and heard the local opinion concerning her work, that this school was doing such good work and was filling such an important place in the Church life at Ichang. They have above ninety-pupils in the school, some fifty of whom, so Miss Li herself told us, were formerly in the School of the Holy Spirit. The school has, too, from our point of view, performed the very useful function of keeping the soldiers out of our Compound when, had it not been so occupied, there was nothing, humanly speaking, which could have kept them out.

"Miss Li is a graduate of Yenching University, College of Women, Peking, and an old pupil of the Church of Scotland Mission School in Ichang. . . . . The respect in which women of character and determinations are held in China is well illustrated by the way in which Miss Li and the little band of Christian teachers whom she has secured for her faculty have been able to keep their school going during these rough times, even when the men have been apparently unable to do a similar thing with the boys' school."

The Bishop says also: "Primary schools in Shasi have been continued just as they have in Ichang and are one of the bright spots of the situation. It was particularly cheering also to see the way in which our Middle School girls, with one or two college girls among them (who are for this term obliged to remain out of school) were, here in their Shasi homes and their Shasi Church, giving of the best to the life of the Church and cheering everybody by their courage and faith and hope."

Both Ichang and Shasi are the center of rather extensive country work, and a good deal of this is now halted. Bandits at Shihnan, late in December, subjected the people of the surrounding country to terrible cruelties. Our own school teacher, Mr. Li Tzchieh, had gone out of the city to visit and did not appear after the departure of the bandits. Many days later it was learned that he had been taken by them, and later reports were that he was confined to a dark cell and had lost the use of his eyes. Word went forward that every effort should be made for his release but no news had come of it up to the first of February.

Of the country workers, Bishop Roots says: "The striking thing to me about it is that most of our workers in spite of all are fuller of courage and determination and faith than ever. They flee when it is necessary before the storm, but are ready to return as soon as the storm abates."

Book Reviews

THE LONELY ISLAND (Tristian Da Cunha): By Rose Annie Rogers. Cloth. Pp. 223. The Morehouse Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis. Price, $3.

A pathetic, appealing, heart-touching book. It is the history of the Rogers family in this isolated spot between the coasts of South America and Africa, about midway. One can esteem the pull of evangelism which would impel a man to take his family to such a barren and seemingly forsaken spot. The arid soil, the torrential rains, the humid atmosphere, the utter loneliness, the uncouth, though well-meaning natives, the infrequency of mails or the touching of a ship on the barren coast, the insufficiency of food and fuel and the ever-present uncertainty of the future were well calculated to test the consecration of these devoted missionaries. Yet, they applied themselves to their task, forgetful of home comforts willingly forsaken, of fellowships continued only through intermittent letters; to show these people the joy of believing, the prize of knowing the Lord Jesus. Mrs. Rogers, with facile pen and commendable literary skill, has woven into her story of life on this island a compelling interest. It were well for us who live in the midst of uncounted comforts and luxuries to dwell sympathetically uuon this history of devotion to the call to service. Death always heightens the thrill of any such record. And Mr. Rogers lays down his life that we might know the cost to him and his faithful wife of the dedication to souls which this abiding for three years among this people, involved. The picturesqueness of the scenery, and the life, the devotion of the believers to God's servants, the ordinary events, which Mrs. Rogers transfigures into the realm of the kindly providential, all combine to make the book fascinating reading.

THE GOSPEL FOR ASIA: By Kenneth J. Saunders, Litt. D. (Cambridge). Cloth. Pp. 245. The Macmillan Co., New York City. Price, $2.50.

One stands awed with the sense of reverence, as this author unfolds the richness of his Oriental knowledge, and blends into one volume the very best of the aspirations of the Gita and the Lotus, the books of Hindoo and Japanese religious illumination. His literary culture is so winsomely interwoven with the heart appeal to find in the search for God which these books disclose, the real test of spiritual hunger, that saturated as we are with the Christian doctrine of truth, we are captivated. Dr. Saunders is no rhapsodic idealist. He is thoughtful, penetrating, deeply devout. We can admire him; we can love him. His heart is large, his sympathies universal. He is not writing alone from the perspective of an interested scholar, but with the soul-burning to do justice to the millions of the un-Christianized who are seekers after God.

And our spirits go out to him as he throws the searchlight upon the Fourth Christian Gospel, discovering in it the superlative ideal, the truly energizing power for the transfiguration of life. Our hearts warm as he unfolds the dynamic truth of the Resurrection of our Lord. While the founders of religious thought in the East were contemplative, spiritually-minded, they moved from beneath to above. The challenging claim of our Christian faith is that it is from above, coming down with the very breath of a longing God, who through the Son of His love awakened, by His Holy Spirit, the dormant possibilities of the new life which is the prerogative of the Resurrected Son of God to impart, to all believers.

Further, the persistent contention of the Apostles of the Christian faith was that it is a testimony. And that it is the testimony of God (1 Cor. 2:1; 1:6; 2 Tim. 1:8; Rev. 19:10). While the Eastern savants were steeping themselves in a speculative philosophy as to God, the revelation of God was conferred through the Son of God (Matt. 11:25-27). And He insisted, ere He left His disciples, that this unveiling of Himself and His Father could be known by them only when the Holy Spirit of promise should come upon them. And the otherwise incomprehensible transformation of character effected in those disciples, rendering a company of craven cowards, ignorant and unlettered, the base from which the stream of eternal life has ever since flowed with unabated force. The Gospel for India, therefore, as the prospectus of the book declares, "God as eternal reason and love, as manifested in the historic Jesus . . at once fulfils the noblest aspirations of Asia and corrects her inveterate tendency to vagueuness and pantheism". And we may add that Asia will never know the true Jesus, until the merely earthly attached to that wonderful Person is lost in the sublime fact of His glorifying Resurrection and all that flows from that august event.

We may more than commend the book. Those who are trained in subtle analogies will welcome it as affording a more than merely comparative study of the problem. As a thesaurus of Oriental religious thought it will be a treasure in any library. As a stimulus to deeper conviction regarding our Christian confession it will be heartwarming. Though we shall not fully agree with all that the author cites as "the fetters of the temporal and the accidental" attached to the Gospel of St. John, we can admire his noble spirit and cherish his unselfish ambition that Asia, which he must love with deep affection, shall by means of his message, come to know the truth "as the truth is in Jesus".

PRESENT-DAY DILEMMAS IN RELIGION: By Charles W. Gilkey, D. D. Cokesbury Press. $1.50.

Broadmindedness that does not compromise truth is a principal virtue. Much present-day breadth of point of view possesses a flavor of looseness, and tends toward general degeneration. Mr. Gilkey, in discussing some of the dilemmas in religion, reveals himself as one having a broad understanding, and at the same time highly rigid concepts of the truth exemplified by Christ. This book, containing the lectures given by Mr. Gilkey before Vanderbilt University, is enlightening and inspiring.

The theme of the lectures is simple: the problems in religion do not always involve decisions as to whether a certain idea should be accepted or rejected, but frequently involve decisions that both a specific idea and its apparent converse should be accepted, for really they supplement each other and are not antithetical. To use an elementary illustration, life brings both joy and sorrow; its nature is not to bring either joy or sorrow.

The thesis is developed in six chapters. First, Mr. Gilkey tells how false dilemmas sometimes arise, that is, the choice is not really between opposites, but is of both of the alternatives, for they complete each other. Second, the acceptance both of new things and of old things is proposed, in place of the acceptance of either one. Neither alone provides a complete life. Third, the necessity is presented of including in our lives both those things of practical service and those things having to do with our soul-life. Either one taken alone does not give us full expression of our life. Fourth, the supplementation of the reality of things and their significance is noted, the value of both quantity and quality in life. Fifth, the fact of the parallelism of the importance of the individual and of the group is presented; Mr. Gilkey realized the problem inherent in this situation, and with true wisdom stated, "It is significant that Jesus based His assurance of the ultimate reconciliation of these often apparently conflicting poles of life upon His faith in God, whose love goes out to each child of His as if He were the only one, and whose redemptive purposes include the common life of all men no less than the individual welfare of each".

Sixth and last, Mr. Gilkey presents the theme of being "in the world, but not of it". This involves both an honest appreciation of the actual objective world and also a consciousness as to what life is all about. The latter is a compass by which we direct ourselves in every-day living.

The author's simple, effective, style causes the book to be easy to understand, and the subject matter presented is beautiful and inspiring. These factors recommend it to all readers, both clergy and laymen.

APPROVAL.

Mr. Editor:

Last night your editorial in The Southern Churchman of March 24, was read aloud to a party of five by my wife at my sister's home. We all thought it was splendid, both as to subject matter and as to style.

Here's success to you in your onslaughts against the "Modernists"! The traitors should either shut up or get out of the Church whose doctrines they have promised, as you say, to preach and to teach.

Wm. M. Jones.

A REQUEST.

Mr. Editor:

I should be glad to hear from any clergyman who has received requests from a certain publisher in Boston for MSS. for publication. I am in difficulties with this publisher, having submitted a MS., he asking for so much money to publish the book. I have paid him $200.00 on his promise in writing to put the book in hands at once, last August, but I can get neither proofs nor MS. back from this man. I understand it is a custom of his to try and get the clergy to pay so much and then when an action is brought, gets out of the liability by saying, through a third-rate lawyer, that the book is in the press.

"CHURCHMAN IN DISTRESS."

Mr. Editor:

In the issue of the "Living Church" of April 14, under the title of "Churchmen in Distress", appears an editorial which affords a concrete and most striking illustration and justification of the charge so often made by the writer in these columns as to the disingenuous character of statements emanating from the "Anglo-Catholic" Party in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Moreover, this editorial demonstrates another charge made by the writer, that the Romanizing Party, driven to hay, resorts to abuse, because it can find no arguments upon which to support its attempt to overturn the doctrine of the Church.

Some of the assertions contained in this editorial are trully remarkable. For instance, it is said:

> "It is now proposed only that they (Articles of Religion) be omitted from the Prayer Book, though continuing to be established."

Is it possible that the "Living Church" can believe that any such statement as this will be credited by thoughtful laymen?

The Journal of the 1925 session of the General Convention shows that the resolution to omit the Articles from the Prayer Book (to be acted upon finally next October) does not provide for their publication anywhere else. Any one with the intelligence of an average ten-year-old school boy knows what that means.

Then, if the Articles are to still remain "established", if the resolution passes, that means that they would still remain a part of the doctrinal law of the Church. Why, therefore, remove them from the Prayer Book?

Does the "Living Church" think for a moment that any man or woman of even ordinary intelligence will swallow anything of that sort?

The editorial in question, speaking of the memorial to the General Convention, asking it to vote down the resolution to drop the Articles of Religion (and which is now sweeping the country) then says:

> "The inference running through the present memorial is that the proposal to omit the Articles is part of an 'organized movement within the Protestant Episcopal Church to adopt some of the doctrines and forms of worship now observed in the Roman Catholic Church'."

Correct. Not only is this a proper inference to be drawn from the memorial, but I here and now make the direct charge that the proposal to omit the Articles from the Prayer Book is just exactly of that character, and that it is really directed at Articles 22, 25, 28 and 31; and I here and now repeat the challenge heretofore made in these columns and elsewhere to debate that question with any bishop, clergyman or layman, either in or out of the Church, at any time or place. Moreover, I will absolutely guarantee to produce documentary evidence that "Anglo-Catholics" are engaged in just exactly that very effort.

Speaking further of the memorial, the editorial proceeds:

> "Most of the people who are asked to sign will have no conception of what is really proposed and why."

Not only is this an unjustifiable and unwarranted reflection upon the intelligence and loyalty of Protestant Episcopalians; but, if they are so badly informed as to what is transpiring in their Church, let us see who is primarily responsible therefor.

The Constitutional law of the Church requires that when such a change in the doctrine of the Church as that now proposed is to be made, the notice which the Secretary of the General Convention sends to the Secretary of each Diocesan Convention shall be made known to the Diocesan Convention at its next meeting after receipt of such notice. I challenge "Anglo-Catholic" bishops, clergy and laity to tell the readers of the "Southern Churchman" in how many dioceses this notice was made known to the Diocesan Convention at its next meeting after receipt of the notice, or, in fact, made known to the Diocesan Conventions at all. Why was this explicit requirement of the Constitutional law of the Church ignored? WHY?

Why is it that the bishops and clergy of the Church have refrained from telling the people in the pews candidly and plainly what is proposed in connection with the Articles of Religion, and why such a proposal is advanced? Is it that the medieval idea that the bishops and clergy are to rule the Church and that the laity are to have no voice, has so far pervaded our bishopric and clergy that they assume to keep from the laity knowledge of the fact that fundamental changes are proposed in the doctrine and worship of the Church?

If the people are so ignorant of conditions in their Church as to be unable to understand what they are doing when they sign this memorial, where does the responsibility therefor rest? Let some "Anglo-Catholic" bishop, clergyman or layman answer that question.

The editorial further says:

> "This whole memorial movement seems to us a carefully prepared appeal to prejudice. . . . We could wish that those who oppose it (the resolution to abrogate the Articles of Religion) would discuss it on its merits and not by this horrid campaign of innuendo, of fostering suspicions and of suggesting treachery."

If this memorial, seeking to arouse the people to the attempt to completely alter the doctrine and worship of the Church is an appeal to prejudice, then be it so.

I deny that Protestant Episcopalians are proceeding by way of innuendo or of fostering suspicions. They have made direct, specific charges, which have never been answered by any "Anglo-Catholic" yet.

When Protestant Episcopalians find that the Constitution of their Church has established the Articles of Religion; when they find that these Articles condemn the Mass, Reservation and Adoration of the Sacrament, worship of Images and Relics, Invocation of Saints, the doctrine of the real presence, etc.; when they find that the Constitution requires that bishops and clergy shall make a solemn promise to conform to the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Church; when they find that these same bishops and clergy, notwithstanding Constitutional provisions and in violation of their consecration oath, have introduced into the Church all of these inhibited doctrines and practices, and are now engaged in an effort to overturn the Constitution itself, they begin to ask themselves whether this spells treachery. And, if these things do spell treachery, where does the burden rest? Let some "Anglo-Catholic" bishop, clergyman or layman answer that question.

When it comes to suggesting that the question be discussed on its merits, I heartily join. What is the question? Here it is: is it the purpose of the "Anglo-Catholic" Party, in undertaking to do away with the Articles of Religion, to really get rid of the twenty-second, twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth and thirty-first Articles and to introduce into the Church the doctrines and ceremonies which those Articles condemn? THAT IS THE REAL QUESTION, and I here and now again offer to debate that question with any bishop, clergyman or layman either in or out of the Church, anywhere or at any time.

Yes, the memorial is being widely circulated. It is arousing indignation and resentment among loyal Protestant Episcopalians at the attempt to convert their Church into something alien to its Constitution and doctrine and worship as the Church has all of these years represented the same to its peoople. The people are not quite as ignorant as the "Living Church" suggests, and thousands of them are affixing their signatures to the memorial with full knowledge and understanding of what they are doing.

And it looks as though the day of reckoning with those who have assumed to defy the Constitution and law of the Church is fasting approaching.

"BIBLE LEADERS."

Mr. Editor:

I must write you a few words of thanks for printing our "Brief", but especially for your vigorous defense of "the faith once for all delivered". Your article of March 24 on "Bible Leaders", with its strong and outspoken condemnation of men who, while pledged to "the defense and confirmation of the Gospel", are doing their utmost to undermine its foundation, is refreshing and greatly needed.

This is all the more important as coming from a layman. The reverend brother who is editor of the transformed New York "Churchman", is my neighbor in charge of a mission parish which I started twenty-five years ago, and it is a source of regret to me that it should be in the hands of one who holds such views and gives practically no time to the chief need of the Church there, namely, pastoral care.

(Sgd) Walker Gwynne.

THANK YOU.

Mr. Editor:

I have just finished reading my paper of March 24, and must thank you for your able defence of "The Faith that was once delivered to the Saints".

It is fortunate that the editor and owner of the "Southern Churchman" is not only a Christian, but also a lawyer. Your "Brief" in reply to the N. Y. Churchman is fine—your arraignment of Dr. Reiland unanswerable! I trust the plausible and wily Dr. Morehouse realizes that he has encountered a snag in his efforts to revise the Prayer Book and exclude from its pages the revered "Thirty-nine Articles", which are almost the foundation of our beloved old Church. Perhaps I speak too plainly, but you know there is such a thing as a righteous indignation! In reading of the Work of the Modernists, I often think of those lines in Campbell's "Pleasures of Hope":

"Oh! Star-eyed Science, thou hast wandered far
To waft us home this message of despair"—

then he speaks so beautifully of the Christian's hope, etc.

With best wishes for your success in your good work, I am,

Cordially yours,

Mrs. I. B. S.,

"A Virginian of the Valley".

WORTH EVEN MORE.

Mr. Editor:

I see in The Southern Churchman you are offering the children of the Church a very generous way in which to help make their Lenten money. I am sending you a check for $3.50 and please apply $2 of it on my subscription and the other I want to send as I have been getting The Southern Churchman for some time and I feel it is worth even more than regular price asked for it. I gave my little girl the dollar on the subscription to put in her mite box.

I am so glad to see you fight so to retain the Thirty-nine Articles in the Prayer Book and wish you a great victory for us all.

INDISPENSABLE.

Mr. Editor:

I wish to thank you for your unflinching stand for Protestantism in our beloved Church. I have been a subscriber to your valued paper for many years, and it has become an indispensable part of my weekly reading, and with every number received. I say, "Thank God for The Southern Churchman"!

Very sincerely yours.

SEEMS SAD.

Mr. Editor:

I have read with great interest the many letters for and against the revision of our Prayer Book, and am glad to see the opinion of such men as Mr. Page of Virginia, and Dr. Tomkins of Philadelphia.

I wonder why more of the laity do not protest in a body, for every one I have met with, does not approve of the changes.

It does seem sad that in one church the seats are vacant, which a few years ago were filled with worshippers, whose parents and grand-parents worshipped before them, because the rector introduces something crude and unusual.

I heard from the pulpit of our church, that "The Church had been mistaken, and now would teach new ideas: that it was only a few old fogies who would not see it". In defence of the same "old fogies", I know them to be quite up-to-date, and very progressive, and intelligent, too much so to approve of these changes. Instead of imitating the Roman Catholic Church, why do not the people go over to that Church?

In the Gloria in excelsis, as regards the clause, "Thou that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us", being repeated twice always, seems to me very impressive, and I hardly think of it as a printer's error, when we remember that it was written before the printing press was invented.

TRUE.

Mr. Editor:

I read your articles in the Churchman with great interest. What you say of the New York Churchman is perfectly true, and I am glad you lit into Dr. Reiland. Your position is unassailable. If they do not believe in the Church, why do they stay in it?

You write with great courage and vigor. Read many paragraphs aloud to ————————, and he was delighted.

You don't seek to limit any man's views, but you believe only Episcopalians should remain inside the Church. So do I.

Faithfully yours,

IN REPLY TO MR. HARVEY.

Mr. Editor:

In your issue of March 24, the Rev. Ernest L. Harvey disagrees with a statement credited to the Bishop of North Texas in reference to state taxation for the Church of England.

Mr. Harvey says: "The Church of England is not, nor never has been, supportel by taxation." This is news. The Church Rate, for example, which was not repealed until 1868. The Encyclopedia Americana, referring to the Church Rate, says: "Though applicable for repairs to parish churches only, was requirable from parishioners of all religious denominations." I don't know what this could be called but a tax.

However, I leave the historical controversy in abler hands and wish to protest against what, to me, are half truths in Mr. Harvey's letter. In my opinion the statement of a half truth is more damaging than falsehood.

He says the Deposited Book "is today favored by the bulk of members of the Church of England, laity as well as clergy". If this were true, would our conservative English brethren be protesting against practices, now illegally held, but authorized in the Deposited Book, to the point of even breaking up church services?

The fact is that the Deposited Book passed the Bishops by a good majority, with some explaining they voted for it, not because they favored it, but to preserve peace. It passed the clergy, by a smaller majority, and many of them explained they voted for it to preserve peace. It passed the laity by the skin of its covers. It is reasonable to assume that many of them, likewise, voted to preserve peace! Even the venerable Archbishop of Canterbury stated that he was not satisfied with some of the changes, but he thought it necessary to make concessions! The office of Archbishop does not carry with it any degree of infallibility. It is quite possible for an Archbishop to be entirely earnest and sincere and patriotic, yet make a huge blunder. I believe the majority of the laity (English and American) feel that if Church doctrine must blow to the winds of expediency, they would prefer some more stable doctrines!

Cordially,

W. G. Hastings.

"THE GREAT MAGDALENS."

Mr. Editor:

Looking over the Book Review column of The Southern Churchman of February 18, I noted the publication of a book bearing the above title, by the Rev. Hugh Francis Blunt (with very appropriate remarks by the Reviewer).

I have never been able to learn on what grounds Mary of Magdala came to be identified with the "woman who was in the city, a sinner", and who was one of those women who anointed the Lord Jesus (Luke 7:36-39, 47-50).

The name of the "woman who was in the city, a sinner", is not recorded in the New Testament; all we know of her is recorded by St. Luke.

There are four "Marys" mentioned in the Gospels, Mary, the Mother of Jesus (John 19:25); Mary, wife of Cleophas (John 19:25); Mary, sister of Lazarus (John 11:1, 2; 12:3); Mary, Magdalene (Mark 16:9; Luke 8:2).

Jesus was anointed by two women: Mary, sister of Lazarus (John 12:3; Matt. 26:6, 7), and the "woman who was in the city". The former anointing took place in Bethany, Judea; while the latter took place in Nain, Galilee (Luke 7:11, 36-38).

All that is recorded of Mary Magdalene is that Jesus had delivered her from demoniacal influence (Mark 16:9; Luke 8:2). She was one of the most faithful disciples of Christ, being amongst the last at the cross, and first at the tomb. John 19:25; 20:1). She was eminently honored by being commissioned by the risen Lord as the first missionary of the gospel (John 20:11-18).

Of the "woman who was in the city", the Rev. Dr. Edersheim, former Rabbi, well says: "We understand the infinite delicacy that left her unnamed; and we mark in contrast the coarse clumsiness which, without any reason, to meet the cravings of morbid curiosity or for saint worship, has associated her history with the name of Mary Magdalene. There is not a tittle of evidence for it."

In this connection the exhortation of St. Paul is particularly appropriate: "Whatsoever things are true, etc., think on these things." (Phil. 4:8.)

TANTAMOUNT TO A RESOLUTION?

Mr. Editor:

It appears that I have been singularly obtuse in failing to take in the significance of that much discussed resolution of Mr. Morehouse in regard to the Thirty-nine Articles. In a recent contribution to the discussion, I referred to it as a proposal to remove the Articles altogether from the formularies of the Church whereas, in your issue of March 17, the author of the resolution himself hastens to correct this error, and to say that if there was any one thing that he endeavored to make plain when presenting the motion, it was that he had no intention of asking that they be removed altogether from the formularies of the Church, but only from the Prayer Book. I was not present when Mr. Morehouse offered the resolution, and I freely confess that I did not understand that its purpose was merely to remove the Articles from the Prayer Book, while simultaneously providing for their continued preservation elsewhere in the formularies of the Church. I am delighted to hear that this was all that was really contemplated, and to have the assurance of that fact from no less an authority than Mr. Morehouse himself. But the real point at issue is not what Mr. Morehouse had in mind, or even what he said about the resolution when explaining it to the Convention, but what the Resolution itself actually provides. Am I to understand that the Resolution itself provides for the preservation of the Articles elsewhere in the formularies of the Church? If so, I can only say that I find no such "provision" in the wording of the Resolutions as, I am reliably informed, it appears on p. 422 of the Journal of the Convention, nor again in the substance of that Resolution certified to by the Rev. Carroll M. Davis, Secretary of the House of Deputies, on p. 7 (14a) of the work entitled "Proposed Amendments to the Prayer Book 1925", issued by the "Morehouse Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis". And is not a Resolution which calls for the removal of the Articles from an existing formulary of this Church, but which makes no explicit provision for their preservation, or their incorporation elsewhere in any other formulary, tantamount to a Resolution to remove them altogether from the formularies of the Church? Is it not a fact that if no such formal provision is made in the Resolution itself, that (in the event that they are removed from the Prayer Book) they will under the terms of that Resolution, neither be bound in a separate volume as a recognized formulary of the Church, nor duly transferred to and incorporated in any other existing formulary, and so will be altogether eliminated from the formularies of the Church? Again, therefore, I ask—what provision was made in the wording of the Resolution itself for the continued preservation of the Articles in the formularies of this Church after they should have been removed from the one formulary that has hitherto embodied them? Did the Resolution provide for their publication in a separate volume as a further recognized formulary of this Church; or did it provide for their transfer to some other already existing formulary? And if the latter disposition was the one suggested, I should like further to inquire to which of the existing formularies were they to be consigned? Was it provided that they be incorporated in the Constitution of the Church? Or was it the Canons that were chosen as the proper instrument for their preservation. Surely it was not the Hymnal. Once more, I repeat—I was not present when Mr. Morehouse offered his Resolution, and do not claim to know what he said in defence or explanation of it, but unless he is prepared to show that the actual wording of his Resolution called for the continued preservation of the Articles elsewhere in the formularies of the Church, and was not simply a demand for their removal from the Prayer Book, I contend that his proposal was tantamount to a proposal to remove the Thirty-nine Articles altogether from the formularies of this Church; and this, no matter what may have been in his mind at the time, or what he may have further remarked in subsequently discussing his proposition before the House. It is the actually recorded wording of the Resolution with which the Convention has to deal, and not only ironical explanation or commentary thereon, even though offered by the author of the Resolution himself, which must be officially considered and acted upon.

But while I cannot but maintain that any Resolution to remove the Articles from the Prayer Book, which is not further qualified in the manner above stated, spells their elimination from the formularies of the Church, I am happy to be informed that Mr. Morehouse had no such intention in making his proposal—that he did not design "either the repeal or the repudiation of the Articles" (black mine), as our existing "Articles of Religion . . . established by the Bishops, the Clergy, and the Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church",, and further declared by Article X of the Constitution to be an integral part of our existing ecclesiastical Law; and that, consequently, he has evidently been misquoted as saying before "The Catholic Club of Chicago" that he desired that the Articles "be not accepted as statements of the Policy of the English Church of today, but relegated to their proper sphere, that is, as historical evidences of days gone by"—as "obsolete records of past Church history" (Chronicle, March, 1928, Pp. 166, 167). It was statements of this kind—erroneously imputed to him—which have naturally lent still further color to the impression that he did desire to "repeal" and "repudiate" the Articles—removing them from their existing position as part of our ecclesiastical Law and as the established Articles of our Religion—and did desire to have them eliminated altogether from our existing Formularies, and banished to the limbo of "obsolete records of past Church history". Not that I ever imagined that he contemplated the total destruction of these memorials of the past. On the contrary, I felt quite sure that his own love for the "obsolete" theology of Rome and the Middle Ages would at least see to it that these "archaic" and "obsolete" expressions of the doctrinal views of the Anglican Reformers, would not wholly perish in oblivion. Precisely what means he would have adopted to insure their memory, I confess I can only conjecture. Possibly a certified copy of the Articles was to be chained to the walls of our "National Cathedral', and possibly even Fond du Lac was eventually to be induced to erect a monument to the sincere, though sadly mistaken, authors of this "quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore". I would not presume to say. Of one thing only was I certain, viz.: that any such attempt to relegate them to the depository for "obsolete records of past Church history"—some museum of ecclesiastical antiquities—is hardly synonymous with retaining them in the existing formularies of this Church.

I am glad to know, however, that such was not the intention of Mr. Morehouse, and that, however he and I may differ both in regard to the advisability and real effect of his Resolution, as it has been reliably reported, at least he did not intend to advise that the Articles be either repealed, or repudiated, or stricken from the formularies of this Church, and so did NOT intend that they be consigned forever to the "obsolete records of past Church history".

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES.

Mr. Editor:

Can I get one hundred copies of "Plain Bible Studies" as printed on page 7 of the issue of The Southern Churchman for March 31? I would like to have five hundred copies to send out "with a mission".

I am sure that all these mountain people would study the truths set forth in the Studies and take great interest in looking up the references.

I enclose a stamp for reply.

Fraternally yours,

(Sgd) W. R. Savage.

P. S.—By the way, let me congratulate you on the wonderfully "orthodox" and old-time religious paper, "more like The Southern Churchman of my father's day than any time since then".

SEND A NEW DELEGATION.

Mr. Editor:

It seems to be admitted on all sides now that a grievous mistake was made by the Virginia delegation, when, at the last General Convention, they voted to remove the Thirty-nine Articles from the Prayer Book. This the members of the delegation, as we understand, themselves freely admit.

The whys and wherefors of this error of judgment need not now be inquired into. An error readily admitted and fraught with hurt and harm to our beloved Church should be corrected at the first possible moment. That will be at the next General Convention in Washington, when the Resolution to remove the Thirty-nine Articles from the Prayer Book comes up for action and approval. A strong and determined effort is on foot to defeat, at that time, the Resolution to throw the Articles out of the Prayer Book, and to stem the tide which the Virginia delegation helped to set up by their unhappy vote to eliminate the Articles from the Prayer Book.

That being true, could the Virginia delegation who voted for the Resolution to remove the Articles from the Prayer Book consistently vote and work against a Resolution which by their votes was adopted?

That being true, should the members of that delegation, which so voted, embarrass their friends by asking them to send them to Washington?

Should they not frankly say that having made the error they will stand aside and let others try to undo the harm they have done?

If Virginia is now to do her best to withstand this onslaught on the Prayer Book, is not a delegation ot new and tried men imperative?

And this we must do, not as a rebuke to our friends, who composed the delegation and who cast the vote of Virginia for the Resolution to thus mutilate the Prayer Book, but as notice to all concerned that Virginia comes to the General Convention through her representatives not apologetically but comes into the fray in defiant mood and is ready to fight to the last ditch to keep in the Prayer Book these bulwarks of safety placed there by our ecclesiastical forbears as matters of record to all who care to read that the Protestant Episcopal Church stands four-square against all "strange and erroneous doctrine", particularly now being propagated by the aneamic imitators of Rome, the so-called Anglo-Catholic Party.

"SELF-CONCEIT, IGNORANCE AND ERROR OF THE NEW YORK CHURCHMAN."

Mr. Editor:

Your contemporary, The Churchman, protests your list of scholars. In his criticism of your list, the Editor intimates that there are no conservative scholars. But what the Editor really means, no doubt, is that he does not travel in the circles where such scholarship may be found. And he commits an editorial blunder of no small proportions when he assumes that his ignorance of their existence must be an indication that they do not exist.

Your list, small though it was, contained the names of thoroughly competent scholars. Manning, Gray, Hague and Howitt are names which represent conservatism and sound scholarship. Probably any one of them is as well known as is H. S. Coffin. Furthermore, every one but the Editor of the Churchman will recognize the fact that your list was merely suggestive. Your contemporary seemed to want to know whether there was any Conservatives who could have qualified as special lecturer at the Seminary. You answered him fairly by suggesting four representative names. A few hundred might have been suggested. May we suggest one?

Robert Dick Wilson (perhaps The Churchman staff knows him not) is one whom you might have mentioned. Permit us to quote from the Foreword of a recent booklet by Dr. Wilson. The Foreword was written by one who interviewed Dr. Wilson:

> "He learned Greek, Latin, Portuguese, Biblical Aramaic, Syriac, Arabic, . . .
> "He could not at that time learn Babylonian in America, so he went to Heidelberg, determined to know every language that would enable him the better to understand the Scriptures, and to make his investigations in original documents.
> "So to Babylonian he added Ethiopic, Phoenician, and all the Aramaic dialects, and Egyptian, Coptic, Persian, and Armenian. He studied in Berlin with Schrader, who was Delitzsch's teacher called the father of Assyriology. He studied Arabic and Syriac under Sachau, and Arabic under Jahn and Dieterichi; Hebrew under Dillman and Strack, and Egyptian under Brugsch. He became conversant with some twenty-six languages in these years devoted to language acquisition."

Now Dr. Wilson is a Conservative. Dr. Nelson, of the Virginia Seminary reviewed (?) Dr. Wilson's recent book, called, I think, "A Scientific Investigation in the Old Testament". Dr. Nelson did not care for the book. The review did not really indicate whether or not Dr. Nelson had read the book. He dropped it as though it were something too hot for him to handle. He simply threw some ashes in the air, and soundly denounced the man who would presume to be so orthodox It was not a review, but a tirade.

But will either the Editor of The Churchman, or Dr. Nelson state his comparative competency to speak authoritatively on the Old Testament? We doubt whether either will venture to do so.

Tell your brother Editor that "scholar" and "scoffer" are not synonymous. He hasn't found it out.

God be praised for The Southern Churchman!

THE PETITION.

Mr. Editor:

I am inclosing the petition with regard to Prayer Book revision signed by myself and two cousins from Christ Church, Winchester, Va. We are vitally in earnest in signing this petition and pray God our Church may be saved from those who would destroy her simple faith.

Brought up in Christ Church, Winchester, Va., under a godly rector and friend, the Rev. Nelson Page Dame, confirmed by Bishop Randolph, and later transferred to the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, under dear Dr. McKim's rectorate, you can see there is real sincerity in my signature to this petition.

Although I don't know Dr. Morris personally, he is a great joy and inspiration to me at Epiphany. He is a true link with the past as I know it. That means much in these days!

We thank God that The Southern Churchman lives,

Most sincerely,

PASSED TO LIFE ETERNAL: RT. REV. HENRY BAIRD DELANEY, D. D., RT. REV. JOSEPH S. MOTODA, D. D.

As we go to press announcement has been received of the death of two bishops.

The Rt. Rev. Henry Baird Delaney, D. D., Suffragan Bishop of the Diocese of North Carolina, passed to life eternal Saturday night, April 14, at St. Augustine's College, Raleigh, N. C.

Bishop Delaney was born at St. Mary's, Ga., on February 5, 1858. He was ordained Deacon in 1889, Priest in 1892 by Bishop Lyman. Shaw University conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1911. On November 21, 1918, he was consecrated Suffragan Bishop by Bishops Cheshire, Tucker, Darst, Weed, Horner, Lloyd and Demby.

Bishop Delaney was formerly a member of the Commission for Work Among Colored People from 1889-1904. From 1889-1908 he served as Vice-Principal of St. Augustine's School, Raleigh, N. C. In 1908 he became Archdeacon for Work Among Colored People in North Carolina.

The Rt. Rev. Joseph S. Motoda, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Tokyo in the "Nippon Sei Ko Kwai", the Holy Catholic Church in Japan, died suddenly of heart failure on the afternoon of April 16, in St. Barnabas' Hospital, Osaka, Japan.

Bishop Motoda was present at our last General Convention held in New Orleans. This was the first time that a Bishop of any national Church in the Orient had been a visitor to General Convention in the United States.

Referring to that event the Spirit of Missions at that time wrote of Bishop Motoda:

"This new member of the Episcopate has long been one of the outstanding figures in our Japan Mission. As a boy he entered St. Paul's College—now St. Paul's University—Tokyo. After graduation he came to this country, and entered Kenyon College. From there he went to the University of Pennsylvania and the Philadelphia Divinity School, graduating from each with high honors. In 1896 he was ordained by the late Bishop Whitaker and returned to Japan, where he became headmaster of St. Paul's University.

Bishop Motoda is one of the recognized authorities on educational matters in Japan. His work at St. Paul's attracted so much attention that the Japanese Department of Education sent him to the United States three years ago to attend a conference of educators as their representative. His influence among his fellow-countrymen has lain in the fact that he has always endeavored to impress on them the truth—to use his own words—'that behind education there must be a spiritual force, namely, religion'. His consecration in December, 1923, marked a new era in the history of Christianity in Japan."

Bishop Motoda was the first Japanese Bishop of Tokyo.

Backs Jonah Story By Citing History.

The New York Times reports the following:

That Jonah could easily have been swallowed by a whale and survived in the stomach of the "great fish" as narrated in the Bible is maintained by the Rev. Dr. Ambrose John Wilson, of Queens College, Oxford, who declares in a recent number of the Princeton Theological Review that biological and historical facts prove his contention.

According to the noted British scholar and lecturer at Oxford, "physiological tests entirely disprove the alleged impossibility of the story". Writing in the form of a scientific investigation of the facts in the case, Dr. Wilson applies both physiological and historical evidence to prove the truth of the literal narration of the Bible.

"It is shown by study of the structure of the sperm whale and its habits that it is perfectly possible for a man to be swallowed alive and after an interval vomited up again, also for him to remain alive for two or three days within the whale," his article states. "Historical tests show that a similar event has happened in later times in at least one case.

His article follows in part:

"There are few stories in the Bible which have been subjected to more adverse criticism than that of Jonah and the 'Great Fish', rightly interpreted, no doubt, to mean the greatest fish of all, the whale.

"The great fish in question would be the sperm whale or cachalot, the species which inhabits the southern waters where Jonah was voyaging. It attains a very large size and may measure from fifty to seventy to eighty feet in length.

"The head is about one-third of the length of the body, very massive, high and truncated in front. It will not, therefore, be considered exorbitant if we postulate for Jonah a whale sixty feet long, with a mouth twenty feet in length, also fifteen feet in height and nine feet in width."

As for the popular criticism that the "whale's esophagus or gullet is too small", Dr. Wilson asserts that "this is not a question of calculated possibilities, but of recorded facts. The sperm whale subsists for the most part on the octopus, the bodies of which, far larger than the body of a man, have been found whole in its stomach. The manager of a whaling station in the extreme north of Britain stated that the largest thing they had found in a whale was the skeleton of a shark, sixteen feet long".

In actual historical fact at least two other men have been swallowed by whales and survived, according to Dr. Wilson. Referring to a story, told by Sir Francis Fox of such an example in 1891, Dr. Wilson tells of a man who was swallowed by a whale, and was not found until almost two days later, when the whalers were cutting up the carcass of the monster. This man remained two weeks a raving lunatic due to his harrowing experience, but was finally restored to normal life again.

Another example of where a whale swallowed a sailor, bit out part of a ship and then vomited the man on to the wreckage of the small vessel, is told by Dr. Wilson as another instance of historical evidence. The story of this event was narrated in the "Boston Post Boy" in its issue of October 4, 1771.

Dr. Wilson's contention goes to show that although the temperature would be very high in the whale's stomach and the gastric juice might prove very obnoxious, still evidence proves that life within the stomach of the whale is possible.

A Word From the Presiding Bishop.

We are rapidly approaching the threshold of a new Triennium in our forward movement as a living constituent member of the universal Christian Church.

That we may cross that threshold worthily and enter upon the work waiting us beyond wisely and well is our common desire and, please God, also our determination.

To this end, on Wednesday, October 10 next, through the medium of our one hundred and fifty-one Bishops, six hundred and fifty Clerical and Lay Deputies, National Council Departments, Woman's Auxiliary, and other numerous affiliated Agencies, we will assemble in Washington to wait upon God, and under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, confer together for the welfare of our future endeavor and achievement.

Meet and right it is that under Church auspices, the nations of the world should come from North and South, East and West, to sit down in the capital city of a Christian country, mighty among the mightiest, to take thought of the affairs of the Kingdom of Heaven, and plan action for the rule and reign of that Kingdom upon earth.

From Jerusalem, Judaea, Samaria, and the uttermost parts of the earth shall we come, and thousands of our brethren of other religious affiliations will be interested in and influenced by our deliberations and determinations.

We are living in a day of the greatest need and opportunity for righteous accomplishment that earth has ever known. All things are now ready. We must invade and occupy this immediate sphere of possibility and promise, panoplied with Divine power to use all our ability and possessions for the salvation of this present waiting, wanting world.

In the prosecution of our Divinely established vocations, for us, individually and collectively, the Way is open to discover and know the Truth that will make us free to enjoy and propagate the Life that is the Light of men.

Welcome, then, the occasion, welcome the opportunity, welcome the duty, the discharge of which is our obligation as true followers of Christ and living exponents of His gracious power. Welcome to Bishops, Deputies, Woman's Auxiliary, and all other cooperating Agencies, to the privileges, prerogatives, and particularly the dutiful discharge of the obligations of our common calling in Christ Jesus.

And that we all may be blessed beyond our fondest hopes and desires, and God's will wrought through us, we will not, I am sure, forget that the Pentecostal Benediction came upon a people expectant, because they had asked, and had continued in asking, that they might receive.

I am praying that we may be likewise blessed, and ask you, my dear Fathers in God, and brethren all, to pray with me now and with persevering continuance to the end that in the world of our Convention we may be so directed, sanctified and governed by the mighty power of the Holy Ghost that the comfortable Gospel of Christ may be truly preached, truly received, and truly followed in all places, to the breaking down of the Kingdom of sin, satan and death; and to the establishment of righteousness, the enthronement of Divine Glory, and the realization of universal human salvation unto everlasting life.

Church Summer Schools.

More than fifty Church Summer Schools, Conferences and Camps are scheduled this year for June, July and August. They begin with the Church Conference for Colored People at Raleigh, N. C., opening on May 28, and the Young People's Conference at Salina, Kan., on June 7, and run steadily on to the Oriental Students' Conference at Racine, closing September 14. Every Province has at least three. Sewanee Province has thirteen. New ventures this year are the Olympia Summer School at Tacoma, June 22-July 3, and Camp Cheshire for Boys and Camp Penick for Girls, at Lake Lure, N. C. The Dallas Conference, which has heretofore been almost entirely diocesan, is widened to include neighboring dioceses. It would be difficult, probably impossible, to find any phase of Church work even in its widest terms that may not be studied somewhere during the summer, in courses specially prepared for the young, the old, the clergy, the other Church workers, and the interested laity, men and women. Even the uninterested would cease to be so if they attended.

Ought to be Used by the Church.

Three Colored women expect to graduate next June from the Bishop Tuttle Training School at Raleigh, N. C. Miss Bertha Richards, dean of the school, writes: "We are concerned to find positions for them in Church work, if possible. The Public Welfare people are waiting for them with impatience, but two of them especially ought to find their work in the Church. They are trained in modern methods of social work, case work, etc., and have studied in the college classes here at St. Augustine's and in Bible classes, and have had experience in home management. . . . They will be fitted to organize and develop Church Schools, to teach and to train teachers, to carry on clubs, and to deal with and understand the social and spiritual problems presented by the dependent and delinquent of their race."

Getting Ready Locally for "Los Angeles —1928".

Hundreds of important items must be attended to in preparing for the coming of more than 7,000 delegates to the Tenth Convention of the World's Sunday School Association, which will be held in Los Angeles, July 11-18. The committee in Los Angeles that is caring for all the major and minor items involved in being host, has for its chairman, the Rev. R. B. von KleinSmid, D. D., LL. D., President of the University of Southern California. Dr. W. C. Pearce, General Secretary of the Southern California Sunday School Council of Religious Education, is the Vice-Chairman and in active charge of all the work.

Fifteen committees are cooperating in making every possible provision in accordance with Southern Californian hospitality so that the sojourn of the delegates from literally the ends of the earth may be a real delight. The number of delegates who have already paid the required $5 registration fee is rapidly approaching 2,000. In some localities, the assigned quotas have already been reached. Admission will be by badge and it is important that registration be made at once through the respective State Sunday School Association or Council of Religious Education, Application can also be made to the International Council of Religious Education, 1516 Mallers Building, Chicago, or to the World's Sunday School Association, 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York City. The fee of $5 will entitle each delegate to all Convention privileges and also to the printed report of approximately four hundred pages, which will be issued in the fall. Over fifty nations will be represented. More than thirty special trains are receiving bookings through the various State Secretaries.

Woman's Auxiliary.

As one way of preparing for their triennial meeting, officers and delegates of the Woman's Auxiliary are to have a conference at Taylor Hall, Racine, Wis., May 7 to 10. Among the subjects listed for discussion are the status of the Woman's Auxiliary; how to use the Auxiliary as a Christianizing power in the community, in relation to homes, industry, citizenship, rural life, jails; how to use the Auxiliary as an educational force; internationalism, enlisting workers, the running of branches, gifts of money, supply and life.

The Rural Workers' Fellowship.

On July 9, 1924, the Rural Workers' Fellowship was organized in Madison, Wis., at the National Conference of Rural Workers. The Fellowship was organized under the inspiration of the Rev. Oscar Meyer. It begun with twenty-eight members.

In July, 1925, the second meeting was held at the same place. The membership had grown from twenty-eight to ninety-two. At this meeting authority was given to the President and Secretary of the Organization to take the necessary steps so that the Organization would have more publicity.

In July, 1926, the third meeting of the Organization was held, and the membership had grown from ninety-two to two hundred and fifteen. And in addition the Organization had an official publication all of its own consisting of four pages, called the Rural Messenger. At this meeting the Editor was authorized to double the size of the publication.

In July, 1927, the fourth annual meeting, the Organization had grown from two hundred and fifteen members to two hundred and fifty-one members, and fifty-one additional subscribers to the publication with twenty-seven on the exchange list. In addition the Organization had a publication of eight pages.

Today the Organization has three hundred and seventy-nine members, and an additional fifty-one subscribers and a good many more on the exchange list.

The officers of the Organization feel that the Organization is making progress, as is proved by the above figures.

The organization has a threefold purpose: (1) to promote the interest of the whole ministry of the Church in Rural communities; (2) to increase the Fellowship among those interested in such service; (3) to aid the National Council in its service to the Rural Field and Workers.

Membership is open to clergy and laity, men and women. If the Episcopal Church expects to extend her borders the whole Church must join in helping to solve the Rural Problem.

You can help by becoming a member of the Organization. One dollar a year is the cost of membership, and also a subscription to the Rural Messenger, the official publication of the Organization.

The publication carries articles that deal with the spread of the Church into the Rural Districts.

Join today. Send check to the Rev. Val H. Sessions, Bolton, Miss.

One dollar invested in the Rural Workers' Fellowship today will bring untold benefits tomorrow.

Presiding Bishop Asks Prayers.

May I ask our people again to remember us in their prayers in connection with the meeting of the National Council and its Departments in New York, April 24 to 26. Appropriations for the year 1929 must be made at this meeting, and other business of importance in connection with approaching General Convention must be transacted.

John Gardner Murray,
Presiding Bishop and President of the National Council.

The Resurrection.

We quote the following words of unquestioning faith in the life everlasting ascribed to the Rt. Rev. William T. Manning, D. D., in the New York Times:

All our highest knowledge and experience, every fact of nature and of human life, points to the probability of life continued beyond the grave. Men have always felt within themselves the longing for immortality. We see the evidence of this in the pyramids of Egypt, in the legends of Greece, in the history and customs of every race. And the higher men have risen, the deeper this longing has bcome; the greater and nobler the soul, the more impossible for it to believe in its own extinction.

We cannot believe that the purpose of our creation is fulfilled by our brief existence on this earth. God has woven the hope of immortalitly into the very texture of our being. And yet, confronted with the great fact of death, this hope of the future life is inadequate and uncertain.

As we meet the deep sorrows of life, as we stand beside the new-made grave, we need something more than the speculations of philosophy or the guesses of human reason. The help that we need is given to us in Christ, the Son of God.

It is Christ who has changed hope into assurance, speculation into faith, longing into certainty.

In the risen Christ we have God's own answer to the longing which He has implanted in our souls.

The message of Christianity to the world is not a vague philosophy of the immortality of the soul.

There would have been no gospel from above in that, nothing that could have produced those results which the gospel has brought to pass in the lives of men.

It is the actual resurrection of Jesus Christ from the grave, the fact that He rose on the third day from the dead, which has brought life and hope from above, and has met the need and longing of the world.

Collect for Second Sunday After Easter.

Almighty God, Who hast given Thine only Son to be unto us both a sacrifice for sin and also an ensample of godly life; Give us grace that we may always most thankfully receive that His inestimable benefit, and also daily endeavor ourselves to follow the blessed steps of His most holy life; through the same Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. Mark's Day.

O Almighty God, Who hast instructed Thy Holy Church with the heavenly doctrine of Thy Evangelist Saint Mark; Give us grace that, being not like children carried away with every blast of vain doctrine, we may be established in the truth of Thy Holy Gospel; through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

If Easter Be Not True.

If Easter be not true,
Then all the lilies low must lie;
The Flanders poppies fade and die;
The spring must lose her fairest bloom
For Christ were still within the tomb—
If Easter be not true.

If Easter be not true,
Then faith must mount on broken wing;
Then hope no more immortal spring;
Then love must lose her mighty urge;
Life prove a phantom, death a dirge—
If Easter be not true.

If Easter be not true,
'Twere foolishness the cross to bear;
He died in vain who suffered there;
What matter though we laugh or cry,
Be good or evil, live or die,
If Easter be not true?

If Easter be not true—
But it is true, and Christ is risen!
And mortal spirit from its prison
Of sin and death with him may rise!
Worthwhile the struggle sure the prize,
Since Easter, aye, is true!

—Henry H. Barstow, in The Presbyterian Advance.

The Present Resurrection.

We remember what Donald Hankey said in those last hours which he had with his men just before the great hour came, as he walked up and down the trenches while they waited and spoke to them one by one and in little groups: "Boys, we are going over the top tomorrow. Remember, if you are wounded, it's blighty; if you are killed, it's the resurrection." Through Christ it was a legitimate inspiration to work with in that black hour. But the resurrection is not a principle that comes in the last and ultimate moment alone; the resurrection is a principle of life every hour of every day. It is the power available in men that knows no moral limits whatsoever, the power that God put forth when He raised Jesus Christ from the dead, the power by which in conquering death our Lord showed that there was not anything that He could not conquer.

There is that evil habit that comes when the fight has gone out and you lie alone. You know its face well; and you have always said when you saw it come, "Here comes my enemy that is too strong for me". Yes, but not for the power of the resurrection, the power that is adequate to deal with any foe, the power that is strong enough to nerve a man for any sacrifice, the power that is mighty enough to lift any load and break the very bars of death.

There is many a man to whom life is just a half thing. The vast deeps have not been cut open for him. Sin seems to be a venial affair. The great moral realities have never burst on him as they burst that day in one blinding vision upon Paul on the highway. Well, the power of the resurrection is adequate in the life of every one of us today to lift us out of all this half living, out of all these partial visions, out of all these toned-down fellowships, out of all these abstentions from the sufficient power of God. The power of the resurrection is adequate to lift us out of all this and to tear these lives of ours open for the coming in of the energies that are in Christ.—Robert E. Speer, in The Christian Century.

Christ is Risen!

It needs to be confirmed anew in the thought and heart of the Church this Easter morn that Paul was philosophically and experimentally right when he contended that the whole Gospel of Jesus Christ revolves around and is dependent upon the resurrection of Jesus. He would make no compromise on that point. And from that time to this, that postulate has been the keystone in the arch of faith. But many there be within the Church as well as out of it who have not at all apprehended what that means to present-day Christian thinking and Christian living.

If Christ be risen from the dead, he is a living, thinking, loving being today. Now if that means anything at all, it means that he is a Twentieth Century being. But many in the Church seem to think that he can neither think nor feel in the terms of present-day life and understanding. In his name they seek to confine men and bind them to policies and practices of the far-away past. Many of their interpretations and ideas of Christian truth would be absolutely inconceivable to a Christ who is alive in America today. Many of the things which are prophesied and advocated in His name must be repugnant to the refinement of His beautiful soul. Men seem to forget that if Jesus Christ is alive today, He must be infinitely sweeter of heart and larger of mind than any man or woman among us. He must be at least as reasonable as man, as sane! He must be at least as supra-racial in love, as wholesome in aspiration, as free in spirit and unbounded by traditions and prejudices, as are the best of men and women. His concern for the children of men right here and now, for the child-workers in our factories, for the slum-cursed and the poor, His hatred of war and His hope for the world—must all be divinely humane and passionate. And we His followers must become like Him in these things.

Ah, no one can comprehend what glorious transformation would come immediately to the Church if only on this Easter Day it could lay hold, in reality of the fact that Jesus Christ is alive right here and now, and living and thinking in the terms of today's life and today's struggles and hopes.—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

God's Highway.

America is the legitimate successor of ancient Rome in the matter of road building. Our aim is not military conquest, but comfort, convenience, and commerce. The text, therefore, has a familiar sound.

It is the highway of salvation. Israel was in captivity. Now they were promised a way of escape. Soon they would be free once more. The message of the prophet was "God will come and save you". Also for the heart in exile from God. This may happen in any of three ways; first, to be absorbed in the study of the physical wonders of nature to the exclusion of the spiritual; secondly, to rest in the abstract idea of the absolute apart from experience; and, thirdly, to reject God's claims to order life according to His will. Faith is the way of salvation. Faith penetrates the material structure of the universe and finds God there. Faith transforms an idea into a living personality. Faith consecrates the whole of life to God. This is the only way out of the darkness and bitterness of intellectual captivity.

This is the way of progress. Deserts lay between Israel and her destination. Dangers and delays obstructed the road, but faith surmounted them all. Three promises cheer them. The prophet says, "God shall walk in the way for them". He will be their strength. Again, the highway is to be protected from the ravages of beasts of prey. The way of holiness is the only safe way. Then we are told that fools shall not err therein. God's way is clear and plain. All that we need is earnestness and purpose to obey. Is it not so in the experience of every one of us. When we walk in the way of truth and righteousness we develop spiritually with every day that passes and are strong for service. So is it with nations. God's way is the way of spiritual conquest.

It is the homeward way. "To Zion"—what a vision! "With songs and everlasting joy." Life in Christ is one long return to God and heaven.—Presbyterian Banner.

The Resurrection.

The Resurrection was the Divine attestation of the truth of Christ's claim. In order that His claim to be the Messiah should be understood, and that He might fulfill the function of the Messiah, it was necessary that He should die. But in order that His claim might be believed, it was necessary that He should rise again. It was in this light the disciples first viewed it. They accepted it as God's attestation as to their Master's truth; it was the answer given by God to the doubts and calumnies and execrations of men.

But for this Divine reversal of human judgment, the disciples themselves would not have known what to make of His death. The beauty and promise of His words, which had so attracted them, would now have seemed delusive and unreliable, but in the light of the Resurrection they saw that the Christ ought to have suffered these things and so to enter His glory.

It also discloses a real and close connection between this world and the unseen world. There is no need now of argument to prove a life beyond. Here is One who is in it. For the Resurrection of Christ was not a return to this life, to its wants, to its limitations, to its dangers, to its inevitable close. It was a Resurrection to a life for ever beyond death. The world into which He has gone is a real world, in which men can live more fully than they can live here.—Marcus Dods.

The Tryst of Jesus.

F. B. Stone.

Before He died to save us sinners,
Ere on the cross death stilled His breath,
Whoever made a tryst like Jesus,
To meet His chosen after death?

Because from death He rose as victor,
Beyond our graves we too, can keep
A tryst with Him Whose power shall raise us.
When we, too, in the grave shall sleep.

Oh, blessed confidence faith gives us,
"Because I live, ye, too, shall live",
His word forever stands unbroken,
Æternal life is His to give.

Inspiration.

There was little taste for good music in the first half of the eighteenth century, and the result was that Handel found himself at the age of fifty-three, broken in health and fortune, and apparently at the end of his career. His great work was still ahead of him, however. He found himself in the midst of a rising tide of religion, and he adapted himself to it by inventing the oratorio. He produced a tremendous impression upon the public mind, and the evangelical revival of the eighteenth century was largely due to his influence. Wesley's Journal says of a rendering of The Messiah at Bristol Cathedral: "I doubt if that congregation was ever so serious at a sermon as they were during the performance." No wonder, for Handel had two forces to aid him—his ability to interpret religious emotions and the power to throw himself into his work. He was found in tears while composing "He Was Despised". When writing the Halleiujah Chorus he thought he saw Heaven opened. "Noble entertainment," said a friend after a concert. "Is that all?" said Handel. "I wished to make them better." His greatness lies in this, that he was Christ's interpreter in music. "Never till Handel wrote," says a recent writer, "did music clothe with her conquering magic the figure of the Divine Comforter whose message is to them that labor and are heavy laden."—Selected.

Be Sure They Understand.

"I couldn't know what you meant, Mother," wailed little four-year-old Billy who had just been punished for not obeying a direct command which he had misunderstood.

Of course, the young mother did not know she had been misunderstood when she administered the punishment. She was young. Billy was her adopted child and she was so fond of him and yet so conscientious she feared she might spoil him. She insisted on immediate obedience for she was eager to keep him absolutely unspoiled.

The language of these parents, both college graduates, is far above the head of the child they have taken from the orphanage. They realize it now and are rapidly simplifying their words to suit the little mind they are helping to develop. Naturally, they are each day increasing his tiny vocabulary.

"What did she mean?" How often you hear that question when children are playing together and are interrupted by an order or request of some teacher or parent. Listening for a reply we often discover that not one in the group really understood what was intended except in an indefinite way.

There are many instances of foster parents and relatives who are bringing up children making the mistake above mentioned. The adopted child, particularly, has often been accustomed to hearing a different type of vocabulary, and it is not to be wondered at that he often fails to interpret correctly what is said to him. Wendell, four years old, said that he and his aunt with whom he lives get along nicely only he "don't can always know what she wants" him to do.

I wonder if parents, too, do not at times make the same mistake—that of punishing a child for doing a thing he thinks he has been told to do. It is so easy for adults to misunderstand each other; how much more easy for children to fail to understand our wishes from our words. I saw a mother punish her son for closing a door when she had asked him not to do so, and I am sure the child honestly thought he did exactly what he had been requested to do. The request, simple as it was, had been made in an obscure manner.

There is a decided duty here for all of us who are mothers—real or foster—to study ourselves and our language from the child's point of view. It will free us from carelessness in thinking and in expressing our thoughts. Most children are so sensitive that one punishment for a wrongly interpreted request or command may undermine days of careful training. It may sow seeds of distrust, in the little mind, that will cause serious results in the future. —Willis and Lenora Bailey.

Nature's Resurrection.

Eugenie du Maurier Meredith

The ice-bound brook has broken its fetters;
It sings with joy as it hurries to the river:
The soft wind breathes musically
To the baby leaves that are just coming out;
The bees hum among the early blossoms of the willows;
The peach, pear and quince blossoms;
The "cheep, cheep" of the fluffy chickens
Is spring's herald of gladness in the farm yard;
The city lawns are starred with crocuses and hyacinths;
The green fields of the country are bright with dandelions;
All things that seemed so dead—
The frozen brooks, the motionless egg, the stiff brown buds,
The dull, dark bulbs and roots—
Have come forth in joy, glory and song,
And are types of the triumph of life over death—

On the First Easter.

Jesus revealed the reconciling, redeeming love of God in His death. The murderous, blind hate of man could kill Him, but not the love He brought from the Father; that was deathless. He revealed the power of God unto uttermost, eternal salvation, by His resurrection. "Because I live, ye shall live also," He had said. And when they found Him alive from the dead, heard the music of His voice once more, looked into His eyes of love and all-pitying comprehension, beheld His wounds and felt His touch, they knew they, too, should live again and that He would not be in Heaven and leave them behind.

They now understood His words to weeping Martha: "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." They now comprehended the deep meaning of His words: "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life."—S. L. Brengle.

With Mary.

The first day of the week
Cometh Mary Magdalene early
When it was yet dark,
Unto the spulchre—

Each Easter morning
I go with her into the garden,
I like to walk beside her;
To carry, as she carries,
Aloes and cinnamon and myrrh,
And all the sweet burden of spices
For our Lord.

The old garden is wet with the night dew,
Since last Friday
Many feet have trod the pathway,
The bruised petals of white lilies
And of pale purple phlox
Lift their faint fragrance
Like incense through the dusk,
The shadows of gray olives
Lie deep across the old walls,
The dawn tarries over the hills.
Mary wears, a trailing, dark dress
Of the night:
But I—I wear
The shining white garments of the dawn,
For I have long known something
That she does not know.

Her eyes see the open sepulchre
Stark before her in the darkness,
And there is a voice:
"Woman, why weepest thou?
Whom seekest thou"?
"I weep," she answers.
"Because they have taken away my Lord,
And I know not where they have laid Him."

O Mary, Mary—
I want to put my arms about you,
To tell you—to tell you—
I want to sing it through the dusk!
I want to sing it to the stars!
I cannot breathe for it—
Mary, look—see!
He is not the gardener!
He is ——!
But Mary's eyes are heavy with tears.
She cannot see.
"Sir, if thou hast borne Him hence,
Tell me where thou hast laid Him
And I will take Him away."
And then—
With the old-time tenderness,
Jesus speaks her name,
"Mary"!

'Tis Easter Time.

Ring ye bells, with Easter gladness,
Ring aloud in mighty chime;
Gone the night of sin and sadness,
Ring for joy, 'tis Easter time!

Sing, ye people, songs of glory,
Till in every age and clime
Men shall know the wond'rous story
Of the joyous Easter time!

Ring and sing, till earth, rejoicing,
Echoes back in tuneful rhyme,
Hope, and joy, and triumph voicing,
Ring and sing, 'tis Easter time!

Underneath All.

Jennie Moore Bryan.

A dull, hard seed, in soft brown earth;
Warm sunshine and rain, and lo! a birth.
Oh! strange is the work that goes on in the ground:
Death quickened to life, in one ceaseless round.

A hope and a prayer, enfolding the germ,
Soon points of pale green, change my weak faith to firm.
How weak is the faith, dependent on sight;
But marvelous that, which in darkness sees light!

Growth upward and down follows science-proved laws;
Beneath all is the great Primal Cause.
Science dazes my mind with life's secret-most things,
But 'tis faith writes the song that my rapt spirit sings.

Her Easter Vision.

John T. Theodore.

Part II.

She was kneeling in the Church of Nativity. Her friends and fellow pilgrims had left the place and before her stood a frightened little girl whose face was white and thin and who was clothed in a ragged garment. Mrs. Albertson's mind was confused. She closed her eyes to compose herself. What had Sunbeam said? How could she make the child she loved happy? Oh, yes! "trust and patience and loving deeds done in memory of her".

"Oh! what a dream!" exclaimed the American woman rousing herself. "But it shows me what a foolish mother I have been," she added. "God has given me this vision to open my eyes to my un-Christian behavior. Henceforth I will trust God. I can be patient and wait, and fill my days with good deeds for my child's sake." She looked up and still the thin and poorly-clad girl was furtively staring at her. With a sudden impulse she went to her and said kindly:

"Who are you, and what is your name, little girl?"

The child said something in a foreign tongue which she could not understand. Mrs. Albertson smiled. The little girl returned a wistful smile. The mother's heart leaped with joy; perhaps Sunbeam was smiling, too. She took the girl's hand and leading her gently, said:

"Come with me and we will find some one who can understand both of us," not remembering that the little girl did not know her language, so overflowing was her heart with kindly and generous impulses toward this forlorn bit of humanity. To a near-by "Orphans' Home", which had been pointed out to her, she took the poor girl and asked the interpreter there to find out who this child was and why she was so destitute. Patiently and with many discreet questionings the interpreter drew out her sad story. It was a long and tragic recital of cruelty and of long wanderings. Finally a small group had drifted through Syria to Palestine and to the little town of Bethlehem. Her mother had died—there had not been enough food for both—and the child was left alone, fatherless and motherless.

"Can you not take this child into your orphanage?" she asked the Director. No, he could not. He was very sorry, but he would soon be obliged to discharge twenty of the older orphans who should really be kept longer as they were not yet able to be fully self-supporting. Without funds, however, no child could be fed and his resources were less this year than the year before, he explained with a catch in his throat.

"If that is the case," Mrs. Albertson hastened to reply, "I will pay for the support of the twenty and this little girl besides."

She left the astonished and grateful director and went out into the street. It was not a narrow muddy lane in which she was walking, but in the clouds, yea, it seemed to her in the very streets of Paradise, and she fancied she could see Sunbeam, not sad and lonely but joyous and glad, skipping among the flowers and shrubs in company with other happy children.

On the following Sunday the Easter service was held on the Mount of Olives.

"If ye be risen with Christ seek those things which are above," the minister read for the Scripture lesson. "Put on a heart of compassion, kindness . . . and above all these things put on love.

"Like as Christ was raised from the dead through the Glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life. For if we have become united with him in the likeness of his death we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection."

"Like Him—in newness of life"—the word reverberated in Mrs. Albertson's mind as she returned from the service. "I will walk in 'newness of life', for my child's sake and for Christ's sake." And great peace filled her heart.

It was a changed woman who sailed homeward from Palestine. To the surprise and relief of her traveling companions her sad hard look had gone. Instead of seeking sympathy she was now desirous of being helpful to others.

A month later Mrs. Albertson's friends went to the pier to meet the returning steamer. What was their joy to see coming down the gangplank not a drooping, sad-faced woman, but one buoyant and cheerful with springing step and smiling face.

"No need to ask if you have had a wonderful trip!" remarked Dr. Heath.

"It has been wonderful, and do you know, I've adopted twenty-one children out in the Near East," she exclaimed. "I loved them so I really could not have come home and left them except that I am planning to have as many American children share my farm with me when I find that number who need its sunshine and its gardens."

A Good Turn.

One day, a few years ago, my Boy Scout friend was coming home from school, when he came across a baby robin, one or two days old, in the road. As he could find no nest he brought the robin home and we tried to feed it worms which we cut into small pieces. We managed to get a few pieces down its throat, but it was useless to try to feed it.

We knew of a chewink's nest in the woods, which had four young ones in it. So we took the robin out and put it in with the baby chewinks. We went to the nest a few times after and observed to our joy that the robin had made itself at home and had thrived under care of Mrs. Chewink, its foster mother. In a few weeks the robin flew from the nest with its newly acquired friends. Thus a robin with a song was saved which otherwise would have been lost to us.—Philip Warren, in Our Dumb Animals.

Florette's Turn About.

Lucile B. Boyd.

It was a very dark night when Farmer Boyce led Florette from her old home to his barn. For a young cow who had never been away from the place where she was born, it was a lonesome experience. Florette wondered why she had been taken away from her mother and pals which had grown up with her as calves. She didn't understand that Farmer Boyce had bought her, and that she was going to live in this new place for a long while.

When the sun rose the next morning Florette was wide awake. She looked around and saw another cow.

"Good morning," she said in her best cow language.

"Moo," said the older cow, and tossed her head and switched her tail in an unfriendly fashion.

Florette saw at once that the cow was cross. "Maybe she's cold and hungry," thought Florette. Then she tried to think of something pleasant to say to her. But the other cow spoke first.

"What are you here for?" she bellowed.

"I wish I knew," replied Florette.

"What's your name?" asked the cross one.

"They called me Florette at Farmer Gray's."

"Florette, Florette. A fine name for a cow. If you are as queer as your name I'm sure I don't want to know you," said the cow. "Why will some folks try to be so airy? Florette, Florette. Why aren't you called by a sensible name like mine? I'm called Luella."

"That's a good name, I'm sure," replied Florette, trying to forget the rudeness which the old cow had shown. "How did you get that name?"

"I was named by Farmer Boyce's wife for a friend of hers. I was her pet calf and her own cow. There have been many others on this farm during the last ten years, but I am the only one that Farmer Boyce has not sent away. I'm the boss of this place," said Luella. Then she tossed her head again, to show Florette that she was very important.

Just then Farmer Boyce and his son came into the barn.

"Here's the new heifer," said Farmer Boyce. "What do you think of her, David?"

David walked up close to Florette and stroked her nose. Florette felt happy right away, for she knew that a boy would be very much more cheerful than Luella. She licked his sleeve, and mooed softly.

"I guess she likes me," said David. "Anyway, I like her. I'll take care of her and feed her, Dad, if you'll let me call her my own. She's a beauty, isn't she?"

Now Florette couldn't understand all that David was saying, because he talked in a different language from hers, but she knew by his manner and gentleness that he was saying something good about her. Luella knew it, too, and she wasn't used to having other cows take attention from her. Luella didn't like Florette here, and she didn't intend to be friendly toward her.

Farmer Boyce went about the milking, while David fed the cows with grain, and then climbed upstairs to throw down some hay. Florette could hear him whistling as he worked. She heard him go into another part of the barn, and she heard the horses asking for their breakfast. Soon she heard the bleating of the sheep, and the grunting of the pigs. She hoped David would come back to see her.

After the milking Farmer Boyce let Luella out into the barnyard. It was but a short time before David came and unfastened the rope from the ring in the stall. He led Florette out of the barn, patted her neck, and talked to her as he showed her where the watering tub was. The sheep stopped eating to look at her, but Luella didn't notice her at all.

"You could tell them after I was well!"

"Oh, no!" said grandma decidedly. "There won't be time—you'll want to go on a load of hay, pick raspberries by the old stone wall, and do ever so many other things."

"I can't do half the things I want to in one week," sighed Cora. "'Twould take that long to hear all the stories done up in this story quilt, I beleive!"

"I know what I'll do!" said grandma. "When you go home, I'll put this log-cabin quilt in a box, and send it to you by parcel post. Then your mamma can tell you the stories."

"You mean—you'll give me the quilt, for my own?" asked Cora, astonished.

"Yes. And who knows? Perhaps some time you will show the quilt to your grandchildren, and tell them the stories hidden away in it!"—Presbyterian.

As long as David stayed close to her Florette forgot the newness of the place and her lonesomeness. It wasn't long, however, before David took the rope off of her halter and started into the house for his breakfast. As she saw him going away from her, Florette raised her head and mooed as loud as she could.

"Don't leave me for long," she tried to tell him.

Florette's voice made Luella very angry. Why should another cow be here in her barnyard? Without any warning, she rushed straight for Florette, past the sheep and feed racks.

"I'll show you what you'll get if you stay around here," she bellowed angrily.

She speared her with her horns, she bunted her against the side of the barn, she drew back for a moment and bunted her again. Poor Florette was so frightened she lost her wits completely, and even made no effort to get away from the raging old cow until she was so badly hurt that pain drove her into the barn.

"So much for your first lesson," yelled Luella. "I'll teach you to stay away from me and my barnyard. The sooner you know who's boss here, the better for you."

Several weeks went by and Florette learned the ways of the farm and the other animals. She made friends with the sheep, and played about the baby lambs. She even played with Rover when he came into the barnyard with David. But Luella didn't show any signs of wanting her around. Florette had learned to keep a running distance away from Luella's horns, and to move as fast as she could when Luella turned her way. Every morning she followed the old cross-patch up the lane to the big pasture, but always at a safe distance from her. Every afternoon as the sun began to set, she knew it was time to follow Luella to the pasture bars, where she waited for David. After the bars were down and the old cow had stepped over them, Florette would nose up to David and joyfully go down the lane to the barnyard.

One afternoon a heavy thunderstorm came up in the west, and it grew dark very suddenly. Florette was in the farthest corner of the pasture, near the brook which ran through the maple woods. When darkness came on she thought it was time to be going up the hill to the barway. But, of course, she didn't like to start ahead of Luella, and where was the old cow? Florette had seen her go into the brook to drink, and cross over into the woods beyond. She waited for her to come out of the woods. She waited and waited. Then she thought she'd go and find her. Crossing the brook she went but a little way when she heard Luella mooing. Florette knew that something was wrong. She couldn't understand why the old cow didn't start for home. She didn't want to go too close to her, for she had had many lessons about keeping away from Luella's horns. She didn't want to leave her there. Florette didn't know what to do.

Suddenly she heard David calling. "Come boss, come boss," he said over and over.

Florette started out of the woods in a hurry. She crossed the brook and was soon out of the bushes. She could see David at the top of the hill by the barway.

"Come boss," he said again.

Florette started up the hill. Then she thought of Luella. It didn't seem right to her to be going ahead of the old cow, even if David was at the bars. In another moment she had gone back to the edge of the woods.

David had never seen Florette act like that before.

"Something's wrong," he said to himself. "Luella is always here at the gate. I wonder what's happened to her. Come boss, come boss," he called again as he started running down the hill.

When Florette saw David near her she darted into the woods. David followed her. Across the brook she went, right into the dark where she had last heard Luella. When she came close to the old cow she stopped. David came up soon. Luella mooed as if she wanted help.

In a very short time David discovered that Luella's horns were fastened tight in some wire, which had been piled behind a clump of birch trees when the new woven wire fence had been put in place in the early spring. Luella couldn't possibly have pulled away without help. David struggled with the wire and finally managed to free the cow. Then he told Luella to go along home. When Florette saw the old cow on her way to the barnyard, she followed. David walked along beside her.

"You're a good boss," he said. "Wait until I tell Dad what a faithful friend you have been to the old cow. I'll give you an extra feed tonight, and how would you like a brand new cow-bell?"

In answer Florette mooed "Thank you. It always pays to do a good turn even to a cow who doesn't like you."

Calling the Violet.

By Lucy Larcom.

Dear little violet,
Don't be afraid!
Lift your blue eyes
From the rocks' many shade!
All the birds call for you
Out of the sky;
May is here waiting,
And here too am I.

Why do you shiver so,
Violet sweet?
Soft is the meadow grass
Under your feet.
Wrapped in your hood of green,
Violet, why
Peep from your earth door
So silent and shy?

Trickle the little brooks
Close to your bed;
Softest of fleecy clouds
Float over head;
"Ready and waiting!"
The slender reeds sigh;
"Ready and waiting!"
We sing—May and I.

Come, pretty Violet,
Winter's away;
Come, for without you
May isn't May.
Down through the sunshine
Wings flutter and fly;
Quick, little violet,
Open your eye!

Hear the rain whisper,
"Dear violet, come"!
How can you stay
In your underground home?
Up in the pine-boughs
For you the winds sigh;
Homesick to see you
Are we—May and I.

Ha! though you care not
For call or for shout,
Yon troops of sunbeams
Are winning you out.
Now all is beautiful
Under the sky;
May's here—and violets!
Winter, good-bye!

Spring Is Coming.

Betty Scott.

Spring is coming, the birds are singing and the squirrels are playing. There is an old cherry tree in the back yard. Its buds are beginning to swell.

The sky is blue with white clouds in it. I can hear the robin very plainly, he is singing his morning song. I see a little rabbit hopping around; he is playing with the chickens in our neighbor's back yard. We put corn and nuts out for the squirrels and birds. The blue-jays and the cardinals are very fond of popcorn. The squirrels play in the yard and trees, and they sometimes jump over to the roof.

One day a squirrel came down for a small ear of popcorn, took it to the curb of the cistern and, after taking a bite or two, decided he was not safe enough there, and scurried up to his favorite limb of the cherry tree, where he cunningly finished his feast before going back to his box for the night.

Jesus Christ is the center and heart of Christianity and that all real science says with Pilate: "I find no fault in him".—Dr. W. A. Brown.

MRS. LILLY ARCHER WARREN ELLIS.

Entered into rest on March 15, 1928, at 1016 West Franklin Street, Richmond, Virginia, where she was staying with her sisters, LILY ARCHER WARREN ELLIS, wife of the Rev. Josiah Richard Ellis, and daughter of E. J. and Jeannette Warren, in the sixty-sixth year of her age.

She began life among the pleasant environs and sweet influences of old Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, which was ever a joyful memory to her; thence to Grace Church, Richmond, and thence to a wider field of opportunity as the wife of a misisonary—half of which time was spent in the arduous and exacting work of the mountains. Here her health was impaired and was never fully restored, but there was never word or hint from her that she had paid too dear price for the joy of serving these neglected peoples.

In every walk of life her works do follow her.

She was one of the pioneer workers in the Mission which resulted in the building of Christ Church, Richmond; her Sunday-school work was of the best admittedly—seven boys being confirmed from the first class she taught at Christ Church, Gordonsville, with duplications many fold in the mountain work, and at St. Luke's Church, Pedlar Mills; it was her individual initiative in plan and practice, as its secretary, which made the Valley Convocation a marvel of usefulness and the best in the diocese to which others turned for example and inspiration.

Mrs. Ellis was a mother in Israel to many men—fifteen in all—who came out from the Seminary each year as students there, or to begin their ministry under the leadership of her husband. Her home was their home, and never did a set of untrained, untried and embarrassed young clerics find a wiser counsellor, or more sympathetic friend.

After a good many years it is sweet to remember her kindly words of wisdom in regard to reading the service and visiting the families of the parish. And one can never forget the brightness and the charming humor of her conversation and how her home was always an illustration of the Apostle's precept, "given to hospitality".

No less inspirational and helpful was her influence on those teachers who taught in the mountain schools and found lodging under their roof and set around their board. This tribute to be complete must tell of their devotion to dear Mrs. Ellis whom they loyally loved as companion and friend. These and many other ministers and Church workers with whom she came in contact join in the saying, "She hath done what she could"—entitling her to the welcome, "Enter thou into the joy of our Lord.

In the tenderer walks of domestic life as wife and mother she was "a keeper at hom'e'—a leader in every good work—helper of the needy—"warning the unruly, patient to all"—beautifully exemplifying the Christian life.

And so, whether among city or country folk—among the cultured and refined, or the poor and lowly—all are rising up and calling her blessed—as attested by letters from three Bishops and the little girl who writes, "She was the goodes woman ever was", and from all the relatives and friends between these two extremes.

All these by precept and example she taught how to live: would God they all might have seen her pass through the portals of death that she might also have taught them how easy it was to die. So quietly, so placidly, so sweetly she passed through them that death indeed lost its sting, the grave its victory. "She was not for God took her" to pass into that upper and better country there "to awake in his likeness and be satisfied with it".

Interment was had in the Ellis plat in the cemetery at Amherst Courthouse, after the service in the parish church conducted by the rector, the Rev. Thos. D. Lewis, assisted by the Rev. Frank Messick of Nelson Parish, and the Rev. Thomas M. Brown of St. John's Church, Lynchburg.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

And if this is true of Jesus Christ can we doubt as to who He is, and what our faith in Him ought to be?

It is this stupendous fact of Christ's resurrection which changed the course of history, which inspired the apostles with a faith that nothing could resist, which for 2,000 years has given faith to the dying and comfort to the mourners, which has been the divinest force for good this world has known and is today a mightier influence than ever before.

And so, with the Christian Church throughout the world, we lift up our prayers, and hymns, and thanksgivings this Easter to Him who says to us, "I am He that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive for evermore", and whom we shall soon meet face to face in the life beyond.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The forty-second annual Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew has been called to meet at Washington, D. C., October 5 to 9, immediately preceding the General Convention of the Church. This date was adopted after consulting with the Presiding Bishop and representatives of the General Convention Committee, for the purpose of enabling Brotherhood delegates to remain over for at least part of the General Convention and also to make it convenient for the Bishops and deputies to the General Convention to attend the Brotherhood Convention.

In the official Convention Call issued by President Edward H. Bonsall, attention is called to the fact that the Brotherhood Convention this year will be held in association with the National Commission on Evangelism. The Commission is represented on the Program Committee and the plans and methods to be discussed at the Convention will be presented from the standpoint of the general evangelistic movement in the Church. The Convention is not for Brotherhood members only, but is for all men and boys of the Church who desire to attend.

It is suggested by the Trunk Line Association that delegates to the Brotherhood Convention in purchasing tickets ask for certificate (not receipt) to General Convention, the Brotherhood not being listed separately but included in the General Convention. Dates of sale have been fixed to allow Brotherhood Convention delegates to reach Washington by October 5.

An unusual degree of interest is being taken in this Convention and the Committee in charge reports advance registrations received from twenty-five dioceses.

TO HONOR MOTHER'S DAY

THE HOME OF MARY, THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON
Fredericksburg, Virginia

Will you not carefully read this and honor Mother's Day by helping us to restore to its simplicity and preserve to the American nation the home of Mary Washington? This historic house has been cared for by the Fredericksburg Branch of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities to the best of its ability for over thirty years. At present it is in need of extensive repairs, quite beyond the resources of this small group of faithful women. We must have $5,000. We need more.

It was to this little house that George Washington brought his mother just before the Revolution. Here he came to ask her blessing when it was evident that the choice of the nation was to fall upon him as its first President. Her words still echo in our hearts. "Go, George, and fulfill the destiny which God and thy country intend for thee. Go, and go with a mother's blessing." Surely this is a sacred spot. We trust that you will celebrate Mother's Day by helping us in this work and sending us a contribution.

Very sincerely yours,

THE KENMORE ASSOCIATION, INC.

Fredericksburg, Va.

THE HOME OF THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON

There stands on the corner of Charles and Lewis Streets in Fredericksburg, Virginia, an unpretentious cottage. There is no spot in America more sacred. It was the home of Mary, the mother of Washington—Mary Ball, the second wife of Augustine Washington. This was her home from March, 1775, until August, 1789. For many years the home belonged to various owners, but is now the property of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, Incorporated. It is now sadly in need of restoration and preservation, and, in order to preserve it for America, they are asking patriotic America if they will not honor Mothers Day, May 13th, by helping to preserve the home of Mary Washington, the mother of George Washington, the Father of our Country. It is their desire to restore it exactly as it was when she lived there, and they hope that every patriot will help in this important work which they feel must be done before the bi-centennial of George Washington's birth in 1932. Every dollar spent goes to the restoration of the Mary Washington house, the expenses are all taken care of locally.

In this restoration work, Mr. Charles O. Cornelius, Associate Curator of the Metropolitan Museum is graciously lending his assistance as advisor. Miss Anna Marshall Braxton is Chairman of the Committee, and the National Bank of Fredericksburg, Virginia, is the Treasurer.

The property once occupied the whole square with orchard and garden, kitchen and servants' quarters. It was bought by Washington in September, 1772, from Michael and Esther Robinson and was a part of the original Kenmore estate.

It was here that Mary Washington received the courier sent by General Washington to tell her of the victory at Trenton. It was here Washington came after the Battle of Yorktown with the French and American officers, and she received him with thanksgiving after his absence of nearly seven years. It was here he came in December, 1783. Fredericksburg gave the Peace Ball in his honor, and it was at that time that he made his memorable reply to Mayor McWilliams, in which he spoke of Fredericksburg as "the place of my growing infancy."

It was here that Marquis de LaFayette came to pay his respects to her who was the mother of the Greatest American. She received him in her garden, met all his fine phases with dignity, and gave him her blessing when he bade her good-bye. He said, "I have seen the only Roman matron of my day."

It was here March 12, 1789, that Washington came to bid a sad farewell after he had received the notice that he had been elected President of the Nation. She died August 25, 1789. Town and country assembled to do honor at her burial. Her remains lie in a spot she herself selected on the Kenmore estate, and a stately monument "erected by her countrywomen" marks her last resting place.

The house has been furnished simply and cared for through all these years without any appeal to the public at large. Now there are vital repairs necessary. The women of Fredericksburg and Virginia saved it for the nation. They feel confident that the people of America will consider it a privilege to help in its restoration. They must have $5,000.00; they need more.

THE ANGLICAN EPISCOPATE OF CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND

By O. R. ROWLEY, Montreal.

Contains biographical sketches (not panegyric) of the official lives, together with half-toned portraits (4x5½) in Episcopal robes, of all Bishops consecrated for the Church in Canada and Newfoundland, beginning with Charles Inglis, formerly Rector of Trinity Church, New York, the first Bishop consecrated for Nova Scotia in 1787, and continuing to the present time; also portraits of Bishops or Priests who declined elections to Sees in Canada; with a Foreword by, and a portrait of, the Archbishop of Canterbury. There is a chapter on the Historic Episcopate, showing the line of succession from the Churches at Jerusalem, Ephesus and Rome, through Canterbury, the Church in Wales, the Church in Scotland, and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, down to the present Bishop of Montreal, to whom the book is dedicated. The book is replete with valuable information, and historical data regarding the Anglican Bishops of Canada and Newfoundland and the Church in those Dominions. It is a record of untold value, which does the Church high credit and good service. It is highly recommended by the Bishops of the Church in Canada. Churchman and libraries in the United States will be interested in this volume.

THE TRUE MINISTER

By Goldsmith

Near yonder copse, where once the garden smiled,
And still where many a garden-flower grows wild,
There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
The village preacher's modest mansion rose.
A man he was to all the country dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a year;
Remote from towns he ran his godly race,
Nor e're had changed, nor wished to change, his place;
Unskilful he to fawn, or seek for power
By doctrines fashioned to the varying hour;
Far other aims his heart had learned to prize—
More bent to raise the wretched than to rise.
His house was known to all the vagrant train;
He chid their wanderings, but relieved their pain.
The long-remembered beggar was his guest,
Whose beard, descending, swept his aged breast;
The ruined spendthrift, now no longer proud,
Claimed kindred there, and had his claims allowed;
The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay,
Sate by his fire, and talked the night away—
Wept o'er his wounds, or tales of sorrow done,
Shouldered his crutch and showed how fields were won.
Pleased with his guests, the good man learned to glow,
And quite forgot their vices in their woe;
Careless their merits or their faults to scan,
His pity gave ere charity began.
Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
And e'en his failings leaned to virtue's side;
But in his duty prompt at every call,
He watched and wept, he prayed and felt for all;
And, as a bird each fond endearment tries
To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
He tried each art, reproved each dull delay,
Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.
Beside the bed where parting life was lain,
And sorrow, guilt and pain, by turns dismayed,
The reverend champion stood. At his control
Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul;
Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise,
And his last faltering accents whispered praise.
At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorned the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevailed with double sway,
Remained to Pray.
And fools who came to scoff
The service past, around the pious man,
With ready zeal, each honest rustic ran;
E'en children followed, with endearing wile,
And plucked his gown, to share the good man's smile.
His ready smile a parent's warmth exprest;
Their welfare pleased him, and their cares distressed;
To them his heart, his love, his griefs, were given—
But all his serious thoughts had rest in heaven.
As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

No good work was ever done by accident.

After "what must I do to be saved"? comes the great question, "what can I do to serve"?

The Christian religion is not taught; it is caught from some one who has it. —Inge.

What you possess at your death will belong to another; but what you are will be yours forever.—Henry van Dyke.

There is always room at the top, but the only elevator thither is toil and effort.

I am engaged in the best of services for the best of Masters, and upon the best of terms.—John Williams.

"Often it is so in the strange vicissitudes of life—the only way out is up; and when the angel within us ascends the ladder of faith, it is met by the angel of God descending with blessing.

The great Scot surgeon, Sir James Simpson, was once asked by a young man what he regarded as his greatest discovery, and the reply of the great scientist was, "My greatest discovery is that I am a great sinner, and what Christ is a great Saviour".

I have but one candle of life to burn, and would rather burn it out where people are dying in darkness, than in a land which is flooded with light.—A Missionary.

When God gives refreshment, He gives abundantly. The cisterns may run dry, but there is no stint at the fountain.—Isaac Edwardson.

As a house is built, not for fair weather, but for the storm, so character should be constructed to withstand all the gales and cyclones and tornadoes that drive against the soul.—Religious Telescope.

On the whole, there is no possession so valuable as good habits, for this means that not only is the mind pledged and covenanted to good, but the muscles are supple, and even the bones are bent to what is good.—Rev. James Stalker.

The vision may dawn, the dream may waken, the heart may leap with a new inspiration on some mountain-top; but the test, the triumph, is at the foot of the mountain, on the level plain.—Rev. M. D. Babcock.

"VICTORIAN"

Professional iconoclasts usually are cheap, vulgar, flashy persons of limited mental equipment and dubious morals, anxiously seeking prominence, which they mistake for eminence, by the short and easy way of shocking public sensibilities. Having the commercial and showman instinct well developed, they know that the public, or a large part of it, enjoys being startled and shocked and has craving for novelty. Following the plan of the circus and side show managers, shouting superlatives in large letters and red ink, the iconoclast systematically derides what we are accustomed to revere, bespatters with slime the fairest and whitest fame, labors to drag to contempt the most sacred traditions and beliefs. Under leadership of some writers and talkers of this kind the habit of sneering at the "Victorian age" and of accepting "Victorian" as an adjective expressing dull mediocrity and colorless respectability has spread among people of shallow minds and those who shun the effort of doing their own thinking.

The truth is that Queen Victoria, whose name is given the sixty-four years of her service as sovereign of Great Britain, was the most useful and valuable woman the world has known since the beginning of the Christian era. Following a succession of kings dissolute, frivolous or imbecile, she made respectability respectable, re-established regard for the fine, homely, foundation virtues and graces, gave example reaching far as civilization of being a faithful wife and mother, a consistent Christian, of guidance by high principles and strong common sense. Certainly she did not stifle genius or suppress thought or endeavor or enterprise. No reign of any ruler in history—not even the spacious days of Elizabeth—has been richer in splendid products of literature, the arts and sciences, than was hers. No reign has given the world more magnificent instances of courage, loyalty, heroism in many fields. No sovereign has reigned over a country that gained in power, prestige and prosperity as Great Britain did under Victoria.

The real offense of what is so scornfully called the "Victorian age" was the steady advance it brought in decency, regard for the proprieties, allegiance to religion and the commandments of God. For the iconoclasts, the tearers down, those boasting themselves as "progressive" and "advanced" teachers, this is a grievance intolerable. The British queen established a new standard of morality for royal courts. Before her time intrigue, debauchery, profligacy, were considered among the prerogatives of royalty. She demonstrated that there could be clean living in palaces. Her sturdy insistence on good behavior by all whose acts she could regulate was such as every honest woman could admire and emulate. "Respectability" at which the imitation genius pretends to laugh means consistent conduct which commands and wins respect. It was the keynote of the "Victorian age". Vice was not banished, but it was made to veil itself and go into hiding, forbidden from displaying itself insolently, thrusting itself before the public continually in newspapers, books, magazines and on lecture platforms and by the shameless lawlessness of conspicuous men and women.

It is impossible to know how much the decorum of manners and methods of the British court directed sentiment in Great Britain and this country. It is a fact, however, that in the sixty-four years vast improvement developed in both countries, especially among men. Indecencies and immoralities which were sanctioned or condoned in 1830 are banned now. Occupants of high places in business or government do not dare be drunk in public or to frequent openly public gaming places and disreputable resorts, as they did ninety years ago. Conversation in good society is not degraded with horribly blasphemous oaths, as it was at the beginning of the Nineteenth Century. The duel is no more the recognized and approved means for deciding personal differences; cock fighting has ceased to be the favorite amusement of the upper classes; even the prize ring has been put under rules comparatively humane. Instances of cleaner and higher requirements for respectability established in the "Victorian age" might be cited indefinitely.

Perhaps Spencer's wave theory applies to morals and manners and we are just now in a trough of retrogression between a forward and upward movement of the past and another of the near future. It is difficult to compare general moral levels in a country like this, with rapid growth and shifting of population and increase of wealth and temptation to the idleness that breeds folly and sin, the modern facilities of newspapers for gathering and displaying scandals and crime which formerly were hidden or known only locally. Whatever our conclusions may be on the question whether we are or are not in a period of decadence, the opportunity, responsibility and duty before us are clear enough for all to see. The conventionalities, proprieties, decencies, regard for respectability and ambition to attain and retain it, are the first lines of defence for religion, morality and civilization. These are largely in the keeping of women—the younger women more especially—of influence and position in each community, large or small. Nobody—not even queen and empress—can halt or conquer a fashion with a frown. In Victoria's day the "pull back" skirt, the extremely low-cut evening gown, as immodest as the short, scant skirt of the present, were everywhere. Yet the leading women everywhere can do much toward regulating and restraining, making respectability really respectable and keeping it popular. A good way to begin is to realize the realities of the "Victorian age" and the immeasurable good it brought to humanity. Let the sneer and gibe of the smart and shallow be treated with the contempt they deserve. "Victorian" may be old-fashioned, but it is a wise, safe, wholesome old-fashion and builds good character; on which life to be worth living must be founded. It is a fashion distasteful to those with appetite for garbage or living by pandering to the craving for it. For those who love purity in thought and life, who see in looseness of tongue and demeanor and lowering of standards the seeds of individual and national destruction, there is comfort in the knowledge that in very many households the "Victorian" idea and ideals yet prevail; hope in the belief that such households are numerous and strong and brave enough to stay and repulse any rising tide of impurity and impiety that may threaten.

REVERENDS IN A RESCUE SOUAD

Cordial thanks for a pleasant compliment are tendered to the Rev. Lewis Gibbs and the Rev. Carleton Barnwell, editors of The Southwestern Episcopalian, published at Staunton, Virginia. Obeying what seemed to me to be a demand of duty, I have been drawn into a series of somewhat discursive discussions with The New York Churchman. Evidently my criticism of The Churchman and expressed objections to its positions impress Mr. Gibbs and Mr. Barnwell as overwhelming. These gentlemen, friendly to The Churchman and the Virginia Theological Seminary, do me the honor to organize themselves into a rescue squad to succor the objects of their affections and my animadversions. In the issue of The Episcopalian for April they present themselves as reinforcements for The Churchman and belabor me laboriously.

Inexperienced in writing for publication, I did not dare hope that my feeble and random protests against what I thought to be dangerous heresy in the published utterances of The Churchman would be so effective as to alarm and excite its allies. Yet my elation is not personal. Knowing my own limitations and weaknesses, I realize that it is no skill or strength of mine that has so stricken the intellectual giants of The Churchman. Plain, blunt truth and common sense, however crudely expressed, must penetrate the thickest skull and bring down the most formidable and heavily armed and armored champion of error.

The general complaint against The Southern Churchman and myself in The Episcopalian is that we are violently narrow-minded and intolerant. We try very earnestly to avoid both these faults. Our contention is that the Protestant Episcopal Church is an established institution with its laws, doctrines, articles of faith and forms of worship so clearly set forth as to be seen and known by all. Those who believe the laws, doctrines, articles of faith and forms of the Roman Catholic Church to be best, are free to go to that Church and we have no quarrel with them. It is treason, false pretense, hypocrisy, to live under the name "Protestant Episcopal" while at heart a Roman Catholic and to scheme and strive to drag the Episcopal Church to Rome. On the other hand, those who choose to regard themselves as so broadminded and free-thinking as to reject the doctrines, teachings and faith of the Episcopal Church are within their legal rights; but they have no more right to continue to call themselves Episcopalians than a soldier has to wear the uniform and claim the protection of the flag of an army from which he has deserted.

There is no violence, narrowness of mind nor intolerance in that position. It does not mean persecution of anybody. It is simple, common, every-day fact, a plain matter of morals, ethics, good faith, honesty.

While I have a voice in the management of The Southern Churchman it will try faithfully to establish and maintain peace and brotherly love and unity in the Church. It is ready to forgive all who have misrepresented, misunderstood, justly or unjustly criticised or assailed it, as it hopes to be forgiven for all its misunderstanding of others and hasty and unconsidered words. It would be false to its most sacred obligations, however, if it failed to resist and attack teachings and utterances and methods it believes harmful to the Church, impairing its usefulness for the service of God and the advancement of man. A Church newspaper silent when danger, from within or without, threatens, is guilty of base disloyalty, is like Isaiah's blind watchmen and dumb watch dogs.

Whether The New York Churchman will welcome or resent the aid of The Southwestern Episcopalian, accept it as generous benefit in time of need or take it as indicating distrust of the strength of The Churchman's case and the capacity of The Churchman's editor, I do not know. I renew my own thanks for the double-barrelled salute to the power of Truth and hope my respected brethren will comprehend more clearly than heretofore the principles and purposes of The Southern Churchman.

A FELLOWSHIP OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

Dr. Nelson Page Dame

IN almost every country community, as well as in the villages and small towns, there are representatives of half a dozen or more Christian Churches; too few of any one Church to exert any great influence for Christ on the whole community; and yet so many altogether that if they were united and organized, they could make a tremendous impression on the world around them. And many members of all the churches are hungry for some genuine Christian unity and cooperation.

Of course, they can never be united or organized in any one of the existing Churches. There are too many historical and traditional causes or occasions, of separation, and even of hostility, between the Churches, to make that possible in the near future, even if it were desirable. But there is a plane on which all earnest Christians, of every name, may unite without the sacrifice of any Church preference, or prejudice, or of one iota of that dearly bought religious liberty for which Protestantism stands. That is the plane of Christian Life and Service.

The churches make and train disciples, or Christians, by different methods. But no matter how they are made, all Christians agree heartily in three or four very important things:

(1) They all have one common Lord and Saviour.

(2) They all believe in Him and love Him.

(3) They are all pledged to obey Him and to live His life, the Christian life, and

(4) They are all eager to extend His influence and authority in their community and beyond.

Here is a large field in which they may unite and work together without jealousy, in the cause of their one Lord and Master.

Let us suppose that most of the Christians of any small community were assembled for the consideration of this matter, in some common place of public meeting; a court house, public school building, or a hall; anywhere except in a church building. At this Assembly let us dispense with religious service or exercise of any kind. We do not pray alike, nor worship alike. We cannot yet commune together. These are facts which we might as well recognize, and let it go at that for the present. Let us all pray, and worship and commune in our own churches, each group in its own way, according to its own custom.

We are assembled here now, not for worship, or prayer, but for another purpose altogether. That is to see how far we Christian neighbors and friends, of different Churches, can agree to help each other live the Christian life; that beautiful life to which every member of every church, was solemnly pledged when he became a Christian.

The Christian life is a social life; it cannot be lived alone.

Alone it is impossible to develop "the fruits of the Spirit", the foundation of all Christian character and conduct. Except in the company, and with the help of other Christians, how can any one obey that one new commandment which Jesus laid on all His people: "That ye love one another?" How can anything that a single person can do, fulfill our Lord's prayer for His disciples: "That they all may be one, as thou Father art in me and I in thee, that they all may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou didst send me?"

He was not praying that all His people might have the same form of Church government, or of public worship, or of the Christian ministry, or that they might all pray alike. I doubt if He cared at all about these things, or about how they were made Christians: by one Church's method or another, so that they were made Christians. But you may be sure that He cares very much that their love and loyalty to Him should manifest itself by their obedience to His one, great commandment: "That ye love one another." "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the thing that I say?" "By this shall men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one for another." And He seems to recognize no other mark of discipleship than this: love of the brethren.

In every congregation of every church there are individuals trying earnestly to live the Christian life, each one for himself, in loneliness and isolation. And they are not getting very far with it, because they lack the help and cooperation of their Christian brethren. Here is the explanation of the utterly loveless lives, and unlovely characters of so many earnest Christian men and women, and, far too frequently, of Christian ministers, who are often the poorest exemplars in character and conduct of the beautiful religion that they preach. They are hardly to blame for this. They are simply trying to do the impossible: to live the Christian life and develop the Christian character, without the aid and cooperation of their Christian brethren. They have no clearly defined company of Christians, no visible family of God, to whom they can discharge the obligation to "Love the Brethren".. "Love the brotherhood", and to whom they can confidently look for the love and sympathy and cooperation which they so sorely need in their Christian walk and warfare. Now it is proposed that "all of us Christians here, who will agree to do so, bind ourselves together in a "Fellowship of the Christian Life", and try to carry out towards each other, our Lord's one commandment, that we "love one another". We do not propose to take any new pledges, or to make any new promises. We all pledged ourselves to do this when we became Christians. We now agree to recognize this little company of our Christian neighbors and friends, who will join us in this agreement, as the inner circle of the family of God to whom we owe the obligation to "love the brethren", "love the brotherhood".

"Of course, this does not mean that we cannot love any other brethren but these. No; we are at liberty to show that love just as far beyond the limits of this little circle as we can reach. But it does mean that we are going to begin right here with this little group that is nearest to us.

"Of course, too, love and loyalty towards this little group of our Christian friends and neighbors will not interfere, in the slightest degree, with the allegiance that we owe to our several churches. We are simply trying to carry into practice here, what all our churches preach as the one, new commandment of Jesus, "Love the brethren", "Love the brotherhood".

"We all know, too, that this love is not a feeling, or a sentiment, like the love between the sexes, or the love between parents and children, or between brothers and sisters, or congenial friends. But it is a principle of action, a motive of conduct, a spirit of kindness, courtesy, sympathy, helpfulness, such as the Good Samaritan, in our Lord's story, showed to the wounded Jew: that love that St. Paul described in the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians.

" 'Loving the brethren,' then, as our Lord requires, may mean a great deal more than this, but it means, at least this to begin with:

1. "That we will recognize every other member of this little company, who will agree to do likewise, as our brother and sister in Christ, and will take a real interest in their work and welfare.

2. "That we will pray for each other by name or collectively at least once each day in our private prayers, as our religion asks: 'Pray one for another, brethren.'

3. "That we will think no evil, see no evil, hear no evil and speak no evil of each other. 'Speak not evil one of another, brethren.'

4. "That we will look for and find in our brethren the Christ-like things, the lovely, creditable, praiseworthy things, and "think on these things" and speak of them to others.

5. "That if any ill feeling, or difference, should arise between us and any other member of this family of God, we will not allow it to fester in our hearts or minds to the injury of the whole body, but will at once take steps to settle it as our Lord prescribes in St. Matthew 18:15-18.

6. "That we will attempt to direct and govern our lives in all things, in relation to our Christian brethren as our Lord commands us to do; that we gladly accept Him as the Ruler and Guide of our lives, and will endeavor to keep His commandments and to walk in His ways all the days of our life."

It ought to be clearly understood that such a Fellowship of Christians of different Churches cannot, as an organization, recognize any other authority as to what they ought to do, or as to how they ought to do it, but that of our Lord Christ Himself. They are under His direct authority, instruction and guidance, and are pledged to do only His will as He makes it known to them by His Word and Holy Spirit.

ONE IN CHRIST.

"In Christ there is no East or West,
In Him no South or North.
But one great fellowship of love.
Throughout the whole wide earth.

In Him shall true hearts everywhere
Their high communion find;
His service is the golden cord
Close binding all mankind.

In Christ now meet both East and West,
In Him meet South and North.
All Christly souls are one in Him
Throughout the whole wide earth."

—John Oxenham.

THE SURRENDERED LIFE---IN CHRIST

Conducted by the Reverend Frank Cox

OUR Seminaries are supposed to be Schools of the Prophets, but how many times they fail to live up to expectations! Men go there expecting to have their faith grounded and settled, but too often have to leave more at sea than when they entered. They learn all about the Bible but very little of the Bible. What a difference it would make if our schools were firing men with a living faith in Christ and His power to redeem. The following experience from the life of that remarkable man, David James Burrell, for years the pastor of Marble Collegiate Church in New York City, shows how school and seminary affected him and how powerless the seminary was in leading him to faith in Christ. We might say that the seminary at that time was not by any means so far gone from the Gospel as it is today.

It seems that when a student at Yale he was caught up in the conflicting winds of controversy and little by little his old faith had vanished. When he had graduated he returned to his Western home to be met by his dear old mother with the news that she now expected him to study for the ministry. A terrible struggle ensued. He did not wish to grieve his mother, nor did he intend to assume the solemn vows of ordination unless he believed the Gospel. He had lost even the power of prayer. After three days he decided that he would attend a seminary and there try to recover his lost faith.

A year's course in Chicago at a liberal institution did him no good. He returned from his room after each class and the only prayer he could offer was, "Lord, help Thou my unbelief". A second year at Union Theological Seminary served him no better. One day a young news boy came to his room and asked that he would go to his dying father. "As I sat by his bed he looked at me and said, 'You are a pretty young man to tell an old man like me how to die'. I shall never forget that night! The old man began by asking me if I thought God would have mercy on an old sinner like him. I answered by quoting Wesley's lines:

" 'Betwixt the saddle and the ground,
Mercy sought is mercy found'.

" 'How do you know that?' I replied that Christ had said so. 'How do you know Christ said so?' I referred to the Bible as my authority. He said: 'Do you believe the Bible?' What could I answer? I lied to him, saying that I did. He asked me: 'Do you believe Jesus died for a low-down sinner like me?' I lied again and said that I did. 'How do you know that?' Again I referred to the Bible as authority. 'How do you know the Bible is true?' I did my best to explain—insincerely. But what could I do? The dying man shot questions at me all night, thrusting me metaphorically, from one corner of the room to another, and keeping his filming eyes on me as I sought to answer him.

"Oh, that dreary, monotonous night! I had never seen a man die before. At last the old man, who had been bred in a Highland home by Christian parents, began to remember and presently he was murmuring to himself the Scottish version of the Shepherd Psalm:

" 'The Lord's my shepherd, I'll not want;
He maketh me down to lie;
In pastures green, he leadeth me,
The quiet waters by.
Yea, though I walk through death's vale,
Yet will I wear no ill,
For Thou art with me, and Thy rod
And staff me comfort still.'

"The past was coming up before him. Presently he said, 'Pray with me.' I fell on my knees by his bedside and poured out my soul in the first real prayer I had offered in years. When I rose from my knees the old Scotchman had gone; the morning was dawning and I had reason to thank God that in trying to teach a sinner how to die, I had myself learned how to live. My faith had come back to me! I had discovered that henceforth there was no middle of the road for me. I must believe or disbelieve. Since then, thank God, I have never weakened.

"I am entering on my eighty-second year. For nearly half a century I have served in the ministry of Christ, and the memory of that night, in a tenement house on Eleventh Avenue, always abides with me. And the Lord Who has been my faithful keeper, will keep me to the end."

By the Right Reverend John Charles Ryle, D. D.

II.

I MUST now take up a question which is of great and serious importance. To prevent mistakes I shall state it as clearly and logically as I can. "What is the precise rank, authority, and position of the Thirty-nine Articles? Are they, or are they not, the chief, foremost, primary, and principal test of true Churchmanship?"

My reasons for going into this point are as follows: Some clergymen and laymen in the present day are fond of saying that the Prayer Book, and not the Articles, is the real measure and gauge of a Churchman. "The Prayer Book! The Prayer Book!" is the incessent cry of these people. "We want no other standard of doctrine but the Prayer Book." Is it a controverted point about the Church? What says the Prayer Book? Is it a doctrine that is disputed? What says the Prayer Book? Is it the effect of baptism, or the nature of the Lord's Supper, that is under discussion? What says the Prayer Book? To the Articles these gentlemen seem to have a peculiar dislike, an hydrophobic aversion. They seldom refer to them, unless perhaps to sneer at them as the "forty stripes save one". They never quote them, never bring them forward if they can possibly help it. What intelligent observer of religious questions among Churchmen does not know perfectly well the class of men whom I have in view? They are to be found all over England. We meet them in newspapers and books. We hear them in pulpits and on platforms. They are ever thrusting on the public their favorite "Diana of the Ephesians"—their darling notion that the Prayer Book, and not the Articles, is the test of a Churchman.

Now, with all respect to these worthy people, I venture to say that their favorite notion is as real an idol as the Ephesian "Diana" was of old. I shall try to show the reader that in exalting the Prayer Book above the Articles, they have taken up a position that cannot possibly be maintained. I shall try to show, by evidence that cannot be gainsayed, that the true state of the case is exactly the reverse of what they are so fond of proclaiming. I am not going to say anything against the Prayer Book. It is a matchless book of devotion. But I am going to say, and to prove, that the Articles, and not the Prayer Book, are the first, foremost, and principal test of a true Churchman.

I shall dismiss briefly four points that I might dwell upon at length, if it were worth while.

(a) I pass over the obvious suspiciousness of any Churchman ignoring the Articles, giving them the cold shoulder, and talking only about the Prayer Book, when he is speaking of the tests of a Churchman's religion. That many do so is quite needless to say. Yet the fifth Canon, of 1604, contains the following words: "Whosoever shall hereafter affirm that any of the Thirty-nine Articles agreed upon by the Archbishops and Bishops of both provinces, in the Convocation holden at London in the year of our Lord God 1562, for avoiding diversities of opinion, and establishing of consent touching true religion, are in any part superstitious, or erroneous, or such as he may not with a good conscience subscribe unto, let him be ex-communicated ipso facto, and not restored but only by the Archbishops, after his repentance and public revocation of such his wicked errors." Plain language that! Certain Churchmen who are fond of pelting Evangelical Churchmen with Canons would do well to remember that Canon.

(b) I pass over the implied insinuation that there is any contradiction between the Articles and the Prayer Book. Many talk and write as if there was. It is a notion unworthy of any one of common sense. The man who supposes that divines of such grace and learning as the Elizabethan Reformers would ever with the same hands draw up Articles and a Prayer Book containing two different doctrines, must be in a strange state of mind. Reason itself points out that the Prayer Book and Articles were meant to teach the same doctrines, and that no interpretation which makes them jar and contradict one another can be correct. Lord Chatham's famous dictum, that the Church of England has a Popish Liturgy, an Arminian clergy, and a Calvinistic set of Articles, was doubtless very smart, but it was not true.

(c) I pass over the unreasonableness of setting up a book of devotion, like the Liturgy, as a better test of Churchmanship than a Confession of faith like the Articles. Prayers, in the very nature of things, are compositions which are not so precisely framed and worded as cold, dry, dogmatic statements of doctrine. They are what the rhetorical speech of the advocate is, compared to the cautiously-balanced decision of the judge. "In the Prayer Book," says Dean Goode, "we have a collection of national formularies of devotion, written at a time when a large proportion of the people were inclined to Romanism, and at the same time compelled to attend the services of the national Churches, and consequently carefully drawn up, so as to give as little offence as possible to Romish prejudices. Is such a book calculated to serve the purposes of a standard of faith?" "In the Articles," he adds, on the other hand, "we have a precise Confession of faith on all the great points of Christian doctrine, drawn up in dogmatic propositions, as a test of doctrinal soundness for the clergy." The Liturgy is an excellent book. But to say that in the nature of things it can serve the purpose of a standard of faith so well as the Articles, is absurd.

(d) I pass over the glaring foolishness of the common remark, that those who are fond of maintaining the primary authority of the Articles cast discredit upon the Creeds. The authors of this notable charge must surely have forgotten that one whole Article—the eighth—is devoted to the three Creeds! So far from the admirers of the Articles dishonoring and disparaging the Creeds, they are specially bound to honor, reverence, and defend them. Such vague argumentation goes far to show that many who speak lightly of the Articles do not even know what the Articles contain! They "speak evil of things which they know not" (Jude 10).

But I pass over all these points. I desire to go straight to the mark, and to give direct proofs of the position that I take up. What I deliberately assert is, that the Thirty-nine Articles were always intended to be, and are at this day, the first, foremost, chief, and principal test of a Churchman, and that in this point of view there is nothing else that stands on a level with them. In proof of this assertion I shall now bring forward a few witnesses.

(1) My first witness shall be a very simple one. I mean the title of the Articles, which is prefixed to them in every complete and unmutilated Prayer Book. They are called, "Articles agreed upon for the avoiding of Diversities of Opinion, and for the stabilizing of Consent touching true Religion". This title was first given to them by Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the reign of Edward VI., 1552; and afterwards given a second time by Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, in 1562. I want no plainer language than the words of this title. The man who tries to get away from it and evade it is like a viper biting a file.

(2) My second witness shall be the statute law of the realm. I refer to two Acts of Parliament. One is called the Thirteenth of Elizabeth, cap. 12, and entitled, "An act for Ministers of the Church to be of sound religion". The other Act is called the Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth Victoria, cap. 122, and is entitled, "An Act to Amend the Law as to the declarations and subscriptions to be made, and Oaths to be taken by the Clergy", and was passed in the year 1865.

The Act of Elizabeth, in the second section declares, that "if any person ecclesiastical, or which shall have any ecclesiastical living, shall advisedly maintain or affirm any doctrine directly contrary or repugnant to any of the said Thirty-nine Articles; and being convicted before the Bishop of the Diocese, or the Ordinary, or before the Queen's Commissioner in causes ecclesiastical, shall persist therein, or not revoke his error, or after such revocation affirm such untrue doctrine, such maintaining, or affirming, or persisting shall be just cause to deprive such person of his ecclesiastical functions; and it shall be lawful for the Bishop of the diocese, or Ordinary, or such Commissioner, to deprive such person."

Comment on the evidence of this witness is needless. There is no way of honestly evading the edge and point of this yet unrepealed Act of Parliament. In a decision of all the judges, in the twenty-third year of Elizabeth, it was declared that the Act of Thirteenth Elizabeth was made for avoiding a diversity of opinion, and that the "prevention of such diversity was the scope of the statute" (Coke's Instut. 1865). The provisions of this Act of Elizabeth are in full force at this very day, and form the basis of any proceedings against a clergyman in matters of religion.

The Act of the Twenty-ninth of Victoria is even more remarkable than the Thirteenth of Elizabeth. The seventh section requires every person instituted to any living, on the first Lord's Day in which he officiates in his church, "publicly and openly in the presence of his congregation, to read the whole Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, and immediately after reading to make the declaration of assent to them".

Up to the year 1865, we must remember, a clergyman was required to read over the whole Morning and Evening Service as well as the Articles, and then declare his assent and consent to the use of the Book of Common Prayer. This was dispensed with by the Act of Victoria. But the requirement to read the Thirty-nine Articles was carefully retained! The result is, that every beneficed clergyman in the Church of England has not only declared his assent to the Thirty-nine Articles, but has done it in the most public way, after reading them over before his congregation.

(3) My third witness shall be the Royal Declaration prefixed to the Articles in 1628, by King Charles I. It is a document which will be found at length in every complete and unmutilated Prayer Book. It contains the following passage: "We hold it most agreeable to this our Kingly office, and our own religious zeal, to conserve and maintain the Church committed to our charge, in unity of true religion, and in the bond of peace; and not to suffer unnecessary disputations, altercations, or questions to be raised, which may nourish faction both in the Church and Commonwealth. We have, therefore, upon mature deliberation, and with the advice of so many of our Bishops as might conveniently be called together, thought fit to make this declaration following:

"That the Articles of the Church of England (which have been allowed and authorized heretofore, and which our clergy generally have subscribed unto) do contain the true doctrine of the Church of England agreeable to God's Word: which we do, therefore, ratify and confirm, requiring all our loving subjects to continue in the uniform profession thereof, and prohibiting the least difference from the said Articles." Admirable words these! Well, it would have been if the unhappy Monarchs who put forth this declaration, had afterwards adhered more decidedly to the doctrine of the Articles, and not ruined himself and the Church by patronizing and supporting such men as Archbishop Laud.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

Lesson—No. 32.

Topic—The Distinction God Makes Between True Believers and Mere Professors.

(Read 2 Peter 2:1-22; Jude 1:1-4.)

The Holy Scripture gives much warning concerning conditions that shall prevail in the world with respect to false teachings, in faithful preachers, and ungodly "professors" who seek to "change the truth of God into a lie". God has not left us without a dependable test, however, by which to determine the true, and the false, "for if they speak not according to the written Word, it is because there is no light in them".—Isa. 8:20; 1 John 2:22; Gal. 1:6-7.

We need to remember that the Heavenly Father knoweth them that are His, and He also knoweth those who are false. Judgment, however belongs alone to Christ, before whom the unbelieving "professor" must some day render an account, but it is important that the Lord's people in order to note compromise their responsibilities, be able to distinguish between the true and the false.

THE TRUE BELIEVER.

1. Is saved.—Rom. 10:9.
2. Follows Christ.—John 10:27.
3. Is a faithful witness.—1 Tim. 6:12.
4. Has Christ within.—Eph. 3:17.

8. A fellow-helper to the truth.—3 John 8.
9. Belongs to the Lord.—2 Tim. 2:19.
10. Will find an open door.—Matt. 25:10.
11. Will be rewarded.—Col. 3:24.
12. Kept by power of God.—1 Peter 1:5.
13. Blessedly encouraged.—Luke 12:32.
14. Will be presented faultless.—Jude 1:24.

THE PROFESSOR.

1. Will perish.—2 Thess. 2:10.
2. Followeth not.—John 10:12.
3. Professes only.—Titus 1:16.
4. Heart not right.—Acts 8:21.
5. Filled with hypocrisy.—Matt. 23:28.

A LETTER.

April 11, 1928.

The Reverend ————————,
————————.

Dear ————:

Your letter of the seventh, with enclosure, has been received, in which you say that fairness demands that your attached letter be published in The Southern Churchman, and that we are morally bound to publish such letters as yours in our paper.

From the standpoint of fairness, courtesy, and good morals, we feel that we are bound not to publish such letters as yours of April 7, but that the proper place for them is in the waste basket.

First, such letters as yours are not fair, because they contain grossly false misrepresentations of myself and my associates in the publication of The Southern Churchman and the ends which we have in view.

In the second place, your letter contains a grossly false insinuation and I believe that you knew well that you were painting a false picture when you said:

> "And that he, who was elected to his present position by no one because of his fitness for it, but occupies it simply because he had the money to buy a majority of the stock and wished to do so, that his faith and spiritual attitude are the criteria by which the Seminary should be judged and that he alone is in step in trying to follow our Blessed Lord."

The above paragraph is untrue, and you cannot point out one single statement in my letters published in the Churchman where I have claimed any special merit for myself or where it could be honestly interpreted that I thought that I alone am in step in trying to follow our Blessed Lord.

Now, again, the above statement is grossly discourteous, and if you have any of the inherited instincts of your esteemed father, my friend, the Reverend ————————, you will readily realize that you have gone out of your way to be discourteous.

There is not the slightest ground for your insinuation that I charged that all the members of the faculty of the Virginia Theological Seminary have become heretical and unfaithful to our Lord.

Lastly, from the standpoint of good morals, I should not publish a statement made by the son of a friend of mine who was sound in the faith and believed in the Inspiration of the Bible and who believed that the Holy, Inspired Bible was one of God's greatest gifts to men, when I believe that the publication of that letter will show up the son in the most undesirable light of a slanderer, or as one suffering from self-conceit, ignorance, and error, who has indulged himself in idle words and vain conversations, possibly at the instance of some one who is interested in propagating Unitarian or Modernistic views in the Episcopal Church.

You say in your letter:

> "The titles that you have given the letters attacking the Seminary have featured the word 'Seminary'."

You are hereby challenged to prove the truth of this statement. In my opinion, the most critical article on the present faculty of the Virginia Theological Seminary is the one dated March 24, 1928, the headline of which is as follows:

> "BIBLE LEADERS VS. 'PROPAGANDA SHEET' AND SPECIMEN FRUIT FROM A VENERABLE TREE."

as per enclosed, from which you will see that the word "Seminary" does not appear at all.

My position in connection with The Southern Churchman is very clear to those who are willing to see the light and truth. Some years ago my father was requested by Bishop Whittle to get a few of his friends, including Mr. Fortesque Whittle, Mr. S. W. Travers, Mr. Joseph Bryan, Mr. Burke, of Alexandria, and a few other leading Churchmen, to take over The Southern Churchman from Dr. Sprigg, in order to insure the paper's being run on true Virginia Church Evangelical lines on the same basis of belief as that on which Dr. Sprigg had previously directed the paper, as at that time Dr. Sprigg had come so near the end of his life's journey that he wanted to be relieved from the burden of continuing the paper.

Before my Father passed away he gave me some of the stock of The Southern Churchman, with the request that we try to help the paper continue on evangelical, orthodox lines, free from the taints of Unitarianism and Modernism, and free from the unnecessary frills of Romanism.

By accident, more or less, the paper got into the hands of some editors who seemed to me to feel that they had the right to treat God's Holy, Inspired Word as they treated Aesop's Fables; therefore, I decided, when the opportunity offered itself, to secure control of the paper and have it directed by some clear-thinking, simple faith, and simple hearted believers in the Inspired Bible. To this end I am bending my energies in so far as The Southern Churchman goes.

As to the Virginia Theological Seminary, my position is that this institution has turned out some most holy and consecrated men in the past, and at the present time has some most consecrated orthodox believers among its faculty, although at the same time it has today, in my opinion, two or more members of the faculty who are unfit to be teachers of young men, because by their public utterances, they seem to me to encourage entirely too free, active criticism of the Bible and who seem to believe that a number of the miracles of the Old and New Testaments are allegories or the same as Aesop's Fables. If once we believe in the omnipotence and omniscience of God, how can there be any trouble in believing in any miracle mentioned in the Bible, either in the Old or in the New Testament?

Some of the most common points of criticism mentioned by the Modernistic preachers are the miracle of the sun stopping for Joshua, and Jonah and the Whale. If God made the universe, including the sun, moon, and stars, and the earth, He can stop or start them at will. If God made the whale and made Jonah, He could easily arrange for Jonah to stay in the whale's belly for a day or a month.

Getting down to details, the statement of Mr. Thomas Nelson at the Richmond Conference sounded to me as if he was suffering from a terrible case of self-conceit, ignorance, and error. Furthermore, a friend of mine living in Alexandria, told me that some years ago ————————, while teaching a Sunday-school class of which my friend was a member, ridiculed one or more of the miracles of the Old Testament.

From the most reliable and trustworthy witnesses who have attended the Seminary, including one student who visited me in the past thirty days, I have reached the conclusion that the Virginia Theological Seminary today needs two great, strong, deep-thinking believers in the Inspired Word of God in places of Messrs. ———— and ————————, who, in my opinion, are not sufficiently deep-thinking and learned scholars and of sufficiently simple faith to be the best kind of guides for young men studying to be ministers.

I am receiving almost daily the strongest kind of letters of commendation and encouragement from laymen in the Church, from ministers, and from Bishops, including two from Bishops, one dated March 29, 1928, and one April 7, 1928. This one dated April 7, 1928, is from one of the leading Bishops of the Church, and in it he says:

> "God bless The Southern Churchman. It cheers me standing for the things I was taught in Virginia Seminary."

We presume this Bishop attended the Seminary probably forty years ago, when the faculty was not afflicted, so far as I know, with any self-styled smart critics of the Bible, suffering from self-conceit, ignorance, and error.

The Virginia Theological Seminary has a right to be proud of the wonderful work done by that great Institution in the past and of some of the work done by some of the members of the faculty at this time, but I believe that the Unitarians and Modernists in the Episcopal Church are making a heavy drive at the Virginia Theological Seminary to control it in the interest of their party in the Church and one of the instruments being used is soft soap, adulation, and flattery, vicious and false abuse of The Southern Churchman, and various other means unworthy of any one calling himself a minister of God.

I have today received a letter from one of our Church members, dated April 7, reading as follows:

> "Please, next week, send my copy of blessed paper to ————————, where I go to try out some case of nursing. I hope soon to send year's subscription for this paper I know not how to live without."

Such letters as the above we are constantly receiving.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd) Langbourne M. Williams,
President.

P. S.—You are at liberty to show this letter to any one, and, if you desire to do so, you can send a copy to any member of the faculty of the Virginia Theological Seminary.

MORALS FOR MINISTERS: By R. E. X. Cloth. Pp. 151. The Macmillan Company, New York. Price, $1.50.

If the writer had but offered the title, the reader could supply a mass of suggestions. Morals for Ministers! Why, we had supposed that no ethical code could be necessary for such a superlatively excellent company of men. Yet, the author brings us down to earth; and we are compelled to recognize the need. He does not assume that an Elmer Gantry really exists in the ranks of the clergy. But gently and kindly does he disclose the pitfalls and snares which attend the way of the servant of God. His chapter on laziness is provokingly brief. One smacks his lips as he prepares to chew this precious tidbit. But the vital effect of the chapter is to set up thinking, which, after all, is the very germ of power in any writing. We may quite agree with him that laziness is not a common clerical fault; the rather the disposition to do the most agreeable and easily accomplished task is the usual failing. Here are some of the headings: Motives; Optimism and Pessimism; Humility; Self-Glory; Personal Peculiarities; Money (some of us would like to have a hand at that chapter); Women; Scribes and Pharisees. Get the book, Mr. Parson, put it into your summer kit and dig into it while on your vacation. You will come back to your work better equipped. And you, Mr. Layman, may care to give it to your pastor. He will thank you.

CAMPAIGNS OF THE ARMY OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA, INCLUDING THE JACKSON VALLEY CAMPAIGN—1861-1865: Vivian Minor Fleming. William Byrd Press, Richmond, Virginia.

Vivian Minor Fleming, the author of the book entitled "Campaigns of the Army of Northern Virginia, Including the Jackson Valley Campaign, 1861-1865" had a peculiarly good opportunity to study the campaigns of the Army of Northern Virginia as a soldier taking part in these campaigns and seeing much of their technical side. At the outbreak of the War Between the States he enlisted in the Second Company of the Richmond Howitzers and participated in all the principal engagements of the Army of Northern Virginia from Seven Pines to Fredericksburg.

In the latter engagement his half-brother, Colonel Lewis Minor Coleman, professor of Latin in the University of Virginia, was killed and, after it, Mr. Fleming was promoted to the rank of Sergeant Major in the First Regiment of Engineers. There have seldom been better Engineers than those of the Army of Northern Virginia, and in the First Engineers Mr. Fleming had an admirable schooling in the first campaign of modern war. It was in the trenches of Petersburg in the long siege of 1864-65 that modern defensive warfare began, and the contribution to it of the Confederate Engineers were notable. So effective were these fortifications that they held perfectly against an army which numbered from four to five of the Federals to one of the Confederates, and as time went on, the odds were even greater than that—they held to the very last.

In the long years that followed the great struggle, Mr. Fleming devoted much of his leisure to the study of the battlefields around Fredericksburg. It was very fitting, then, that when a Commission was appointed in 1925 to map the battlefields of Spotsylvania County, Mr. Fleming should be appointed a member.

The work of this Commission was embodied in a bill introduced by the Hon. S. Otis Bland, member from the First Virginia District. The bill provided for the creation of a Battlefield Park and passed Congress in February, 1927. An appropriation followed in the succeeding Session, and a Commission consisting of Mr. V. M. Fleming, with General John L. Clem and Captain George F. Hobson, was appointed to carry into effect the provision of the Act.

The present book is the product of the author's reminiscences, supplemented by the study of the official records of all the principal writers on both sides. While much has been written about that marvelous organization, much remains to be written, and Mr. Fleming's contribution is a notable addition to the literature of the subject as well as the fruit of a labor of love.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart" (Psalm 119:11).

This week the following verse was submitted by Mrs. M. E. Hodgson, of Columbia, Virginia:

> "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—St. John 3:16.

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not ho'd himself responsible for such opinions.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MR. FREDERIC MOREHOUSE, EDITOR OF THE LIVING CHURCH.

Dear Sir:

I am in receipt of a communication from your office setting forth the conspicuous merits of your paper, and inviting me to become a subscriber. Now, I make no doubt, that these claims are entirely trustworthy and yet must respectfully decline.

I do so because I am satisfied that the main policy, in fact the raison d'etre of The Living Church, is to promote the program, by which, the "Catholic" Faction aims to Romanize the Episcopal Church. This purpose is now (no longer relying on "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain") openly avowed and publicly proclaimed by the leaders of this threatened Schism. And this program, to overlay the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church, with the errors, condemned by Wycliffe, Huss, and the martyrs of the "Bloody Mary" epoch; this iniquitous program, these leaders propose to carry out, notwithstanding, and in contempt of, this solemn Ordination vows. They, in effect, propose, while eating the bread of "this Church", to betray it.

But the "Articles of Religion", as established by the Bishops, the Clergy and Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America in Convention on the twelfth day of September, in the year of our Lord 1801" (see Prayer Book), these Articles (the Thirty-nine) I say, presented an unsightly and inconvenient barrier there in the Prayer Book (where they logically and rightly belonged), and must somehow be scrapped. The entering wedge was supplied by your motion in the last General Convention, to remove them from the Prayer Book.

Apparently you did not anticipate the storm which this "gesture" excited, and made a futile effort since to smoothe over matters and allay excitement, by criticising the Articles on their literary merits, thus attempting to put the motive for getting rid of them on other than doctrinal grounds. E. G. Their style was archaic, "involved", they were "hard to understand", etc. But I submit that your real objective is the fact that they are so easily understood and seem to contradict "Catholic" propaganda.

Respectfully,

J. H. Tillinghast.

A SUGGESTION.

Mr. Editor:

As a layman, interested in the welfare of the Church, I suggest that representatives of the Anglo-Catholics, Evangelicals and Liberals hold a series of informal conferences to try to establish a modus vivendi, so that we may have comparative peace and brotherly consideration, instead of mutual suspicion and innuendo, in the one Household of Faith. The present situation is a discredit to the Church and is doing untold spiritual damage to many Christian souls. Why not make an effort to settle our differences in a Christian manner so that the Church may not be hindered in doing her work in the world? If we can confer in charity with other Christian bodies why can we not do so among ourselves?

"SELF-RESPECT."

Mr. Editor:

Self-support is but another name for self-respect. Is the Church doing its best to promote the "Self-Respect" of the colored people to whom it ministers? I am glad that much interest is being displayed on behalf of the American Church Institute for Negroes; but the thing that has been uppermost with me during the forty years I have been in the ministry has been to promote the "self-respect" of the people of the group of which I am a part. When I recall to memory the kindly aid which such men as Messrs. Joseph Bryan, John L. Williams, and Joseph Wilmer ever gave me, I never cease to remember the earnestness of their urge of "self-respct".

Out of some three hundred colored congregations among the colored people which we have in this country, only thirty-eight or thirty-nine of them are "self-supporting", despite our constant succor of them. Two of these are in the New England Province, reporting an aggregate of seven hundred and ninety-two communicants; nine are in the Province of New York and New Jersey, with an aggregate communicant list of 7,330; ten are in the Province of Washington, with an aggregate of 4,201 communicants; nine are in the Province of Sewanee with an aggregate of 2,412 communicants; five are in the Province of the Mid-West with 3,420 communicants; two in the Province of the Northwest with 518 communicants; and one in the Province of the Southwest with 451 communicants.

I venture the opinion, in the light of the expenditure we are making, through the American Church Institute for Negroes, as well as through the National Council, for clerical support, some more efficient plan ought to be discovered whereby increasing self-respect of the colored people of our missions, especially in the Provinces of Sewanee and the Southwest, may be made manifest.

It is worthy of note that out of about 36,000 colored communicants reported from about three hundred congregations, more than half of the number are included in these thirty-eight or thirty-nine colored self-supporting parishes.

BISHOP BECKWITH PASSES TO LIFE ETERNAL.

All that was mortal of the Rt. Rev. Charles Minnegerode Beckwith, D. D., was interred in Greenwood Cemetery, Montgomery, Alabama, at noon, Friday, April 20. Bishop Beckwith entered into rest Wednesday, April 18.

Bishop Beckwith was born on the third of June, 1851, in Prince George County, Virginia. He received his B. A. degree at the University of Georgia in 1873. He studied the Theological Course at the Berkeley Divinity School. In 1881, he was ordained deacon, and in 1882, priest. He served at St. Luke Cathedral, Atlanta, Georgia; Christ Church, Houston, Texas; Trinity Church, Galveston, Texas, and as General Missionary to the Diocese of Texas. On the seventeenth of December, 1902, he was consecrated Bishop of Alabama. In the same year the University of the South conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. This year also saw the publication of two of Bishop Beckwith's books, "The Teachers' Companion to the Trinity Course" and "Rightly Instructed in God's Holy Word". He also wrote "The Trinity Course of Church Instruction", which was published in 1897. The Southern Churchman had the privilege a very short while ago (March 31, 1928) of publishing a review of Bishop Beckwith's most recent volume, "The Book of Common Prayer".

Funeral services for Bishop Beckwith were conducted in the Church of the Ascension, by the Rt. Rev. Wm. G. McDowell, D. D., assisted by the Rt. Rev Frederick F. Reese, D. D., of Georgia, and the Rt. Rev. Theodore DuBose Bratton, D. D., of Mississippi. The Ven. V. G. Lowery, the Rev. Edmunds Bennett, Ph. D., and the rector, the Rev. P. N. McDonald, also took part in the service. At least thirty of the clergy of the diocese were present.

A great number of floral tributes of surpassing beauty were sent by friends and admirers of the deceased prelate. The interment took place under torrential rains, as though high Heaven shared in the mourning of the Church for the loss of this stalwart soldier and faithful servant of Christ.

Unique Gift to St. Paul's Memorial Church.

St. Paul's Memorial Church at the University of Virginia has recently received a gift of $1,000 in a most unique manner. There is, in the University, a society known as The Seven Society. The membership is unknown outside its own ranks and the Society is in evidence only through the placing of its sign in certain places in and around the University, and through its gifts to worthy objects. It has been in existence for a number of years and has made many contributions to the University in the form of scholarships, endowment, etc.

The rector of St. Paul's Memorial Church recently received a letter, quietly left for him in the parish house, asking the cost of placing a pew in the new church. To this he replied. Immediately he received, in the same way, the following letter:

"Dear Parson: The Seven Society, after observing for many years the work of St. Paul's Church and seeing its intimate contact with the life of the University, is very anxious to place a pew in it.

"We wish the regular bronze tablet to bear nothing but the sign which appears at the head of this paper (the official sign of The Seven Society).

You will find one thousand dollars in cash in a small container which will be placed seventy-seven paces from the bottom step of the rounda, on a direct line from the main entrance of the rotunda to that of Cabell Hall. Please get this between 11:07 and 11:17 P. M., on Friday, April 13, and go alone.

"With best wishes,

"The Seven Society."

The announcement of the gift was made on Sunday, April 15, and the letter above quoted, was read by the rector, who stated that, in his judgment, this gift on the part of The Seven Society to St. Paul's, was an act which typified the real spirit of the student body of the University.

Those who know St. Paul's Church and the work which it has done at the University of Virginia, feel that this action by what is believed to be an undergraduate organization, is an expression of the confidence felt by the student body in the Church and an evidence of its value in the community.

History Made at Halifax Conference.

In St. John's Church, Halifax, April 20, history was made in the missionary work of the Episcopal Church. So far as can be ascertained the Missionary Conference held there was the first of its nature in the rural church of that denomination. There were gathered two hundred Episcopalians from five counties, Halifax, Pittsylvania, Charlotte, Mecklenburg and Lunenburg. Many people drove fifty or sixty miles to hear the message of the ambassadors of Christ, who have been carrying the story of the Cross into heathen lands. Alaska, Africa, China and Cuba alike contributed their portions to the feast of accomplishment of the soldiers of the cross who have left home and loved ones to strive on the far flung battle line of sin and darkness, ignorance and superstition. Most touching were the stories of men and women like ourselves whose lives have been seared by heathen darkness and to whom at last was brought the cheering rays from the Sun of Righteousnes.

The Conference opened promptly at half past ten with a fifteen minute service conducted by the rector. The Rev. A. M. Sherman, D. D., for twenty-nine years a missionary in China and at present of Boone College there, gave a graphic account of the turmoil, which has existed for years in that great Empire.

Miss Marion Kirk, who has just returned from Liberia where she has been a nurse in the Episcopal Hospital at Cape Mount, was extremely happy in her portrayal of the wonderful work done by the Church in that Dark Continent. Liberia is a small republic on the west coast of Africa and the only nation in that continent ruled by the black man. She stated that there are no doctors there and except for the ministrations of the nurses at St. Timothy's Hospital, the people go without medical care.

The thoughts of the congregation were brought back from across the sea by Mrs. H. W. Whichard, the Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary. This organization of women has given itself loyally to the support of missions, at the present time supporting one hundred and forty-eight women missionaries in the various fields of work.

Mrs. Grafton Burke delighted her audience with her word pictures of conditions in Alaska beyond the Arctic Circle. She, with her husband, has been working in the Hudson Stuck Memorial Hospital at Fort Yukon, where the thermometer often goes fifty below zero.

Bishop B. D. Tucker, Bishop of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, brought the message of the work of the Church here in our own diocese. Speaking particularly of the rural work, he said: "The people of this grand old state have not left the Church, but the Church has left the people."

Archdeacon Steel, in telling of the work in Cuba, brought out the fact that many people were not married and many children were not baptized, because the fees in the only church they knew were so high that they often could not afford them. After the missionaries of the Episcopal Church went to Cuba they performed many marriage ceremonies for people already living together and baptized many children heretofore neglected.

The roll call of churches showed the following attendance: Halifax County: Halifax, 40; South Boston, 23; Mountain Road, 4; Clarkton, 18; Pittsylvania County: Danville, 32; Dry Fork, 8; Chatham, 9; Peytonsburg, 18; Charlotte County: Drakes Branch, 5; Mecklenburg County: Boydton, 6; Chase City, 4; Clarksville, 4; Lunenburg County: Victoria, 16. There were one from Blackstone and two from Lynchburg. Besides these there were a number of visitors from the other denominations filling the church to overflowing.

Missions in the Colored Churches.

The Rev. Arthur V. Colston, of Buchanan, recently conducted interesting missions in the two churches for Colored people in the diocese: The Chapel of the Good Shepherd at Lynchburg and St. Philip's Church at Bedford, both of which are under the rectorship of the Rev. Charles L. Somers of Lynchburg. Mr. Colston was at Bedford from February 19 to 24, and his mission there was very well attended. Especially noteworthy was the excellent cooperation of other Colored congregations of the town. Mr. Colston's firts service was conducted in the Baptist Church. On Thursday evening, and on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday the services were held in St. Philip's Church. He also addressed the children in the Colored school.

The mission at the Chapel of the Good Shepherd, Lynchburg, was begun on Sunday evening, March 18, and ended on the evening of the twenty-third. All of these services were held in the Chapel of the Good Shepherd except the one on Friday evening, which was in the Colored Baptist Church on Court Street, and at which were present both the Baptist and Presbyterian ministers. An interesting feature at one or more of the services at Lynchburg was the music rendered by a boys' band, composed of thirty-five boys connected with the congregation of the Chapel of the Good Shepherd. This band is considered a distinct asset in the work there.

Improvements at Grace Church, Buchanan.

Grace Church, near Buchanan, Va., of which the Rev. Arthur V. Colston is rector, was recently the recipient of two handsome gifts: a Bishop's chair and lectern. These were presented by the rector and congregation of Trinity Church, at Ossining, N. Y., through Mrs. Richard Sheridan, a member of the Ossining Church and formerly a member of Grace Church. The congregation of Grace Church is now planning a rearrangement of its chancel, and Mrs. S. D. Jameson is having made a new altar that will be in keeping with the new Bishop's chair and lectern.

The Rev. Mr. Mead Returns.

The Rev. G. Otis Mead, rector of Christ Church, Roanoke, and Mrs. Mead, who have been spending the winter in Florida, have returned to Roanoke, and Mr. Meade conducted service in his church on Sunday, April 1. Last fall the vestry gave Mr. Mead a leave of absence in order that he might regain his strength after a period of illness. He is now back at work greatly improved in health.

A special feature of the Palm Sunday service was the formal acceptance of a beautiful mural painting given by the Women's Service League of the Church in memory of the women of the congregation who have passed to their reward. The painting occupies the space above the altar and reredos in a recessed panel of the chancel wall. This arched recess is framed by a gothic tracery of oak. The painting represents the ascension of Christ with two angels disposed in the lower part of the panel. The colors are luminous and harmonious. The chancel has been additionally enriched by ornamentation. The work was designed and executed by the J. & R. Lamb Studios of New York City.

Bishop Lines' Memorial.

Foreseeing that the opening of new avenues of egress from New York City will inevitably bring into the commutation area of Northern New Jersey a great influx of new population, the Episcopal Diocese of Newark starts this week a thirteen-day campaign for the raising of an endowment fund of $1,000,000. The proceeds of this fund will go towards financing church expansion adapted to the varying needs which the next decade is expected to bring.

Just such an endowment as this was the vision of the late Edwin Stevens Lines, of the Diocese of Newark, who died October 25, 1927. Therefore, it seems eminently fitting that the Episcopalians of that Diocese are dedicating this new fund to the memory of Bishop Lines, who conceived the idea and gave much effort to it.

WASHINGTON.

Huguenot Memorial Service.

The Huguenot Society of Washington, which includes members from the District of Columbia, Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware, instigated a Huguenot Memorial Service, commemorating the promulgation of the Edict of Nantes which was held in St. John's Church, Sixteenth Street, on April 13.

The memorial service was given in English by the Rev. Dr. Florian J. C. Vurpillot, President of the Huguenot Society, and Vicar of the French congregation of St. John's Church.

The offering, as announced, was for a memorial of the Huguenot leader, Admiral Gaspard de Coligny. The Huguenot Hymn, La Cavenole, was sung for the first time in Washington. The French services. conducted in St. John's Church every Sunday afternoon by Dr. Vurpillot, are attracting numbers of people from all over the city.

"The Forerunner."

The second edition of the "Forerunner" has made its appearance and is full of interest from many angles. This magazine is being published under the direction of Bishop Freeman and the Convention Committee and appears to be an excellent way to stimulate interest in the Convention and to assure adequate preparation for its coming. The current issue contains, in addition to interesting articles and news items, beautiful pictures of Washington buildings and scenes. Further information about the Convention may be obtained by writing to the Editors, care of the Diocesan House, 1329 K Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Wedding.

A wedding of interest to Church people in Washington, took place recently in St. John's Church, Sixteenth Street, when Miss Katharine V. Wylie was married to the Rev. Frederic Cunningham Lawrence, son of the Rt. Rev. William Lawrence, who performed the ceremony.

Bishop Lawrence was assisted by the Rev. Dr. Robert Johnston, rector of St. John's Church, and others in the chancel were the Rev. George Gardner Monks, the Rev. Henry Hobson, the Rev. Samuel M. Shoemaker, the Rev. David Eaton, the Rev. William Cleveland Hicks and the Rev. Hugh F. Sawbridge. Other clergymen present were the Rev. W. Appleton Lawrence, who was best man for his brother, and the Rev. Leslie Glenn, who served as an usher.

Visitors to National Cathedral.

The Committee for the Building of the National Presbyterian Church in Washington, headed by Dr. Charles Wood, chairman, and pastor of the Church of the Covenant, visited recently the Washington Cathedral, spending some time viewing its completed chapels and the general progress of the work. They were received and welcomed by Canon Rudd in the name of the Bishop and Dean of Washington and the Cathedral Chapter.

Meeting.

The annual meeting of the committees of the National Cathedral Association will be held at Mount St. Alban on Ascension Day, Thursday, May 17, in conjunction with the laying of the cornerstone of the College of Preachers' Building. This is regarded as an important movement in the history of the Cathedral undertaking. Details of the program of the day will be announced later.

St. Mark's-on-the-Hill.

On Easter Day first services were held in the newly-completed church building of St. Mark's-on-the-Hill, Pikesville, the Rev. Roger A. Walke, M. A., rector. The church is the second unit of a proposed group which will eventually include a cloister and a great tower. The church is built of native stone, without and within, with heavy hewn beams, the effect of the whole being that of an English parish church. Somehow the appearance of age has been given to a new building.

Services were held throughout Easter Day, the chief one being at eleven o'clock, when the Most Rev. John Gardner Murray presided and confirmed a class, the second which the parish has presented this winter. At this service the Bishop blessed the many memorials, including an altar of Indiana limestone; candlesticks, flower vases, an exquisite altar cloth, and fair linen; a stone credence table, and a light to illuminate a very beautiful window of our Lord and the two Disciples at Emmau, which was first placed in the old St. Mark's, by its founders, Mr. adn Mrs. Charles K. Harrison. This window will be lighted every night and will be visible to the hundreds of suburban dwellers who pass St. Mark's each evening.

Other memorials and fittings include a fine organ; a font of rustic Indiana limestone with a cover of beaten copper, standing on a raised platform at the entrance door, with a fine wrought iron railing around it. The corner opposite this font has been fitted out and was dedicated for the children. The Bishop in his sermon spoke most feelingly of the new life that comes to us at Easter, of the old church building every one had loved so well, and of the beautiful new building we should soon love, the new springing from the old.

The architects of the church are Messrs. Taylor and Fisher of Baltimore, who also built the parish house. The contractor was Thomas Hickes & Son, Inc., and the stone work was done by Ruff & Son. The altar was made by Rullman & Wilson.

Continuing Committee.

As a result of a day's discussion on the "Cause and Cure of War", held recently in Baltimore, a Continuing Committee has been appointed, which will attempt by study groups to follow-up the work of the Conference. The Committee will be made up of two members from each of the ten cooperating organizations, which called the original conference. Mrs. Roger A. Walke is Chairman.

Largest Class.

On the evening of March 14 Bishop Coadjutor Helfenstein visited St. James' First African Church, Baltimore, and administered Confirmation to a class of fifty persons, twenty-nine males and twenty-one females. This is the largest class in the history of the parish, now more than one hundred years old.

Easter Offering for Japan.

Departing from the prevalent custom among churches of designating the Easter collection for parish purposes, St. James' Episcopal Church, Madison Avenue and Seventy-first Street, has assigned its Easter contributions to the work of St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo, Japan, and announces that $7,500 was received Easter Sunday for this purpose The hospital, which is one of the most important institutions of the Episcopal Church, was founded in 1900 by Dr. Rudolph B. Teusler, as a one-room dispensary with one nurse and one assistant. When the World War interrupted its growth it had attained to eighty beds and a staff of thirty nurses, ten Japanese and three doctors. Plans are now under way for the new building to replace the old one completely destroyed in the great earthquake of 1924.

Generous Gift.

At the annual service of the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, Sunday afternoon, March 25, the Rev. L. Ernest Sunderland, D. D., superintendent of the society, announced a gift of $350,000, received from the estate of Mrs. John Innis Kane for the convalescent care of children at the Sarah Schermerhorn Convalescent and Fresh Air Home, maintained by the society at Milford, Conn. According to the terms of the bequest, $100,000 of this has been designated for the erection of a children's annex and $250,000 for the endowment of convalescent work in this building.

"It is significant to note that the income from the gift is intended for convalescent care, one of the important phases of charitable ministration only recently coming into recognition. This gift will not, therefore, in any sense lessen the responsibility of this society for maintaining the summer fresh-air work at Schermerhorn House. But it will make possible the year round care of little frail children recovering from long periods of malnutrition.

"This gift has come to us at a most fortunate time, as the present unemployment crisis has brought an increased demand for convalescent care. The effects upon wives and children of men forced to be idle is now revealing itself in physical deterioration due to lack of proper food and housing. Indeed, unemployment is all too productive of such results.

"We receive frequent reports from our clergy and social workers each week in contact with over ten thousand people to whom poverty is a reality. These reports come in from our chaplains in hospitals and prisons, from workers in our settlements, day nurseries, convalescent homes, chapels for the poor and our detention shelter, St. Barnabas' House, to which hundreds are coming with troubles due largely to lack of work.

"There are two contributions which we must try to make to this situation: We must seek to provide some sort of help in tiding over the emergency, assisting the unemployed to find work if we can, and helping the families to get back on their feet physically; and we must try to create employment for the handicapped workers whose struggle under present conditions is an almost hopeless one. It is in the interest of the latter that we are at present conducting an appeal for our Emergency Relief Fund, in the hope that we may thus be able to increase the size of our goodwill shops and so furnish more work to the hundreds for whom we have not now adequate shop facilities."

The trustees acting for the Kane estate in appropriating this gift were William M. Cruikshank, C. L. Carpenter, Edward J. Hancy and DeLancy K. Jay.

Members of the Convalescent and Fresh-Air Committee of the Board of Managers, of which the Rt. Rev. William T. Manning, D. D., is president, include Harry Pelham Robbins, chairman; Mrs. Henry Gansevoort Sanford, Thomas Sabine McLane, the Rev. Thomas McCandless and Rodney Proctor.

"It is hoped," further stated Dr. Sunderland, "that other far-sighted individuals and trustees will follow this fine example by endowing in perpetuity other departments of the work which the society has been carrying on for many years."

PANAMA CANAL ZONE.

Children's Home, Bella Vista.

The cornerstone of the new Children's Home, Bella Vista, Panama, was laid Sunday afternoon, March 25, in the presence of a large company of residents of the Canal Zone and the Republic.

The stone was laid by the District Grand Lodge of the Masonic fraternity with full ceremonial, assisted by virtually all the Masons on the Isthmus, a special train bringing many from the Atlantic side fifty miles away. Others assisting were General Wm. M. Cruikshank, U. S. A., Colonel Harry Burgess, U. S. A., Chief of Engineer of Maintenance, Dr. Horacia Alfaro, Panama's Minister of Foreign Relations, and Major C. Braithwite Wallis, British Minister.

The building committee is composed of Mr. Ralph Z. Kirkpatrick, Dr. D. P. Curry, Mr. H. H. Evans and Judge Jas. W. Blackburn.

Canon E. Addis Drake read the prayers and Bishop Morris, president of the Board of Trustees, made an address.

It was a happy occasion for many who had looked forward to it for eight years and now saw a dream coming true.

The land was given by Mr. Minor C. Keith, of New York; Dr. Thomas Barbour, of Harvard University, and many others, including the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Virginia. The building itself is an outright gift of Mr. Edwin Gould, of New York. Dr. Barbour is also furnishing the entire low floor, in memoriam, the Canal Zone Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution is furnishing a dormitory, and one other room is provided for.

The Children's Home, an institution of the Missionary District of the Panama Canal Zone, was founded April 15, 1920, with nine children, of whom five had been wards of the American Red Cross. Mrs. William R. Royce, of Virginia, was the first house mother. For two years a small house was leased, followed by a larger one capable of accommodating about twenty-five children. The National Council has generously paid the rent, but the current expenses have been met by interested friends.

The new building will be of concrete and fireproof, housing about forty children. The architect, Mr. Meade Bolton, is giving his services, and the authorities of the Republic have granted free entry for all building material, an unusual and much-appreciated concession.

The children are an interesting cosmopolitan group characteristic of this most cosmopolitan of countries.

Services are held daily in the Chapel of the Holy Child and on Sundays the children attend the Cathedral in Ancon. All who are old enough attend the public schools and the others are taught at home.

The present house mother is Miss Alice C. Lightbourn, a W. T. O. Worker, and her assistant is Miss Claire E. Ogden.

Diocesan Convention.

A resolution referred to the Standing Committee that immediate action be taken to seceure a general missionary for the diocese as assistant to the Bishop; the decision to affiliate with the Diocese of Atlanta in the support of the Fort Valley Industrial School; endorsement of the Near East Campaign; a resolution urging the importance of the clergy thoroughly informing themselves on the Lausanne Conference for emphasizing and promoting the subject of Unity; and the election of deputies and alternates to the General Convention were some of the important pieces of legislation transacted at the one hundred and sixth annual convention of the Diocese of Georgia, which met in St. John's Church, Savannah, April 18 and 19. The deputies elected to the General Convention are: Clerical, the Rev. J. B. Lawrence, Americus; the Rev. D. C. Wright, D. D., Savannah; the Rev. J. A. Schaad, Augusta, and the Rev. H. Hobart Barber, Augusta. Lay, Mr. J. R. Anderson, Savannah; Mr. George W. Urquhart, Savannah; Mr. Frank D. Aiken, Brunswick, and Judge George T. Cann, Savannah. Alternates: Clerical, the Rev. Royal K. Tucker, Brunswick; the Rev. Harry S. Cobey, Albany; the Rev. C. C. J. Carpenter, Waycross, and the Rev. Robb White, Jr., Thomasville. Lay: Mr. W. W. Williamson, Savannah; Mr. John W. Twiggs, Augusta; Mr. C. E. Dunaway, Americus, and Mr. Morton Jones, Augusta. All of the officers of the diocese and the members of the Standing Committee and of the Executive Council were reelected.

On Tuesday afternoon previous to the opening of the convention, the Laymen's Association met and were addressed by Mr. Leon C. Palmer, General Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, who stressed the imperative need of mobilization of the lay forces of the Church rather than "reaching the unreached", which is the prevalent idea in the churches. The evening service was given over to the Department of Religious Education when the Bishop's Banner was presented to the school of the parochial mission, the House of Prayer, Savannah, for having the largest per capita Lenten Offering, and this was followed by two teaching pageants.

The convention adjourned to meet in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta, April 10, 1929.

Progress.

Bishop Juhan visited the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, on the morning of March 25, and confirmed a class of seventy presented by the rector, the Rev. Charles Aylett Ashby ,B. L. With appropriate ceremonies, ground was broken on Palm Sunday for the new church which this parish wil lerect. At a congregational meeting it was decided to build with stone instead of brick, and some delay in starting was caused by this. The great parish house is of brick. When finished this parish will have the most complete plant in the South. The new church will make the fourth unit of the original scheme.

WEST TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop.

One Hundred and Eight Candidates.

With the Rev. Rolfe P. Crum, rector, presenting the largest class for confirmation in the history of St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, Tex., the Rt. Rev. William T. Capers, Bishop of the Diocese of West Texas, officiated at the confirmation services on Palm Sunday.

Amid decorations of palm branches and spring flowers in observance of Palm Sunday, 108 candidates were presented and confirmed by twos by Bishop Capers, sitting in his Episcopal chair brought to the front of the chancel. Music was softly played on the pipe organ during the laying on of hands and all lights extinguished in the chancel except the vesper lights.

In his confirmation charge to the class, on "The Duties and Privileges of the Christian Life", Bishop Capers said in part:

"'If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ask whatsoever ye will, and it shall be done unto you. Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples.'

"There are many lessons for the Christian life to be learned from the study of this parable, but I will dwell only upon those the text suggests; namely, the duties and the privileges of the Christian life.

"'I say unto thee, except one be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit —ye must be born again.'

"It is possible for us to be as fruitless in the Body of Christ, the Church, as is a dead branch, though it be a part of the vine. How then are we to be fruitful branches?

"Our Saviour answers this question in the words of the text, 'If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ask whatsoever ye will, and it shall be done unto you'.

"The need of the Church today is a more grateful membership; a deeper realization of just what Christ is to each individual soul. The Church is not a school of ethics; it is an abiding faith in the Source of Life, Jesus Christ. Sacraments are a means to an end. It is not sufficient for a man to boast of his baptism and of his confirmation for, unless they are producing in him the character of Christ, he is as a dead branch in the vine."

United Services.

United Holy Week services by the Protestant churches of San Antonio, Texas, were held at St. Mark's Episcopal Church, it being the largest downtown church in the city. The churches participating in these noonday services were the Episcopal, Christian, Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian.

Lasting for but half an hour, these services permitted those in attendance to secure their lunch and return to their place of business within the noon hour. They were marked by the singing of old-time favorite hymns, extemporaneous prayers by the various ministers and anthems by the choir of the several churches on the day when the pastor of that church preached. Those choirs accustomed to wearing vestments in their own churches did so and those not accustomed to so dressing did as they were used to doing in their own church.

These services were increasingly well attended as the week progressed, and were considered a marked success by th Ministerial Alliance, under whose auspices they were given.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

The annual Lenten Offering Service and Spring Festival of the Church Schools of New Orleans were held at the Church of the Annunciation on April 21, 1928. The program opened with a service at which time the Lenten offerings from all church schools in the Diocese were presented. Following this service, the children made reports of what the schools have done in the five fields of service during the past year. The program concluded with a pageant and games out of doors.

United Lenten Evening Services, under the auspices of the Church Club of Louisiana, have been held in the various city churches. The attendance at these services have been most gratifying.

SPRINGFIELD.

Rt. Rev. John C. White, Bishop.

The Diocese of Springfield sent to the National Council during 1927 for the work of the General Church $7,452.46, and the Bishop has notified Mr. Franklin that as much may be expected during this year. The Diocese is making every effort to even increase this amount.

After many delays of one kind and another at last it looks as if the congregation of St. Gabriel's, Woodriver, is about to have a building of its own. The church has possessed a lot in this community for some time, but it was not a piece of property well situated. Through the kindness of the donor of the property a better located piece of ground has been secured and negotiations are now going forward looking to the purchase of a denominational building which it is expected will be moved on this property. The Rev. S. E. Arthur is the clergyman in charge of this work.

Another forward step recently taken by the Diocese is the securing of a Crown Him, but not with thorns today,

Crown Him, the Risen One,
Crown Him as victor o'er Death's power,
Crown Him, God's only Son;
Crown Him, ye ransomed, bought with a price,
Crown Him, the Passover Sacrifice.

Crown Him Whose love gave us Easter Day.

Bringing Health to the Villages.

Minna McEuen Meyer.

"Your nurses are charming young women, but I fear they have been educated beyond their sphere," remarked Mr. Sarkissian, the Governor of the Alexandropol District, who attended the graduating exercises at the Near East Relief School for Nurses.

"Have you talked with them?" inquired Miss Jarvis, the American Nurse who is at the head of the Training School.

The Governor walked down the line of girl graduates, conversing for a while with each of the twenty-one. Then he returned to speak to Miss Jarvis.

"To my astonishment," he said, "every one of those young nurses is going out to work in the villages, and they are all enthusiastic about it."

In the Orient, where good roads have not yet penetrated, villages are far more remote than is indicated by the number of miles that separate them from those friends of suffering humanity the physician, the nurse and the dentist.

How to teach good health, sanitation, the proper care of the body, and the prevention of disease is now a problem with all governments that are in any sense progressive. This may be due in part to the terrible toll of life taken by influenza, a disease which originated in a little corner of the world that had never been cleaned up.

One small country that is much interested in solving the health problems of its villages is Russian Armenia, the land that suffered more than any other during the long continued war—for war lasted in the Near East until September, 1922.

When at last war ceased and the work of reconstruction could be undertaken, the Near East Relief saw an opporunity to render a most helpful service to the country by encouraging many of the older girls in the great orphanage at Alexandropol to learn nursing. The Edith Winchester School for Nurses was founded, so named in memory of the first American nurse to enter the Caucasus region to stem the tide of typhus fever which was then raging, and who gave her life in this humanitarian service. Although nursing is a new profession among Oriental women, the girls of the orphanage were impressed with the courage and the example of the American nurses and they felt it an honor to learn to serve mankind as they had seen American girls do.

How well the Armenian orphan girls responded to their training was proved at the time of the earthquake two years ago when they worked with the surgeons at the operating table day and night, and exhibited wonderful self-control and presence of mind. It was with great satisfaction that their American teachers reported that their work had indeed been rewarded.

In the villages to which the girls go upon their graduation they give instruction in the schools to both the pupils and to their mothers. One girl-nurse will sometimes have as many as fourteen villages in her district.

This new class, which has recently graduated bring the number of nurses working in the villages up to ninety. Each nurse receives a salary of $20 a month, and the Armenian Red Cross assumes responsibility for the salaries and for the maintenance of the clinics. But notwithstanding the number of nurses Near East Relief has trained, there is only one medically trained person for every five thousand people in Russian Armenia, and one hospital bed for every thousand.

More Wonderful Still.

In some recent notes I referred to some personal experience which showed the kindness of a Japanese to me. But a far more wonderful story has come to my attention.

About forty years ago there was born in Tokyo a boy whose parents allowed him to grow up with no moral training. At the age of thirteen he had to decide between starving and stealing, and he became a thief. He was at continual war with the police, was repeatedly put in prison, but was never out longer than to commit some crime and get in again. He says of the prisons that they are schools of crime. When he first went to prison as a boy, the hardened criminals of the prison exerted themselves to make him as base and hardened as themselves, and he learned it all. Thus twenty years of his life were spent in prison for crimes that were laid to his charge. But there were many crimes which he committed that were not found out, among them several murders. This man, at last in a most brutal manner, murdered one of the Japanese singing women and escaped. Being put in prison for another crime, he heard his fellow-prisoners discussing the case of the murdered girl and he learned that her lover, a man named Komori, was being charged with the crime. Tokchi Ishii was a hardened criminal, but in him there was a vein of chivalry. He could not bear it that Komori should be put to death for a crime which he had himself committed.

Immediately he entered on the defense of Komori, confessing his crime as his own. The judges could not believe that a man could advocate a cause which would lead to his own execution. Then Ishii confessed in detail all his crimes, including several murders which the police had not found out. Still they did not believe, and they acquitted Ishii of the crime.

He appealed the case to a higher court. The decision of the lower court was reversed and Ishii was sentenced to death. Then it was that Miss Caroline Macdonald sent him at the New Year's time a special gift of food, and later a New Testament. At first he carelessly put the book aside, but later, because of the torture of prison life, he took it down and at random opened it to the passage which told how the Lord had set His face like flint to go to Jerusalem although he knew it meant the loss of His life. The courage, the audacity of it, pleased him. He knew courage. Again he opened it, and this time it was the shepherd, who had a hundred sheep and lost one for which he hunted until he found it. The third time he opened the book he found the soldiers pounding nails in the hands and feet of the Lord, nailing Him to the Cross, and He was praying for them, "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do". He had himself saved an innocent man from death by the gift of his own life, but here was a man praying for guilty men, praying for those who ought to be sent to death. Then the book became a fascinating book to Ishii. With no earthly teacher to guide him, he became transformed, putting on the character of the Christ whom he adored. The great change in the man was the marvel of the prison. The wild beast became as gentle as a lamb. Kind, patient, gentle, thankful, joyful, the son of God who had seen a great light in Jesus Christ, changed like the Apostle Paul and witnessed to the light and life which are found in Jesus Christ.

Miss Macdonald and Miss West were the only two living Christians he ever knew, and he knew them only as they stood outside his cage and talked to him through a wire netting just before his death. And he died with joy.

Is there power in Jesus Christ to save to the uttermost? Ishii is the answer. Is there power in the Book to bring light to the soul in its deepest darkness? Ishii is the answer. Does the Christian religion prove itself in the experience of men? See what it did for Ishii. Does the Lord Jesus Christ put into the hearts of men an unutterable love and devotion and joy? That was what it did for Ishii.—Rev. A. D. Woodworth, in Herald of Gospel Liberty.

The Missionary Toys.

Edwardina Crane.

Berry-Belle was a little By-lo doll and Trotter was a Boston Bull of soft grey-brown felt, with no tail and ears scarcely to be mentioned. Berry Belle belonged to little Eleanor Reeves and Trotter was the very dearest treasure of Bobbie Lamar. Today, Berry Belle and Trotter were alone; their little mistress and master had trudged off, with the grown folks, to the big parish house, where a missionary lady was going to tell about the little boys and girls who live way up in the cold country in the North, where the wind blows cold, and the snow falls deep, deep, deep; and it is dark night for six long months in the year.

Eleanor and Bobbie sat together in the very front seat and shivered as they looked at the pictures. Their eyes got large with wonder at the sight of the children of that far country in their dresses and coats of skin, and their little round, fat faces peeping out from under a fringe of fur. They saw pictures of hospitals and churches and schools; they saw houses and sleds and dogs, they saw nurses and doctors and teachers and all of the Church's big family of the North land. Then the missionary lady told of some other little boys and girls who wanted very much to come to school and learn about all the things which little boys and girls should know—they wanted to know about the Saviour of little children. The missionary lady said that the good Bishop, and all the workers throughout the mission, were very sorry about these little children, because there was no room in the schools for any more of them. She asked that every one would help these little boys and girls, that they might have the same kind of good things that the little ones at home have.

That night, at Bobbie's home, where the missionary lady was staying, a small reception was given for her. As she stood talking with the people who had come to meet her, she felt a tug at her skirt, and looking down, she saw two tiny persons; they were Eleanor and Bobbie, each clasping tight in their arms a toy. With his shoulders straight and a brave little air about him, Bobbie walked up to the lady: "I have brought you my little dog," he said; "do you think he would help any?" and he pushed Trotter, the tiny bull pup, into her hands. Behind him came Eleanor, not so brave as Bobbie—with one finger in her mouth and her head hung down to hide the tears which were very near—but with just as much determination, she proffered the beloved Berry-Belle.

The missionary lady was silent for a moment and when she looked up there were tears in her eyes, too. The grown folks stood quiet and rebuked, as they looked upon the offering which Eleanor and Bobbie had made—their dearest and their best.

Right away Berry-Belle and Trotter became very active missionaries, indeed. They went everywhere that the missionary lady went, and everywhere she told the little boys and girls, and the grown ups, too, about how they had come to her. And when the people heard that story, they were moved to give of their best treasures, that the children of that far land might have schools and teachers, even as their own children had.

When the missionary lady went back to the North country and to her school there, Berry-Belle and Trotter went with her. On long cold days at the mission, when the little ones gathered around her, she would bring out the toys and exhibit them before the wondering eyes of the little ones—and if their hands were very clean, the little girls might take Berry-Belle in their arms and play with her and love her—and the boys might play with the tiny brown pup; and the missionary lady would tell them of the little boy and girl, who had sent their best loved toys an offering to them.

Meanwhile, Eleanor and Bobbie did not forget. They watched and waited, and thought about Berry-Belle and Trotter, and talked lots about them, too, to each other. One day, after four long years, they read—for they could read for themselves now—that their lady (they always called her their lady) was coming home on furlough. They could hardly wait until the time came for her visit to their church. The day finally came, and once again Eleanor and Bobbie were perched in the front row and sitting on the very edge of their chairs.

The missionary lady came and talked—and there was no word of Berry-Belle and Trotter. The children sank back almost in tears of disappointment. Then the dear lady took a small box from the table near her—and coming down very close to Eleanor and Bobbie, she lifted the lid of the box, and brought out the treasured toys. She told just what they had meant to her in her work—how the boys and girls, in the far country, had come to see them and to hear about them; to play with them and to love them; and the older people everywhere had become more willing to help, because a little girl and a little boy, had shown them the way. "And now," she said, "these very faithful little missionaries have come to spend their furlough in their own homes," and, stooping down, she kissed Eleanor and Bobbie and placed in their eager arms, Berry-Belle and Trotter.

Herkomer and His Father.

The artist Herkomer was a German, a native of the Black Forest. He became one of the world's greatest sculptors. When he attained to greatness, he made his home in London and thither he brought his old father who had himself a taste for art and a touch of genius. The old man delighted himself in his son's studio, and would model in clay while his son worked on his great designs. The old man would work away all day long on some simple thing with his dim eyes and unsteady hands, and when the darkness fell he would reluctantly relinquish his task and climb the stairs to his apartments. When he had gone, the son, whose genius was warm with affection, would take the poor, crude, imperfect work which his father had left and with a few deft toucnes would stamp it with life and loveliness. In the morning the old man would come down to his task with his eye brighter and his hand steadier after the night's rest and, standing before his work, he would look up to it in admiration and, rubbing his hands in delight, would say: "I can do it just as well now as ever I could".—Dr. H. T. Kerr.

Brick by Brick.

I wish I could do something great or be a great man."

The family gathered about the library table for the evening looked up at Robert in surprise. He had laid aside "Scottish Chiefs" for the moment, and with his chin in his hands and his elbows on his knees he was gazing into the fire, dreaming of the great deeds of the heroes of ancient Scotland and wishing he might have an opportunity to imitate them.

"You can if you will," said grandma, lifting her glasses up on her forehead.

"How?" Robert straightened up at the thought.

"By building brick on brick," said grandma, "little by little, one thing at a time. That is the way most men come to do great things."

"Doesn't sound like so much," commented Robert.

"No, that's the trouble with most of us," said grandma. "We see the result, but not the cause; the great deed, but not the long preparation for it. Your books tell about the wonderful things accomplished by the Scottish war leaders, but it say little about the many years of training that they had to have before they were ready to become leaders.

"Did you ever hear the story of the humble bricklayer and Thomas Carlyle, the famous English writer? One of Carlyle's most notable books would probably never have been given to the world had it not been for the faithfulness of a poor bricklayer who never dreamed of the great thing he did and whose name the world will never know.

"When Mr. Caryle had finished the second volume of his famous work on the 'French Revolution', he loaned the manuscript to a friend to read. One day a careless servant, looking for something with which to start a fire, saw the manuscript and used it for kindling. It was the only copy, and when the author heard of the accident he was in despair. So discouraged was he that for days he did not have the heart to work on anything.

"But one morning while sitting by an open window he noticed a bricklayer hard at work on a wall near by. Brick by brick, brick by brick, with care and precision the mason was slowly building a high, strong wall.

"'How foolish I am!' exclaimed

Mr. Carlyle to himself. 'That humble workman puts me to shame.' And with fresh courage and new zeal he set to work to rewrite the book.

"That bricklayer never knew what a great deed he had done, but he did know that he was faithful in doing the thing it was his duty to do. And by doing his duty he gave inspiration to another to do a greater and more useful work."

"I never thought of it that way," said Robert as grandma ended her story. "But I am going to begin laying my bricks right away. It may be that I can do something great after all."

"I'm sure you can," said grandma, patting his arm. "I'm sure you can if you keep on trying. And don't forget that it is brick by brick a little at a time that the greatest lives are kindled."

From all elusive shows of sense I flee,

"Into Thy Hands."

"Into thy hands I commend my Spirit!" They are the last words of Christian resignation, most majestic in its self-control, most lowly in its recognition of the fact that we are recipients from first to last; they are the last words of a resignation which He practiced most perfectly who is the model and prince of the humble; who being the infinite and the eternal, "made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant".—Dr. Liddon.

"SUB HOC SIGNO VINCES"

THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH BELIEVES

The Bible to be the very WORD OF GOD, a supernaturally given revelation. "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God." (2 Tim. 3:16.) "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." (2 Peter 1:21.)

One God. There is one God eternally existing, and manifesting Himself in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

Death and Resurrection. By His death on the cross the Lord Jesus made a perfect atonement for sin. He literally rose again the third day according to the Scriptures (1 Cor. 15:4), and "He ever liveth." (Heb. 7:25.)

Believers. All who receive Jesus Christ are the children of God (John 1:12) and they shall never perish (John 10:28). Their security is in Christ.

Unbelievers. All who die unregenerate are ternally lost.

Second Coming. According to His promise, the Lord is coming again to this earth (Acts 1:11), personally, bodily, visibly. This is our "blessed hope." (Titus 2:13.)

Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is the third Person of the Godhead, equal in power and glory with the Father and the Son. He convicts men of sin. (John 16:7, 8.)

The Devil. There is a personal devil, "god of this age," "prince of the world." All who are not servants of God are servants of Satan. "Ye cannot serve two masters." "Fear him who hath power to destroy body and soul in hell."

The Church. The true and only church consists of all those who believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and accept Him as Saviour and Lord. It is His body, which He loves, and for which He has given Himself.

Support. We depend entirely upon free-will offerings for the support of our work (1 Cor. 16:2).

Membership. The Session meets after every service to receive and welcome new members. The doors of the church are as wide as the doors of heaven. One may not subscribe to every one of the foregoing statements, but the only essential to membership is faith in the Lord Jesus Christ and acceptance of Him as personal Lord and Saviour.

Strangers and Visitors are welcome to all services. Please make yourself known.

AN EMERGENCY APPEAL

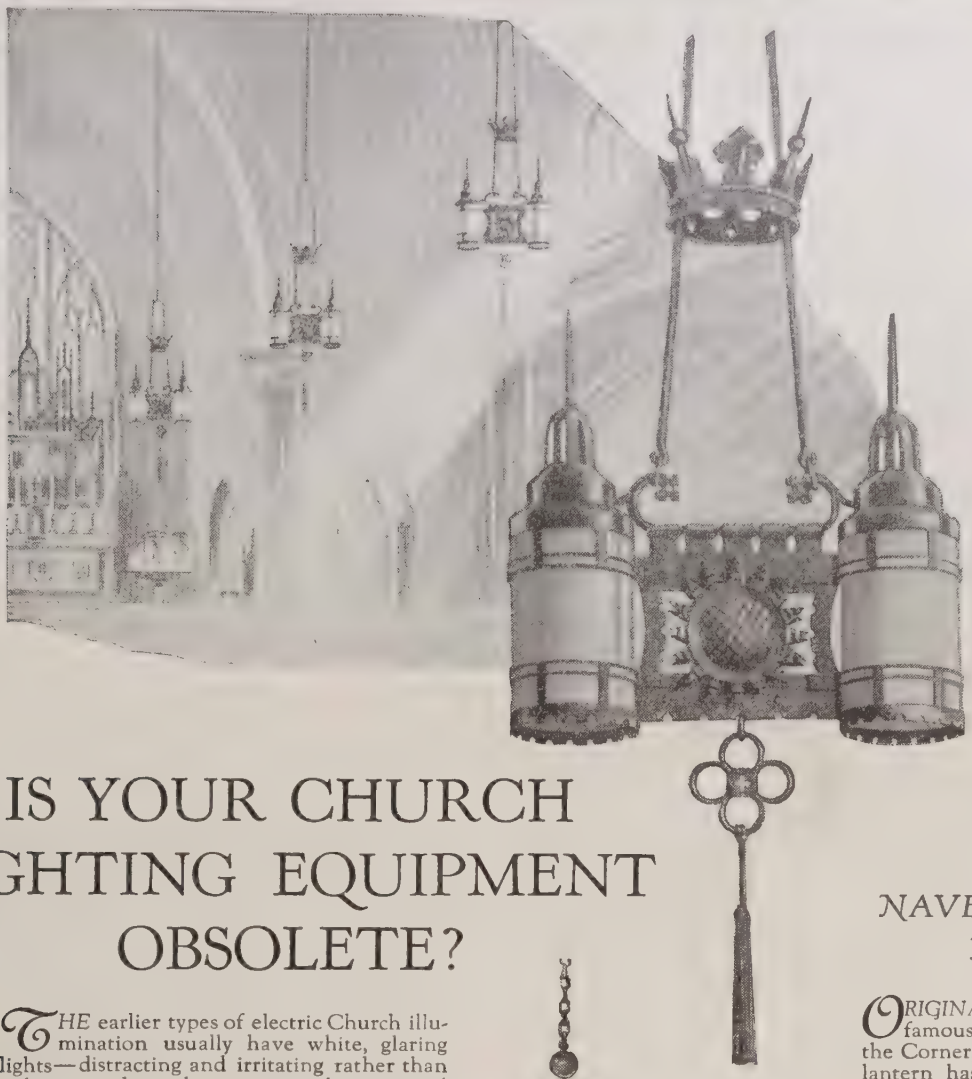
FOR THE NEWEST CHURCH SCHOOL IN OLDEST VIRGINIA

FIVE MARKS OF CHRISTCHURCH SCHOOL:

1. It re-occupies the earliest field of Anglo-Saxon civilization in America. It is located in Middlesex County, on the Rappahannock River, near its mouth—30 miles north of Jamestown and 50 miles east of Richmond, and has bus service twice daily from Richmond. It is the only standard boarding school for boys in Tidewater Virginia.
2. Its headmaster—the Rev. Dr. William Page Dame—is a really great leader of boys and is supported by a strong staff.
3. It has set up high standards of Christian character and academic attainment in a rural simplicity of life.
4. It has overtaxed its present capacity to house sixty selected boys, coming from homes of tradition and culture but ofttimes of slender resources. There is a long and rapidly growing waiting list for next session.
5. The fifth mark of the School—its very low cost ($600 covers all school charges)—can be maintained in one way only—by doubling the present enrolment; and the necessary building program costing $120,000 is now ready for immediate execution. Ground has been broken already on the first building, but for lack of funds the contract has been limited to partial completion.



Half of the required $120,000 is in sight, including a $20,000 subscription conditioned on the completion of the whole unified program in time for receiving sixty more boys next session.

Can sixty thousand dollars be raised immediately? With only seven years of history, the School must look to others than its few young alumni to care for its expanding growth. No organized canvass is possible, nor wide personal appeal; but this notice may arrest the attention of a few generous friends of such Christian education. Where possible, subscriptions should be followed by a personal visit to the School. Full reward will be realized in looking into the glowing faces of boys who will be Christian leaders of the next generation.

Cost per boy—Complete housing, $1,000; full furnishings, $100.

Gifts may be made memorials. Subscriptions (payable at convenience by check to Christchurch School Extension Fund) may be sent to

IS YOUR CHURCH LIGHTING EQUIPMENT OBSOLETE?

THE earlier types of electric Church illumination usually have white, glaring lights—distracting and irritating rather than sedative and conducive to meditation and prayer. Modern Churches demand electric light ample for reading purposes, and of the same warm quality which obtains in the daytime, when stained glass windows transform daylight into Churchly light.

The warm pleasing light emitted from these lanterns is quite as different from old glaring Church light as is their difference in design. The graceful design, substantial construction, and the character of hand wrought metal make these fixtures a decorative asset and lend to any interior an air of dignity—something which is usually lacking in earlier types of Church fixtures.

In the co-ordination of technical and esthetic requirements in Church Illumination Rambusch stands pre-eminent. Its organization is made up of lighting experts, architects and interior decorators. Church illumination planned by Rambusch is guaranteed to give satisfaction.

The illustration at the top is a typical Rambusch lantern combining beautiful period ornament with technically sound Church Illumination. The ornamental parts of the frame project in rib formation down the sides of the lantern, creating a pleasing silhouette without unduly obstructing the light emitted from the diffusing cylinder. The fixture is made from hand wrought iron throughout and measures five feet in height. For beautiful and efficient Church Illumination consult our experts who are always at your service.

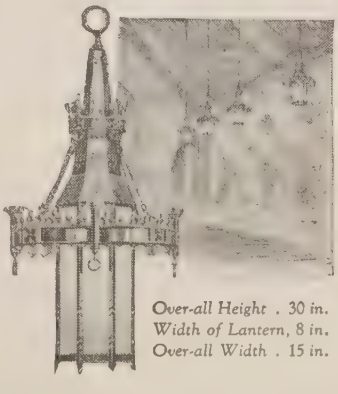
MADE entirely by hand. Frame of wrought iron. Ornaments of wrought bronze. Polychrome finish. Cathedral glass frosted inside, amber color. Highly efficient. Easy to relamp. Easy to clean. Suitable for 200 watt bulb.



This lantern is particularly suitable for a small or medium sized Gothic Church. When hung in mid-air, its well balanced proportions and pleasing shape lend an air of dignity to the interior. Its proper location in your Church should not be decided upon until after a consultation with one of our experts on Church Illumination.

NAVE LANTERN
No. 120

ORIGINALLY designed for the famous Little Church Around the Corner, New York City, this lantern has become a favorite among leading Church architects. The lantern frame and top are made of wrought iron beautifully polychromed and the applied ornaments are of hammered bronze.

The reflector top is pierced to give light on the ceiling—at the same time giving an interesting glitter of light without any glare.

During evening services, the soft, amber light, sufficient for reading purposes, helps to create a warm Churchly atmosphere. Similar lanterns can be made suitable for any size Church.

Deaths

ELLA R. GOODWIN.

Departed this life April 5th, after a few days' illness, ELLA R. GOODWIN, in the 75th year of her age. She was the last surviving child of the Rev. F. D. Goodwin and Mary Archer, his wife, and the sister of the late Rev. R. A. Goodwin, D. D., and Rev. E. L. Goodwin, D. D.

For seventy years she attended St. John's, Wytheville, Virginia, and, like Anna of old "departed not from the temple, worshipping, with fastings and supplications".

"With Thee is the fountain of life,
And in Thy light we shall see light."

RESOLUTIONS.

Ella R. Goodwin.

On the 5th of April one of the members of St. John's Church, Wytheville, Virginia, was called to a higher and fuller service.

Miss Ella R. Goodwin has been for more than a half century a member of this church, has served it in many capacities, and has always been in the foremost rank as one of the best and most useful members, quick in sympathy, generous in help, unelfish and devoted.

It is but fitting that record and memorial of her life and service should be made in this organization, to which her presence has meant so much; therefore

Be it resolved, That the Parish Aid Society of St. John's Church tenders its deepest sympathy to the family of Miss Ella R. Goodwin and expresses its sorrow in the loss sustained in the death of one of its most valuable members; very rarely do we find a character such as hers, forceful and fine, generous and just.

She gave good and faithful service to all organizations of her church, and we shall miss her, but we shall keep her in our hearts as a hallowed memory.

SARAH HUNDLEY NORVELL.

On the twenty-eighth day of March, 1928, at her home at Charlotte Court House, Virginia, at an advanced age, surrounded by her children whom she had tenderly and lovingly watched over during the years gone by, there passed SARAH HUNDLEY NORVELL, the widow of William Dabney Norvell, who preceded her many years to the world beyond.

Mrs. Norvell's death brings sorrow to many who will ever remember the kind and friendly greeting she always extended, and the genuine, bountiful Christian hospitality of the home over which she so beautifully and graciously presided. Truly can it be said of her that she always observed the biblical injunction: "Use hospitality one to another without grudging."

Mrs. Norvell is the last in Charlotte County who represented the older culture of civilization of the South, the like of which will not be seen again.

Each of those whom she reared may with genuine gratitude claim, "Yea, I have a good heritage".

Sarah Watkins Hundley, fourth child of Elisha Estes Hundley, and Elizabeth Bouldin, was born at Fruit Hill, the home of her father, September 5, 1836. She was therefore in her ninety-second year at the time of her death.

She was married on the eighth day of January, 1852, to William Dabney Norvell, of Lynchburg. The whole of her life, except a short period in Richmond and in Lunenburg during the Civil War, was spent in Charlotte County among those who will ever hold her in loving remembrance. Her husband, William Dabney Norvell, was the son of Edmund Butler Norvell, the third and was born in Lynchburg on March 6, 1822. He died February 2, 1903. He was a descendant of William Norvell, gentleman, who with his two brothers, came to America from Scotland about 1620, landing at Williamsburg, Virginia.

William Norvell was a civil engineer and laid out the town of Williamsburg, and was one of its incorporators. He was a member of the vestry of old Bruton Church, one of the oldest churches in America. He also served long with his brothers Hugh and Thomas in the House of Burgesses.

Mrs. Norvells' father, Mr. Elisha Hundley, a greatly respected and honored man who came to Charlotte County from Halifax, married the daughter of James Bouldin, who was the grandson of Colonel Thomas Bouldin, the old pioneer who settled at Golden Hills, then Lunenburg County, in the year 1740.

Two of Mrs. Norvell's children, Charles and Haywood, died years ago. There survive her: Elizabeth, Lucy, Elisha, William Dabney, Jr., Edmund Butler, Susan Hobson, Sallie, Caskie and Anne.

All of these were at her bedside except Elisha and Edmund, who arrived a few hours after their mother's death.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

piece of property for All Saints' Memorial Mission at Marion. The congregation is furnishing the ground and the Bishop has promised to put a building on it.

Trinity Church, Lincoln, has been vacant for four or five months, but the middle of April the Rev. John A. Betcher, Ph. D., a former Methodist preacher who is coming into the Church, is to assume charge of this work, and also the care of the missions at Elkhart and Mt. Pulaski. The Bishop has placed Rural Dean Macdonell in charge of Lincoln as rector and the Rev. Dr. Betcher will be his assistant.

Splendid preparations are being made for the holding of the fifty-first annual Synod of the Diocese of St. Paul's Church, East St. Louis, May 8, 9 and 10. The Church Club dinner, for men and women, will be held at the Broadview Hotel on the evening of May 8, and the speakers are to be Mr. Frederic C. Morehouse, the editor of "The Living Church", Dean White, of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland; Mrs. Conrey, of the Church Periodical Club, Cleveland, and the Bishop of the Diocese.

Christ Church School, Springfield, made a special drive for new subscriptions to "The Spirit of Missions" during the Lenten season, and a list of 104 has already been sent to the Church Missions House.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

"Rector's Cavalcade."

A group of parishioners of the Church of the Redeemer, Brooklyn, started out in ten automobiles from the Church on a recent Sunday afternoon, after the cars had been solemnly blessed by the rector, the Rev. Thomas J. Lacey, Ph. D., and enrolled in St. Christopher's League. The cars and their occupants made the round of the parish, calling on sick and shut-in members, bringing them the cheer of fellowship, also gathering up unbaptized children for baptism, and inviting and bringing people to the evening service. As a result, the church was filled in the evening. The preacher was Bishop Gray, of Indiana. After church, about a hundred people remained for a social hour in the parish house, and listened to informal missionary addresses.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. F. H. Touret, D. D., Bishop.

Miss Susan Sprague.

The first Social Settlement in Boise, Idaho, was commenced and conducted by Miss Susan Sprague, with the approval of Bishop Funsten, head of the Diocese of Idaho at that time.

Four churches are now maintaining representatives for similar work in that same field.

Subsequently, as Traveling Missionary for the State of Idaho, Miss Sprague lived among the miners at Mullen near Wallace; at Fort Hall for about three years, where both Indians and white people were helped, and at various settlements throughout the State, where there were no churches nor religious instruction until hers came.

While in Glenn's Ferry, engaged in her chosen work, Miss Sprague became ill and has been confined to her bed in St. Luke's Hospital, Boise, Idaho, since December, 1926.

She has the best care as well as the devoted attention of her two brothers, George F. Sprague, of Twin Falls, Idaho, and Jesse Rainsford Sprague, of New York City, but she is greatly cheered by letters from all friends. Such remembrance from her former associates would be most welcome.

The service was held in St. Matthew's Church, Fairbanks. The Rev. Mr. Fullerton has for the last five years been in charge of the Church's mission at Tanana, while the Rev. Mr. Wanner has been in charge of St. Matthew's Church, Fairbanks, since his arriva lafter his graduation from the Virginia Theological Seminary last June.

The Rev. Leicester F. Kent, Archdeacon of the Yukon, preached the sermon and presented the candidates. The Rev. Arthur Wright, deacon in charge of the active work at Nenana, read the Epistle and the Rev. Mr. Fullerton read the Gospel.

Bishop Rowe had to travel from Seattle to Fairbanks, a distance of 2,200 miles, and the Rev. Mr. Kent, who leaves Cordova the first of May for the Yukon work, went with the Bishop as his chaplain. The distance from Cordova to Fairbanks is about seven hundred miles. Mr. Fullerton traveled five days from Tanasa to Nenana and from the latter place to Fairbanks for his ordination. This gives some idea of the vastness of Alaska.

On Tuesday in Easter Week, April 10, the Rev. Henry W. Dowding, D. D., deacon, was advanced to the priesthood in Trinity Church, Portsmouth, Va., by the Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia, assisted by the Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor; the candidate being presented by the Rev. William A. Brown, D. D., rector of St. John's, Portsmouth. Prayers were read by the Rev. H. H. Covington, D. D. The preacher was the Rev. Charles H. Holmead, rector of Trinity, Portsmouth. Other clergy present were the Very Rev. H. Dobson Peacock, the Rev. George S. Gresham, the Rev. Herbert Nash Tucker and the Rev. Norman E. Taylor. The Rev. Dr. Dowding was for thirty-two years a minister of the Congregational Church. At present he is assigned to the churches in South Hill and Amelia, in Mecklenburg county.

On Tuesday, April 17, at the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, New York, the Rt. Rev. Ernest M. Stires, D. D., Bishop of Long Island, admitted four men to the sacred order of deacons. Mr. Frank H. Hutchins, of the Diocese of Chicago; Mr. Morton E. Nelson, of the Diocese of Kansas, and Mr. Richard Martin, of the Diocese of Rhode Island, are members of the Class of 1928 of the General Theological Seminary. The first two were ordained at the request of their own bishops. The fourth ordained was the Rev. Charles Pittman, formerly rector of the First Reformed Episcopal Church in Manhattan.

The Rev. Herbert Waldo Manley, of Canton, Pa., Diocese of Bethlehem, was ordained to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Frank W. Sterrett, in the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Nativity on March 24, 1928, at 11:15 A. M.

Mr. Manley was presented by the Rev. William R. Holloway, of Alden, Pa. The Litany was said by the Rev. Ellwood L. Haines, of the Trinity Church, Bethlehem. The Epistle was read by the Rev. Arthur T. Reasoner. The Holy Gospel was read by the Archdeacon of the Diocese. The Very Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, Dean of the Pro-Cathedral, preached the sermon.

Mr. Manley is connected with the City Missionary Society of New York Ctiy. His special work is the dock and port chaplain to the English-speaking immigrants.

ST. PAUL'S DECLARATION OF FAITH.

(For all the Athenians, and strangers which were there, spent their time in nothing else, BUT EITHER TO TELL OR TO HEAR SOME NEW THING.)

Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill, and said, Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious.

For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. WHOM THEREFORE YE IGNORANTLY WORSHIP, him declare I unto you.

God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands;

Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing, seeing he giveth to all life, and breath, and all things;

And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation;

That they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us:

For in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we are also his offspring.

Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device.

And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent:

Because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.

—Acts 17:21-31.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Pentecost is Normal Christianity."

To experience Sonship is to have eternal life.—Rev. Wm. J. Reynolds.

You cannot lead a man to God unless you love him.

The best preparation for good work tomorrow is to do good work today. The best preparation of life in the hereafter is to live now.—The Philistine.

Let the Church keep her faith, and her figures will take care of themselves.

"The great temptation to which we are more or less exposed is that of losing sight of God in the ordinary actions of the day. It is hard to feel that every action of every day is capable of being so done as to advance or to hinder our growth in grace."

The sermon is always a failure when the preacher depends on inspiration to make up what he lacks in endeavor.

To many death is a negative thing—a negation of life, a ceasing to be. It is not even that to a fallen leaf. It lives again in the new leaf and flower. To Paul death was not just negatively being unclothed or unbodied, but it was to be clothed and swallowed up in life.

O Thou Who camest from above,
The pure celestial fire to impart,
Kindle a flame of sacred love
On the mean altar of my heart.

There let it for Thy glory burn
With inextinguishable blaze,
And trembling to its source return
In humble prayer and fervent praise.
—Charles Wesley.

Augustine says that his God was "mercifully rigorous" to him, besprinkling with alloy all his unlawful pleasures, "that he might seek pleasures without alloy".

If God is love, love is a theology, and if Christians in various ways and by various means and processes of thought and experience have come to the conclusion that God is love, it is about time for them to express their theology in practice. Once the effort to do that is sufficiently definite, it will be discovered that the simple theology of Jesus and the Christian way of life are one. —The Congregationalist.

COMFORT

"And wives still pray to Juno
For boys with hearts as bold
As his who kept the bridge so well
In the brave days of old."
—Macauley—Lays of Ancient Rome.

According to Macauley, in ancient Rome, when Rome was at the summit of her greatness, popular orators talked dolefully of "The brave days of old". Doubtless in Macauley's own time, a hundred years ago, he heard bilious young and old and middle aged men and women, dreamy producers of literature destined to be forgotten and of philosophy heeded by nobody, moralize on "The brave days of old"; just as we hear now persons of precisely the same kinds moralize precisely in the same way.

In the history of the world there has not been such a nobly rich feast of courage, of daring endeavor, of the finest and most beautiful qualities of humanity, as has been put before us people of the present within the last two years. There never has been anything even faintly comparative to the succession of thrilling, heroic, picturesque, spectacular achievements of which we have read from day to day since Commander Byrd began his flight over the North Pole, just two years ago next Wednesday. Never has there been such triumphant demonstration that splendour of character is not limited by national or social lines, that real greatness of men and women exists everywhere, awaiting opportunities. The stories of events and adventure, some ending in tragedy and mystery, others in success more brilliant, colorful and wonderful than ever was told in history or fiction, have crowded upon us so swiftly that we have become accustomed to them and tend to forget their meaning and magnificence. Four hundred years ago news of the voyages of Columbus, Drake and Raleigh dribbled slowly and uncertainly through even the most highly civilized countries. Now we read the heart stirring details of a feat destined to be memorable to the end of time, the day of its completion. Nevertheless, there is no record of so many amazing victories and demonstrations of valor, ability, modesty, magnanimity, with any previous two years since the beginning of life on earth.

Compared with the dash into Arctic temperature and raging clouds, over frozen seas and desolate, ice-clad land and water, the journey of Columbus was tame and prosaic. Then came the gallant Frenchmen, riding to oblivion for their bodies and their ship but to immortality for their names and glory for their country; Lindbergh, flying alone over the Atlantic and afterward around this hemisphere, meeting the wondering plaudits of nations with his diffident fascinating grin and apparent feeling that he had done nothing remarkable; the successful flight of Chamberlain and the tragic attempts of the brave Englishmen and Englishwoman, giving their lives for the advancement of the new service and the honor of their land. Then, Wilkins and Ben Eielson, financed by American newspaper and Geological Society, storming into black mists and furious gale, over unknown Arctic region; then the hairbreadth escape of the two Germans and the Irishman, following fearlessly the path on which their predecessors had gone to death and burial places which may never be discovered.

This last epic is, perhaps, the most beautiful of all. The quick response of the American flying men and the German woman to the need of their comrades, stranded on a lonely, dangerous spot of rock and ice and snow, demands admiration beyond the power of words, must gladden and sweeten all souls with exultation in the knowledge that there are such men and women. Floyd Bennett, defying his own illness, rushing hundreds of miles through the air to carry succor to men he had never seen or known and stricken with mortal disease when near his goal; Lindbergh's terse and ready, "Sure; Let's go"! when asked if he would fly through the howling storm and deadly peril to carry hope to Bennett; the cheerful, manly acceptance of misfortune and disappointment and prompt attribution of their deliverance to "the grace of God" by the crew of the Bremen; the hastening of all the airmen to Washington to testify by personal presence their affection and reverence for the dead man—nothing written in the annals or imagined by poets or prose writers has been finer, lovelier, more vividly illustrative of our divine kinship.

Compared with this how cheap and tawdry were all the swaggering, blustering heroes of the Iliad, the gods of Olympus, the raids of the Crusaders, even the legends of the Round Table and the knights errant! German, French, Irish, English, Americans, Norwegians, Swedes, share the glory, contribute together to the beauty of these two intense, palpitant years. Byrd is American, of the ninth generation of a distinguished Virginia family and of straight British stock. Lindbergh is son of a Swedish immigrant. Bennett, American, was a simple mechanic, apparently an ordinary citizen of an ordinary community, until, first by diligence and skill of hand, then by proof that his nerves were steel and his heart was gold, he won Byrd's confidence and love. It is a pretty incident that the plane to be flown for the South Pole will be named, by Byrd, "The Floyd Bennett". Balchen ,sure of hand, steady of eye, dauntless of soul, driving undisturbed and undismayed through howling blast and scurrying cloud, is son of a Norwegian immigrant, a quietly modest man, bold and resolute as any of his Viking ancestors around whom the mythology of the North is woven.

So we have them, men and women of many nations and all stations of society. They have done mighty and immortal and beautiful deeds before our eyes. Countless millions, forgetting national and racial differences, jealous-ies and hates, unite in acclamation, kings and queens, presidents and leaders, joining with the humblest in world-wide salute to courage, honor, honorable ambition, high idealism, chivalry and modesty.

It is deliciously comforting. It is conclusive evidence that we have lost nothing of the best and highest of "The brave days of old". It tells us that cynicism, coarse materialism, vice, ostentation, frivolity, selfishness, vanity, are not the ruling influences. It was delightful to see these things usually so shamefully prominent, shrink to obscure places in the newspapers at the coming of Lindbergh, Byrd, Fitzmaurice, Von Huenefeld and the others.

The best of human nature in its best and highest aspects has been forced on our attention, brought into our souls vividly like sunlight darting through an enveloping canopy of fog. We are made to realize, gratefully, that everywhere is abundance of gracious, splendid human material ready to be moulded and used for the doing of God's will, the futherance of His wise and beneficent purposes.

Alfred B. Williams.

UNMASKING THE PLOT

We are told that while men slept tares were sown. And the remarkable thing is that after men have given their life blood to purify the Church succeeding generations, forgetful that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty", should slumber while again truth is placed on the scaffold and wrong on the throne. But why this slumber? In the moral realm men have been accused of lacking the fire of indignation against the immorality that flaunts itself in their faces. Theologically, many are fond of sitting tight, they are too proud to fight, too broadminded to take sides, they are the dignified middle of the road men and play safety first under their own vine and fig trees, while every man does what is right in his own eyes. They are complacent, tolerant, compromisers who, spiritually speaking, lack the spin and red blood to forsake the pussyfooting infirmary in the rear and come to the front line trenches where grim endurance brings the cry, "It is a great life if you do not weaken!"

It took months and years before the American people took in the Prussian campaign of frightfulness. Flamboyant posters o fruthless cruelty helped to open the eyes to the world peril. The jeopardy in which our Church is placed by the Anglo-Catholic menace cannot be stated too strongly to arouse a slumbering Church.

In view of the following letter (and it is typical of the whole movement) from a layman in Chicago, if clergy and vestries and congregations are not aroused to pray and work for saving our Protestant Church, we will find ourselves sailing under another flag. Shall we sit still while some of our brethren are going to war against this looting of our beloved Church of her Protestant principles? This letter proves the contention often made that the Anglo-Catholics would capture the Church, Romanize it, and drive every Protestant Episcopalian from its fold. Churchmen, awake! Elect Protestant Evangelicals to the General Convention, disseminate knowledge of the intended coup, unmask the plot and in the words of the young people of today, let us with a solid wall of opposition say, "Try and do it".

Can any candid reader of this letter to Judge Marsilliot say other than that it is a libel on the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America?

Chicago, Ill., March 28, 1928.

The writer says:

"I have just read your little pamphlet entitled 'Shall the Protestant Episcopal Church be Destroyed'? The little book was handed to me by my rector, and I have carefully read every word written therein. I am a communicant of the Anglican Church, and an Anglo-Catholic.

"Your accusations against the Catholic Party are unjust in many ways, and I feel that I have the right as a free-thinking Churchman, to express my opinions upon the subject. An article under the caption, 'The Episcopalian Anti-Roman Movement', published in the Literary Digest for March 24, also attracts my attention, and appears altogether unworthy.

"I reside in a normally High Church diocese, where Catholic practice reigns supreme. With exception of three or four Anglican Churches, every one of our parishes have Mass said on Sundays, the Sacrament is perpetually reserved, Confessions heard, Eucharistic vestments used, as well as the general use of candles, incense, and various other Catholic practices. All of this is acceptable to the great majority of the communicants. I venture to say that within a few years Catholicity will be an accepted part of our faith and worship.

"The Anglo-Catholic is simply and sincerely fighting for the recognition of the truth in our Episcopal Church. I have made a deep study of the history of the Anglican Church since Her very beginning. I have written at length on the subject, and I deny most emphatically that the Anglican Church is Protestant. On the other hand, I have found that Protestantism has been forced upon the Anglican Church, chiefly through the medium of the Puritan Protestant influence in the English Church following the Reformation, and except for this influence, all the various Catholic practices would have remained within the Anglican Church.

"The Anglo-Catholic is not trying to Romanize the Anglican Church, on the contrary we are really establishing the true Catholic faith as taught by the Catholic fathers, who founded and developed our Church. It is our common birthright and we are the exponents of truth.

"The Thirty-nine Articles are not consistent with the doctrines of the Anglican Church. They were not written to govern the Church doctrimentally. It has been proven that they were originally conceived to satisfy the German princes who sat upon the throne of England at the time, and to, if possible, keep within the English Church all of the people that were gradually breaking away and forming outside and non-conforming Churches. Thus, it seems to me, the Thirty-nine Articles were invented to satisfy a certain period, rather than to become the rule of faith for all time, or in short, to preserve unity.

"I most certainly agree that there are two religions within our Church, and that also, the same Church can not peacefully house both. I also believe that truth will prevail and that the whole Anglican Communion will eventually accept Catholicism. Because Protestantism has proven unsatisfying. The Anglican Church has stood at a standstill in the United States because of the internal strife within Her, and this evil must be removed if the Church must grow. I believe sincerely that the life of the Apostolic Church depends upon Catholicism.

I may give you a knowledge that will undoubtedly surprise you. My home is in Virginia. I was raised in the Anglican Church, and in the lowest of the low. I believed earnestly until I found out different, that my Church was Protestant. I did not, however, become a Catholic through any other medium than faith itself. I just naturally began to see the truth, and even in my own parish I shocked the parishioners by genuflexion, and making the sign of the Cross. These practices came to me themselves, because I had never been inside of a Roman Catholic Church, and furthermore stood in awe of them. The priest that prepared me for Confirmation is now rector of Christ Church, Nashville, Tenn.

"Yes, Dear Sir, I am an Anglo-Catholic, because I believe in the Catholicity of the Anglican Church, and if we are to be Catholic, we must be so whole and entire. I am a layman, the same as yourself, and I venture to say that the Catholic spirit will soon envelope the entire Church.

"Protestantism must go, and the manifestation of Catholic truth come into its own, then, and then alone, will our Church fulfil Her mission on earth."

REVISION AND THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES

By the Reverend Edward McCrady, D. D.

IT is frequently asserted by those advocates of Revision who are disposed to disregard the Resolution of 1913, under the conditions of which the present movement was formally inaugurated, and who desire to introduce specific doctrinal changes in the teaching of the Prayer Book, that it is necessary for the reputation of the Church alone that this should be done. We are given to understand that simply for the fair name of scholarship itself, it is necessary to "correct the mistakes of the Reformation"—to break away from the narrow, partisan, sectarian attitude of our misguided forefathers, revise their obsolete Theology, and align ourselves once more with the advanced thought of Rome and the Middle Ages (!).

Doubtless the Anglican Reformers had some just grievances, but the steps which they took to right these wrongs were most unfortunate for themselves and their posterity. Such ignorance! From Henry on even to the Restoration the whole shifting panorama of events is full of ecclesiastical blunders and absurdities—one long series of lamentable theological errors which can only bring the blush of shame to the faces of their better educated and more enlightened descendants of the present;—absurdities whereof our existing formularies, especially our deformed Communion Office, with its senseless elimination of all phrases and expressions tending to emphasize the doctrine of Transubstantiation, etc., and our "obsolete" Articles of Religion, are monumental evidence. Is it possible that after the centuries of enlightenment which have intervened since the adoption of these formularies, we are still incapable of appreciating the situation? Is it possible that the Church of England, and this her American daughter, are even today so devoid of scholarship that no one is capable of discerning the antiquated character of these documents? Bewailing "the hysterical decision" reached by the Commons, in their recent rejection of the "New Prayer Book" proposed for the Church of England, Lord Birkenhead proceeds to dilate upon this further clogging of the wheels of progress. "Everything, it seems, is to be stereotyped in the year 1662." Why, says he, "A 1662 man could be hanged for the larceny of ten shillings, a witch could be drowned or burned, and a Doctor of Medicine knew little except that his patients ought to be blooded". Are we to go back to such an age of superstition to direct us on our upward march of theological development! This seems, at first sight, a terrible indictment. But even if such an argument were pertinent (which is certainly not the case) what of the corrective which it implies and which Lord Birkenhead is so interested in bringing about—viz.: going back to the pre-Restoration and even pre-Reformation days of real liberty and enlightenment (!) under the infallible guidance of the Chair of St. Peter—aye, going back to that glorious regime of intellectual progress which, beginning before Protestantism had been born, continued to flourish long thereafter—when persecution was unheard of, when freedom to think and believe was universally accorded to all, when men might read and study what books they pleased under the charter of the Index prohibititorum, and the magnanimous toleration of what he calls "the Catholic Faith". If it be true that in 1662 a man could be hanged for the larceny of ten shillings, is it not true again that in 1362 (and under the Aegis of that very Institution against which unholy Protestantism revolted) a man could be racked, roasted, and otherwise tormented before being allowed the consolation of death —not for stealing—but for merely expressing some opinion incompatible with that laid down by Supreme Ecclesiastical Authority—which glorious principle of Intellectual and Religious Liberty was studiously enforced then and for centuries thereafter? We mention all this not with any desire to bring to mind again a dark and most unfortunate period in the history of Western Christianity (for the writer as much as any one else, believes it should be buried in oblivion), but for the very purpose of protesting against the suicidal policy of those within the Church today who now desire to resurrect a number of other corrupt Doctrines, Practices, and Traditions peculiar to that period and the Institution which dominated it—who would carefully eradicate from our Formularies all those teachings of the Protestant Reformation which emphatically repudiated these enormities—and who would even presume to defend such manifest retrogression in the name of sound scholarship and progressive theological development! Whatever the ultimate value of the Thirty-Nine Articles, it is undeniable that they represent a definite protest against these very mediaeval corruptions, and therefore mark a most important step onward and upward, which it would be folly to repudiate. In short, they represent the inauguration of a movement in the course of our religious and ecclesiastical development which was in the right (and not the wrong) direction, and we must, therefore, continue to build upon that foundation which they have laid, and not senselessly seek to uproot it. But let us look a little further into the matter and see if the Reformation was the great mistake (theologically and intellectually) that "Catholics" would represent it to be.

Is it nos true that as early as 1456 we hear Reginald Pecock protesting against the infamous treatment of heretics, and declaring that "the Clergy shall be condemned at the last day if by clear wit they draw not men into consent of the true Faith otherwise than by fire and sword and hangment"; and is it not true that this threat of torture and of death was flaunted in the face of every earnest seeker after truth and knowledge—of every one who dared to question the many stereotyped forms and practices which that same Institution was seeking to uphold—of every one who attempted to translate the Scriptures out of the original tongues, to inquire into the actual teachings of the Primitive Church, or in any way to test the claims of Roman Traditionalism in the light of Reason and Investigation? Is it possible that we have so far forgotten the names of Wycliffe, and Sautree, and Cobham, and Huss, and Bruno, and Galileo, to say nothing of our own martyred heroes of Protestantism—Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, Hooper, Taylor, etc., together with hosts of others, who laid down their lives in the interests of intellectual and religious freedom, that we are now, at this late date, to be beguiled into thinking that the Protestant Reformation was a revolt against progress, both intellectual and religious—in a word, against the broad culture and scholarship of Roman Theology—and that the time has now come to repudiate the terrible "mistake" of our ignorant and misguided forefathers? Why, Protestantism was born of the Revival of Learning; it was the awakening of knowledge itself which brought it about. In England, specially, it was the so-called "Oxford Reformers" who more particularly prepared the way, and though they were not all of the same opinion respecting the degree to which the movement should be carried, and did not all live to see the fruits of their labors, yet it was, nevertheless, largely in consequence of the work of such scholars as Erasmus, Colet, and More, that the Protestant Reformation was launched. It was their insistence upon the study of ancient literature, especially of the Greek Language, so that there might be scholars enough in England to test the statements of Roman Theology by direct appeal to the earliest manuscripts of the New Testament, as well as the writings of the early Fathers—to say nothing of the translation of the entire Bible into English so that every man might study it for himself—it was the advocacy of principles such as these—the principles of the new Learning"—that shattered the mask of Romanism, exposed the fabulous traditions and deceits (in many instances shameless forgeries) upon which the whole structure of the Papacy had been reared, and swept away the numberless superstitious rites and practices with which it had become encrusted in the course of centuries. In short, the watchword of the "New Learning", as of the Protestantism which followed it, was "Scripture and the primitive Fathers vs. Mediaeval Tradition". Why, the whole spirit of the Protestant Reformation was the spirit of intellectual and religious advance. The whole object in remodelling our Formularies (especially the Office of Holy Communion) was to rid them of these very accretions of mediaevalism which were indefensible in the light of the "New Learning", and had already proved a source of unspeakable corruption in the Church; and the sole object in drawing up the Thirty-Nine Articles was to enter a formal and specific protest against each and every one of these abuses which had so enslaved the Church through all the long night of the Dark Ages. And now, it is proposed—in the name of PROGRESS and ENLIGHTENMENT (!)—to go back to these enormities and superstitions. To revive once again these "dangerous deceits", to reintroduce these very rites and practices which our Fathers condemned; to replace in our Formularies (especially in the Office of Holy Communion) even the very words and phrases which they so carefully and laboriously removed; and then—to complete the work of demolition—to cut out the Thirty-Nine Articles altogether.

Protestantism opposed to learning and progress—the Reformation a backward step in theological development and spiritual life! Are we, then, in the name of scholarship to go back again to the fable of Papal Supremacy and accept as indisputable truth all the doctrines, practices, and corruptions which ex cathedra pronouncements have demanded of the Christian world! Are we once more to be beguiled with the Petrine Legend founded on Matt. 16:18, and all the fairy tales connected with his Episcopate in Rome, the Primacy of all his successors in office, etc.—fairy tales built up on Isidorian Decretals, Corrupted Martyrologies, and other forgeries? Is scholarship so low in our Communion, or are we so ignorant of the criticisms of our own Protestant and Anglican Forefathers that we still, in reading the original Greek, confound the Petra on which the Church is there declared to be founded, with the Petros who merely confessed a belief in this Petra? Is it possible that we are still so blind that we cannot perceive the sleight of hand performance—the play upon the words—that has served to identify poor, weak, erring Peter with The Eternal Rock of Deity Himself—"The Rock of Ages"! And yet, it is precisely this feat of exegetical prestidigitation that constitutes the rock—the one and only rock—on which the Papacy is founded, and which, with other equally gratuitous assumption (e. g,, that he was Prince of the Apostles jure divino; that this Sovereignty was to descend to his successors in office; that he was the first Bishop of Rome; that the Popes, therefore, are his successors, etc.), forms the imaginary basis of his Primacy today—that theory so dear to the hearts of our "Catholic" brethren, and which makes it impossible for them to rest in peace while this grievous "separation" exists, and makes them tremble for the salvation of their souls when they hear his unfavorable opinion of our Orders, and his fulminations against our Protestant beliefs and practices. Why, what has the opinion of the Pope to do with it, one way or another. Are we not men, and rational enough to have opinions of our own—aye, and some very pronounced opinions as to the validity of these very Orders, beliefs and practices, and of the shallowness of all Papal criticisms thereon?

Are we still to take our Theology from Rome, and consult the Pope as to the soundness of our ecclesiastical polity? Yet, after all, it is this nightmare of "the Primacy of Peter" that haunts the minds of "Catholics" to this day, and urges reunion with Rome at almost any price. That "Catholics" are bent on this reunion, and that all their proposals relating to Prayer Book Revision, and the elimination of the Thirty-Nine Articles, are set forth for the purpose of preparing the way for such a consummation, should be obvious to all. Not only is it evident, as Sir William Joynson-Hicks asserts, that "year after year the Anglo-Catholics lean nearer and nearer to Rome", but one of their own leaders, Lord Halifax, openly confesses that this is the very object for which he is striving. It is true that most of the followers of this Rome-ward movement are a little wary about the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, but they will eagerly accept the Primacy—"not only of honor, but of jurisdiction"—of the Roman Bishop, with all that this title of Universal Bishop implies (i. e., all the corollaries flowing therefrom), in spite of the fact that no less an authority than Gregory the Great himself asserted that "whoever calls himself the Universal Bishop, or desires this title, is by his pride, the Precursor of Anti-Christ" (Epis. to Emperor, Bk. VI., Ep. 30). Yes, in the name of scholarship, they will eagerly swallow the fable that Rome is the Mother Church of Christendom to whom we are all indebted for our very existence, but from whom we have grievously departed, both in doctrine and life, and that so necessary is it to salvation that we accept the teaching of this Mother Church, and be in communion with her and her Divinely Constituted Head—the Vice-regent of Christ on Earth—that we must at any cost repudiate the lamentable errors of the Protestant Reformation—revise our Prayer Book, especially remodeling our unfortunate Communion Office to fit the pattern of the Mass, and above all things, abolish and abjure the Thirty-Nine Articles—that most sinful denunciation of all the doctrines, rites, and practices peculiar to the Roman See, and formally set forth and endorsed by no less a personage than "the Holy Father" himself. In short, the invitation extended by our "Catholic" brethren to the Clergy and Laity of this Protestant Episcopal Church means simply this.

Hard as it may be, Brethren, the time has come that we correct the "mistakes" of the Anglican Reformers, and confessing the sin of Protestantism in all its forms, that we fall humbly on our knees before "the Holy Father" and plead for re-admission into "Mother Church" in the words of the well-known formula which she has prescribed for all her erring children. To-wit: "Knowing that no one can be saved without that faith which the Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, Roman Church holds, believes, and teaches, against which (we) grieve that (we) have greatly erred, inasmuch as (we) have held and believed doctrines opposed to her teaching," we do "now, with sorrow and contrition for (our) past errors, profess that (we) believe the Holy, Catholic, Apostolic Roman Church to be the only and true Church established on earth by Jesus Christ . . . . (that we) believe all the Articles of Faith that she proposes . . . . and reject and condemn all that she rejects and condemns, and (are) ready to observe all that she commands." That, among other things, we believe in the "substantial presence of the Body and Blood . . . of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the most holy Sacrament of the Eucharist (i. e., in the sense of Transubstantiation)—that we "believe in the seven Sacraments instituted by Jesus Christ for the salvation of mankind—that is to say, Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Order, Matrimony". That we "believe in Purgatory, . . . in the Primacy, not only of honor, but of jurisdiction, of the Roman Pontiff, successor of St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, Vicar of Jesus Christ . . . in the veneration of the Saints and of their images . . . in the authority of the Apostolic and Ecclesiastical Traditions, and of the Holy Scriptures, which we must interpret and understand only in the sense which our holy mother the Catholic Church has held and does hold". That we "believe in everything else that has been defined and declared by the sacred Canons and by the General Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent, and delivered, defined, and declared by the General Council of the Vatican, especially concerning the Primacy of the Roman Pontiff, and his infallible teaching authority", and that, "with a sincere heart, . . . and with unfeigned faith, (we) detest and abjure every error, heresy, and sect opposed to said Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church". (See Roman Confession of Faith or Creed of Pope Pius IV.)

Such, then, is the invitation extended us—such is the Faith and Discipline to which we are asked once more to subscribe. Away with this "obsolete" Protestantism which has so hindered the wheels of progress for the past four hundred years; away with our deformed Liturgy, with its studied omissions of all allusions to the doctrine of Transubstantiation, the Sacrifice of the Mass, etc.; away with our grotesque Thirty-Nine Articles, with their archaic expressions, involved sentences, and narrow, "uncatholic" teaching; and in the name of learning and of education itself, let us go back once more to the advanced thought and progressive theology of Rome and the Middle Ages.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart" (Psalm 119:11).

This week the following verse was submitted by Miss Estelle T. Oltrogge, of Jacksonville, Fla.:

". . . . Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out" (St. John 6:37).

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

THE COST OF NOT FOLLOWING HIM.

Two young soldiers were talking about the service of Christ. One of them said: "I can't tell you all that the Lord Jesus is to me, or what He has done for me. I do wish you would enlist in His army." "I am thinking about it," answered his companion, "but it means giving up several things—in fact, I am counting the cost." An officer passing at that moment caught the last remark, and laying his hand on the shoulder of the speaker, he said, "Young friend, you talk of the cost of following Christ, but have you ever counted the cost of not following Him"? For days that question rang in the ears of the young man, and he found no rest until he sought and found it at the feet of the Saviour of sinners, whose faithful soldier and servant he has now been for twenty-seven years.—S. # A BOOK BELOVED

Right Reverend E. Cecil Seaman, D. D.

WHEN does a Churchman love his Prayer Book? He loves it when he comes to know it.

How much does he love it?

According to his love for the Bible and according to the depths of the spiritual experiences that have been his in its public and private services.

Why does he love it?

Because he has found it absolutely true to the Holy Scriptures and true to the needs of the human heart.

---

More than sixty-five per cent of the Book of Common Prayer is actual quotation of the Bible and the rest is easily recognizable paraphrase.

It is the emblem and the actual expression of the unity of the Church, because it is the only Book of Worship and instruction put forth by authority of our whole Church in the United States and is in perfect harmony with the English Prayer Book of the past two hundred and sixty-five years.

It is the voice of the Church's authority proclaiming in no uncertain tones the subject matter of our faith and the reason of the hope that is in us.

It is the assurance of our Father's loving care of us in sickness and health, in joy and sorrow, from the font to paradise.

It offers us in its rubrics protection from superstition, idolatry, irreverence and irrational emotion.

It reveals the unfailing love of a forgiving Father and helps us to keep His commandments and to confess to Him our failures and our sins.

It gives us the two Sacraments of the Gospel, preparing us for their reception and teaching us how to bring other people to receive them.

It keeps our vision of religion upward toward Jesus Christ as the author and finisher of our faith and outward toward all men, for whom He died.

It joins our spiritual experience with those of dear ones gone to rest and with those who are elsewhere on earth.

How dearly, then, does a Churchman love this Book of Common Prayer! How little does he mind the taunt that he trusts the Bible, whence it comes, as an infallible Book!

How truly does he know that God's Word never fails a trusting soul!

But how he does hope and pray that the Book beloved may not be taken from him and replaced by manuals of private interpretation and missals of unscriptural origin. He may hope that its forms of worship may be enriched with flexibility and simplified by the elimination of archaic phrases and any traces they may possess of doubtful disputations concerning the philosophy of any particular age, in order that their simple Gospel truths may stand out ever more clearly; but he is filled with a great fear when he sees the effort being put forth to introduce into the Book beloved such words and actions as will make for superstition and priest-craft and for shifting the emphasis from "righteousness of life" to nicety of ritual.

It is for the preservation of the Book beloved in a Church beloved that men and women all over the country are pleading today

The Book of Common Prayer as it stands and as it has stood since the emergence of our American nation, has before it on the title page the name of the Protestant Episcopal Church and as its reward the Thirty-Nine Articles, both proclaiming our Lord God of the Scriptures as sufficient for our Salvation and the only One whereby men must be saved.

Every member of the Church should know that the effort to remove the Thirty-Nine Articles from the back of the Prayer Book is being made by the same group who a few years ago undertook unsuccessfully to remove the word "Protestant" from the front. If we bear in mind that "Protestant" is the term generally understood to describe in part those Christians who value the Bible above tradition and who do not concede the ecclesiastical or political claims of the Bishop of Rome, we must then recognize the fact that our Church is Protestant, and we must firmly resist the efforts, from within and from without, to destroy our Protestant heritage.

The question now before the Church is not whether some of the Articles treating of Calvinism or other doctrines are expressed as well as they might be, but whether we are ready to abandon such Articles as the Sixth, Eighteenth, Nineteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-second, Twenty-fifth, Twenty-eighth, Thirtieth, Thirty-first and Thirty-fourth, which are now prescribed by our Constitution which the Church of England vindicated at the Reformation.

Those who love the Book of Common Prayer as it is today are trying very earnestly to have it protected for the use of their children and for all in the world who will use it, and they believe that the Articles above referred to as well as its title page cannot be abandoned without there following the destruction of our Church's outstanding characteristics and most effective means of interpreting Christ to the Anglo-Saxon mind and inspiring it to carry the message of the Gospel to all who know it not.

BISHOP BECKWITH DIES IN MONTGOMERY

THE Rt. Rev. Charles Minnegerode Beckwith, D. D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Alabama, passed away Wednesday, April 18, at four A. M., at his residence in Montgomery, Alabama. His end was not unexpected, as he had been ill for three months. Funeral arrangements were made for noon Friday in Montgomery, where he was also buried. Bishop Beckwith is survived by his wife and one son, Mr. Edmund Ruffin Beckwith, a lawyer of New York City. Also, by three sisters, Misses Mag, Minnie, and Kate Beckwith, of Petersburg, Virginia, and a half-sister, Mrs. Moody, of Georgia.

Bishop Beckwith was born June 3, 1851, on the family plantation in Prince George County, Virginia, being the ninth child of Dr. Thomas Stanley Beckwith, and Agnes Ruffin, his wife. He was educated under the care of his uncle, Bishop John Watrous Beckwith, of Georgia, at the University of Georgia and at the Berkeley Divinity School, Middlebury, Connecticut, from both of which he graduated with the highest honors. He was ordained by his uncle in 1881, and served long rectorships at St. Luke's, Atlanta, Georgia; Christ Church, Houston, Texas, and Trinity Church, Galveston, Texas. In 1892, he was elected Assistant Bishop of Texas, but declined his election. In 1902, he was elected Bishop of Alabama in succession to the Rt. Rev. Robert W. Barnwell, and was consecrated at St. John's Church, Montgomery, December 17, 1902, by Bishops Dudley, Garrett, Nelson, Kinsolving, Sessums, Gray, Gaylor, and Cheshire. He found a large and fruitful field for his administrative ability, as well as for his experience as General Missionary in the Diocese of Texas. He gradually replaced the elderly clergy with young and able men. He found the churches largely congregational in spirit and made of them a diocese united around the Episcopal authority. He was especially careful to build up the weak and missionary fields by assigning to them strong and consecrated men.

Bishop Beckwith was a born teacher. He was for some years principal of the Sewanee Grammar School, connected with the University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee, where he taught many men since famous in Church and State. As a minister his highest success came through his extraordinary teaching ability. In religious education he published The Trinity Course of Church Instruction, in 1897; Rightly Instructed in God's Holy Work, in 1902, and The Church School in the Book of Common Prayer, in 1927-28. He was working on the last volume of his course at the time of his death. He was universally recognized at home and abroad as an authority on The Book of Common Prayer, and his courses of instruction are today widely used throughout the country. It was his great delight to address a Church School or a congregation and impart some of his own enthusiasm for the Church's book of worship and instruction.

Bishop Beckwith had extraordinary powers as a preacher. Clear-cut and logical in expression, with an unusual command of English, and intensity of personal conviction, he never failed to impress those who heard him, whether it was an audience of one or a thousand. In his latter years he held many preaching and teaching missions throughout the country, the demand for his services being greater than he had time and strength to fulfill.

He was many time a Deputy to the General Convention of the Episcopal Church, and in recent years he spoke often in the House of Bishops, where he was the champion of the conservative forces opposed to radical revision of the Prayer Book. Under Bishop Williams, of Connecticut, he had learned to love the historic position of the Church of his fathers. He refused to attach to himself any party name, choosing to be known as a Loyal Prayer Book Churchman. Personally fearless, no one was left in doubt as to where he stood on any issue. In his official capacity he always hewed straight to the line of his convictions, but in his personal capacity, he reached out into every walk of life for the friendship which he so earnestly craved. Many are the hearts bowed in personal sorrow today and deep is the sympathy from all over the land pouring in on the bereaved members of his family. A strong man who left deep his mark has passed.

VIRGINIA PRINCIPLES

Address of Dr. Lyon Gardiner Tyler, before the Waynesboro (Virginia) Historical Society, October 11, 1927.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

The role of the lecturer is not always an easy one. In selecting "Virginia Principles" as the subject of my discourse tonight my remarks might be thoroughly intelligible to the people living in the state seventy years ago, without carrying the same understanding to the people living at the present day. I know I am facing a critical, cultivated Virginia audience tonight, but some of you may not understand why Virginia principles should be different from New York principles, or Massachusetts principles, or California principles. Indeed, some of you may be in the state of uncertainty on the subject that the old woman, in the mountains of Tennessee, was, who, asked by a Presbyterian missionary if there were any of his sect about there, answered: "I don't know, but my old man kills a great many different kinds of varmints in these mountains, and you will find the skins nailed upon the back door. You can see if you can find the skin of any such animal as you ask for thar. If you find one, bring it here, so I can see what kind of a looking critter it is."

Now, if such is the case—if Virginia principles are identical with a "varmint" whose skin is undistinguishable to you—I am not going to quarrel with you about the "critter". I know that something happened in 1865. In that year the wonderful resistance of the South to the armies of the North suddenly collapsed. The calamity was overwhelming. As a result, the past was severed from the present, the people who survived went about in a stunned condition. After a little, they came to their consciousness, only to face a struggle for self-preservation against reconstruction and Negro domination, foisted upon them by their merciless conquerors. After this danger had been passed, all attention was bent to the material rehabilitation of their country, and today the present generation of Southerners, thankful for their escape from military government and Negro rule, and satisfied with the management of their local affairs and little inclined to dispute with the North the management of national affairs, can have but little idea of the aspirations of the Old South.

Well, all the more reason, when the individuality which characterized the State has passed away, that the things for which Virginia once stood should be brought to mind and venerated. The Fifteenth Article of the Virginia Declaration of Rights recommends to "any people desirous of freedom and the blessings of liberty" frequent recurrence to fundamental principles, and the Virginia principle were in the nature fundamental.

Caesar, in his Commentaries on the Gallic Wars, starts with dividing Gaul into three parts, and his division of three has served a majority of lecturers a good example ever since. Virginia principles are susceptible of a similar division, suggestive of arrangement which is always desired by the lecturer and of brevity which is generally desired by the audience. We recognize "Virginia political principles", "Virginia religious principles", and "Virginia social principles". On an occasion like this, I cannot dwell very largely on any one division, but long enough, I trust, to describe one or more principles in each.

Taking up political principles, one of the most important was democracy. Ever since the War of 1861 our friends in New England have been harping upon the aristocracy of Virginia and democracy of New England, and some of our young Virginia historians educated in Northern schools, or under Northern influences, have been weak enough to follow in their footsteps. But no very great study of the records of the two sections will bring an impartial observer to a different conclusion. Democracy was an indisputable Virginia principle.

If we compare the two sections by centuries, we will find that from the start the principle of aristocracy was more firmly imbedded in the institutions of the Northern settlements than in those of the Southern. In the seventeenth century, when there was very little democracy anywhere, both sections, more or less, resembled the English type of class division, but in the case of Virginia there was never any legal authority for such division as there was in Massachuetts, where the General Court as early as 1651 divided the people into three classes. Then in New England generally the suffrage was a special privilege, and only those who were elected by the ruling few could exercise the ballot. In Virginia, the suffrage was treated as one of right, and all freemen could vote for members of the House of Burgesses. It is true that the office holders were as a rule appointive in Virginia and elective in New England, but practically the difference was not significant. Owing to the restricted ballot in New England, and the right of the incumbent to be voted on before any opponent could be nominated, the tenure of office was quite as long as any in Virginia. The power in New England was largely in the hands of the minister and a few leading men in each town, and the towns were oligarchies, not democracies.

Much has been made of the Mayflower Compact as "the first written constitution", and Plymouth on the strength of it has been called "the birthplace of democracy". But there is nothing in this highsounding claim. The Mayflower Compact was merely an agreement of the forty-one signers to associate together, to make laws and obey the laws when made. It was a covenant and no constitution at all, which is a collection of fundamental laws. In their procedure they did nothing more than other societies had done. The persons interested in the Virginia Company of London must have first assembled, associated together, and agreed to abide by the will of the majority. Had the Virginia Company (certainly under the charters of 1609 and 1612) come to Virginia, the political authority which they wielded over the colonists would have come into effect over the members individually as well. The embodiment of their plans in a formal paper, voiced by the King, did not alter the fundamental facts one way or another. Only the Virginia charters were more than covenants—more than mere agreements—for as they defined the powers of the company and the colonists they were in effect real constitutions.

As to the society formed under the Mayflower Compact by the forty-one signers, it was in no sense a democracy. The signers did not comprise all the emigrants by any means. They acted from the start as an exclusive aristocratic body, and only cautiously admitted new comers into partnership with them, so that the body of rulers at Plymouth were always a mere fraction of the community. And this was true of the body of rulers in all the New England colonies during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

In Virginia during the seventeenth century every free white man was absolute master of his own actions, and this was noticed by a French traveler in 1686, who wrote: "Though the gentlemen whom they call Squires are greatly honored and respected, there are no feudal laws, and each one is master on his own plantation."

The next century witnessed the rise in Virginia of a great superior class, which has been often misunderstood. It was not an aristocracy based like that of New England on white people but on Negro slaves, and was therefore largely spectacular. New England aristocracy had by no means the brilliancy and beauty of that of Virginia—there were not as many gold headed canes nor as many fine coaches and horses nor as much plate—but it had more power—more authority. Despite the aristocracy, in this century the House of Burgesses in Virginia, elected by the people, became the great ruling power, and the Council, which was the hereditary seat of the aristocrats, constantly declined in authority, till the members became mere figureheads. Beginning with 1736 a freehold qualification was required for voting, but land was plentiful and it did not operate as any considerable restriction. St. George Tucker, writing of the times immediately anterior to the Revolution, said there was no such thing as "dependence of classes" in Eastern Virginia, that "the planter who owned half a dozen Negroes considered himself perfectly upon a level with his rich neighbor who owned a hundred", and that "the aristocracy was as harmless a set of men as ever existed"; while Edmund Randolph, who had a right to consider himself an aristocrat, if any one had, referred to their influence at that time as all on the surface, and "as little and feeble and incapable of daring to assert any privilege clashing with the rights of the people at large". The proportion of people voting in Virginia during the eighteenth century was much greater than that prevailing in any of the Northern Colonies.

Coming now to the Nineteenth Century, we see displayed, conspicuously at the beginning, the influence of the forces which operated in the two different settlements. Having shaken off all foreign restraint, they had now a free opportunity to manifest their own wishes. Virginia, under the leadership of Thomas Jefferson, became the headquarters of the Democratic Republican party—the party of popular ideas—and New England the headquarters of the Federalist party—the party of aristocratic ideas. Hamilton, who headed the Federalist party, declared that "the people is a beast".

It was not until 1804 that a real democratic spirit began to exert itself in New England. It came with the second election of Jefferson, which broke down the little town oligarchies and carried all New England except Connecticut. The democratic influences spread throughout the country, and they did not come from New England, but from Virginia. In 1814 Jefferson, in a letter to John Adams, accounted for the political differences between them by the aristocratic influences preached in New England from the earliest times, and the democratic influences preached in Virginia.

In afterwards apparently going Virginia one better, and applying the principles of the Declaration of Independence to the Negroes that were as yet unprepared for freedom, the North exhibited the spirit of fanaticism rather than that of democracy. It has been well said by an accurate writer, Paul S. Whitcomb, that "the first need of a backward race is not liberty but discipline, and labor is the greatest disciplinarian known". "Backward races must first learn to use their liberty, without which it would be but anarchy". And thus this government which rashly freed the slaves without preparation, and tried to incite them to insurrection, and actually placed them above their masters uses today the same argument for keeping the Filipinos under duress, which the slave owners used for keeping the Negroes in slavery. They are not fit to act for themselves and must be trained. Just lately Henry L. Stimson, Governor of the Philippine Islands, stressed the view, in his inagural address, that "only through industrial and economic progress could a larger measure of self-government be obtained".

The Northern appeal to democracy in 1861 was a false application of the doctrines of Jefferson as set forth in the Declaration of Independence. There was no criminal violation of the principle of democracy, or of self-government, in taking naked, savage, dirty and superstitious Negroes and making them work, any more than there is today a violation of the rights of the Filipinos in controlling their government and making laws for them. If the latter is defensible, so is the former. At the same time it is very true that in combatting the heresy mentioned many Southerners went too far in asserting "the rule of the best", but the argument was defensive and should not be taken too seriously. Intemperance begets intemperance.

In considering this whole matter of slavery it must be remembered that from the beginning of the American Revolution down to 1850 the South had had a raw deal. The laws bore heavily upon her in the interest of the North. But during the decade (1850-1860) the South enjoyed the advantage of a free trade tariff and the Independent Treasury, which divorced the government from the monopoly of the Northern Banks. It was a period in which the South took the lead in using improved machinery and improved methods of farming. Virginia gave to the world these great captains of industry Edmund Ruffin and Cyrus McCormick, who together revolutionized agricultural activities everywhere.

During this decade the South enjoyed the greatest prosperity it has ever known. Georgia increased in wealth 92.56 per cent, South Carolina, 90.15, and Virginia 84.17; while Massachusetts increased only 42.19 and New York only 70.63. (See Table 35 in Kennedy's Preliminary Report of the Eighth Census, 1860.) Not without reason a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly for March, 1928, selects Virginia and the period before 1861, as the place and happiest period on the world's whole history for retroactive reincarnation!

The North in our day is still the abode of the aristocracy —only instead of the principle of heredity, the principle of wealth is the basis. The vast accumulation of money into a comparatively small number of hands is fraught with danger, which creates a counterpart in the threatening socialistic and communistic societies, that are not true democracies at all.

The next principle of a political nature was self-determination. This received full expression in the Declaration of Independence drawn by Thomas Jefferson, a delegate from Virginia, and approved at that time by Congress and the American people. This asserted that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that "whenever any form of government becomes destructive of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation in such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

This right of changing the form of government, or of altogether abolishing it, was applied to the American Colonies—a part only of the British Empire—and it was a right to be exercised at their own conception of the reasons for the change and according to such principles as to the colonies, not the British Empire, should seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. On this principle the American Revolution was fought and won. The Union formed was one of consent, not of force.

Eighty-four years later, when Virginia threw off the yoke of the Federal government, she was perfectly consistent with herself. According to the Declaration of Independence she was entitled to the "enjoyment of happiness", but there could be no happiness in a Union in which her people were abused and traduced beyond all rules of decency—her civilization arraigned before the world by countless hordes of Northern writers and speakers, her citizens characterized as "slave drivers" and "slave breeders" and the motives of her statesmen attacked with all the virulence of a hatred that surpasses present belief.

Virginia was a small country by herself, but she was a thoroughly organized state, larger than many independent nations, and was possessed of a highly cultivated citizenship. Standing alone, she was entitled to self-government, of natural right, but the problem really confronting President Lincoln was a confederacy of eleven states, occupying a country half the size of Europe, and capable of fighting one of the greatest wars on record. If the Declaration of Independence meant anything, for the government of the United States to deny to such a people their own government was a self-stultification of the most obvious nature. Lincoln had said of the Southern people that in point of justice he did not consider them inferior to any people.

The war against the South was a colossal crime. In prosecuting it Lincoln resorted to the methods of the barbarous ages by the wholesale destruction of private property and the wholesale arrests of non-combatants—boys under military age and men over it. Even then he could never have won with the aid of purely the Northern States, but he had to call in the help of 150,000 foreigners and 200,000 Negroes, taken from the South's own population, and for the most part forced into his army. No stronger evidence could be given of this than his own words. (Lincoln's words were: "Abandon all the posts now garrisoned by black men, take 150,000 men from our side, and put them on the battlefield, or cornfield against us, and we would be compelled to abandon the war in three weeks." Complete Works of Abraham Lincoln, II., p. 562.)

THE DEAD KING.

Charles G. Hambidge.

Not maddest Winter knew so mad a king,
Quelling the Earth with terror-quaking name;
Tempestuous Furies trumpeted his fame;
No quarter did he beg, no mercy bring.
Unto the Earth his tearing claws would cling,
Till Beauty knew the bitterness of Shame;
Hope lingered last, a robin's breast aflame,
And sodden mankind hungered for the Spring.
The greening hills were first to break the spell.
The King is dead! The monster King of March!
And down they flung his stormy soul to Hell!
Nature now resumes her living torch.
Slim April laughs the wily Spring away.
No loveliness is lovelier than loveliness in May!

DOES IT MATTER WHAT ONE BELIEVES CONCERNING CHRIST?

"The Puritan said, 'I believe'; and when he said it he knew what he believed," said Dr. McFarland. "We hear much foolish talk about its not mattering what a man believes. Such talk is nonsense. A man's convictions of truth determine his manhood; and if he has no convictions he is a characteristic man."

JOHN WYCLIFFE

Reverend W. H. Bumsted

WEEK after week as we open our various Church papers we seem to see a little of the smoke, and feel a little of the heat of the wordy battles that have raged around the Pope's letter, the Conference, the Prayer Book controversy, and hear sometimes an echo of the tune that seems to be the best loved one of certain churches in the Anglican Communion: Rome Sweet Rome, There's no place like Rome.

We are told history repeats itself. It might be well, with this thought in mind to look back to a period when the Church was passing through such another troubled time as at present.

Let us, therefore, look back at the life of one man who was probably the greatest Englishman of his time and possibly one of the greatest of any age.

John Wycliffe was born in 1323 or 1324 in Yorkshire. His parents were lords of the manor since the Norman Conquest. He was educated at Oxford, probably Queens College. He was ordained Priest and finally obtained his Doctor's Degree. In 1363 he became Master of Balliol College, Oxford.

John Wycliffe first comes to public notice over the controversy originated by the refusal of Edward III. and Parliament to pay tribute money promised by King John, amounting to one thousand marks a year, to the Pope Urban V. So ably did John Wycliffe uphold the side of His King and the People that he became a national hero. They remembered King John and the Magna Charta. "Ecclesia Anglicana libera sit."

We next hear of Wycliffe in the role of an Ecclesiastical Reformer. He seeing, as he was bound to do, the evils, moral, social and religious that were flaunted on every side by the so-called Church of God compared them to the Teachings of Jesus Christ and His Apostles, and found them corrupt and contrary to God's Word. He denounced their wealth. He questioned their right to riches.

In 1374 Wycliffe became rector of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, which position he retained till his death.

In February, 1377, Wycliffe was charged with heresy. He was summoned by the Archbishop of Canterbury to appear for trial in the Lady Chapel of St. Paul's Cathedral. The heresies complained of were "only those questions which touched the wealth and power of the Church". Popular opinion was on his side, and, owing to the support of John of Gaunt and Lord Percy, the trial came to nothing.

The result was that the convictions of Wycliffe were strengthened. He saw more clearly the errors of the Church.

In the meantime an event was transpiring that had a great effect on him. It was the Papal Schism.

The College of Cardinals became divided. Two Popes were elected who quarreled and fought for supremacy and authority.

For seventy-three years previous there had been no Pope in Rome, but there had been seven who were Frenchmen who transferred the Papal See to Avignon in France. In 1378 the Cardinals who were nearly all Frenchmen elected Urban VI. to rule at Rome. Other Cardinals elected Clement VII. to rule at Avignon.

Thus there were two infallible heads of the Catholic Church. Each claimed to be infallible. Each claimed his own right. Each claimed to be Christ's Vicar on earth, and so:

Urban VI. ex-communicated Clement VII. as an imposter.
Clement VII. ex-communicated Urban VI. as an imposter.

All this made Wycliffe look upon the Pope as anti-Christ. He began his warfare against Rome and the Papacy by establishing his Poor Preachers or Lollards, who went about denouncing the abuses in the Church and preaching the Gospel to the poor.

In 1381 Wycliffe made the attack for which his name is famous. He denounced the doctrine of Transubstantiation which was first mentioned by Paschasius Radbertus, a monk of Corbey, about 830, and was officially established by Roman Synod in 1215. Wycliffe, after much reasoning, finally came to this conclusion, that the Bread and Wine remain the same before as after the consecration—just bread and wine only and that the Presence of Christ in the Sacrament is only in a spiritual sense, and in no other.

The angry Church came at him like wolves for his audacity, but he remained firm and never retracted these views, which views are those held by the Anglican Communion today.

Wycliffe now arrived at his great conclusion that all true religion should be in agreement with the Word of God and the teachings of Jesus Christ and His Apostles. "What saith the Scriptures?" was his reply to all. He objected to pardons, indulgences, auricular confession, image worship, adoration of the Host, absolution of the Priest. They were all false. This was a momentous thing for a man to say in any age, but especially so in the age in which Wycliffe lived.

He embodied these thoughts in his tracts.

These things that Wycliffe did were great inasmuch as it is to their influence, like a stone thrown in a pond, the ripples spread, so the ripples of John Wycliffe's influence spread until they were finally in the Reformation itself—its Prayer Book and its teachings.

But the greatest triumph of Wycliffe was his Bible. One must remember that before this there was nothing but a few fragments of the Word of God of Bede, of Alfred the Great and others, in the English language. Now comes to a thirsty people the full Word of God in the homely tongue that they knew, English. It was a translation from the Latin Vulgate of Jerome. He translated for the common people, plain, vigorous, homely words. Many of those self same phrases we use today. Thus

"The beame and the mote," "Strait is the gate and narewe is the waye."

It was first published in 1382. When one pauses to think that today one can purchase a complete Bible for one quarter dollar the stupendous wonder of the task that Wycliffe set himself and his helpers rises in front of our eyes, each word, each letter was written by hand. It is said there are one hundred and fifty copies still extant of his Bible.

Thus was completed the long thought-out plan—the Bible in English for the People—the stepping-stone for the glorious Reformation that was to follow—accomplished.

With this finished John Wycliffe's life begins to draw to a close. As parish priest of Lutterworth while celebrating mass on the last Sunday of the year, 1384, John Wycliffe was stricken by paralysis and gently falls to sleep on the last day of the year and goes to his long rest—hated by some, beloved by others, but always remembered as the man who first had the vision of a Church clean and pure—holy in its work, catholic in its deed.

By the Right Reverend John Charles Ryle, D. D.

(4) My fourth witness shall be a remarkable letter or circular issued by the Crown in 1721, entitled "Directions to our Archbishops and Bishops for the preservation of unity in the Church and the purity of the Christian faith, particularly in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity". The charge given to the Bishops in these directions is as follows: "You shall, without delay, signify to the clergy of your several dioceses this our Royal command, which we require you to see duly published and decreed: viz., that no preacher whatsoever in his sermons or lectures do presume to deliver any other doctrines concerning the great and fundamental truths of our most holy religion, and particularly concerning the blessed Trinity, than what are contained in the Holy Scriptures, and are agreeable to the three Creeds and the Thirty-Nine Articles of religion". The circular proceeds to direct the Bishops to put in force the famous statute of Elizabeth already quoted. But not one word do we find about the Prayer Book, from beginning to end. Of course, these "directions" have no binding force now, but as evidence of what men thought the test of Church religion in 1721, they are remarkable.

(5) My fifth witness shall be Thomas Rogers, chaplain to Archbishop Bancroft, who published in 1607, the first Exposition of the Articles which ever appeared. This book, we must remember, was written within forty years of the time when the Articles were finally ratified. It was a work of great authority at the time, and was dedicated to the Archbishop. In the preface to this work Rogers says:

"The purpose of our Church is best known by the doctrine which she does profess: the doctrine by the Thirty-Nine Articles established by Act of Parliament; the Articles by the words whereby they are expressed: and other doctrine than in the said Articles is contained, our Church neither hath nor holdeth, and other sense they cannot yield than their words do import."

Strong language that from an Archbishop's chaplain! I heartily wish we had a few more chaplains like him.

(6) My sixth and last evidence, for brevity's sake, I will give you all at once, in the words of five well-known Bishops of the Church, who have long passed away. They were men very unlike one another, and belonged to very different schools of thought. But their testimonies to the value and rightful position of the Articles are so curiously harmonious, that is is interesting to have them brought together.

(a) Let us hear then what great and good Bishop Hall says, in his work on "The Old Religion": "The Church of England, in whose motherhood we have all come to pride ourselves, hath in much wisdom and piety delivered her judgment concerning all necessary points of religion, in so complete a body of divinity as all hearts may rest in. These we read, these we write under, as professing not their truth only, but their sufficiency also. The voice of God our Father, in His Scriptures, and, out of them, the voice of the Church our mother, in her Articles, is that which must both guide and settle our resolutions. Whatsoever is beside these, is either private, or unnecessary, or uncertain." Hall's Works. Oxford Edition. Vol. IX., p. 308.

(b) Let us hear next what Bishop Stillingfleet says in his Unreasonableness of Separation: "This we all say, that the doctrine of the Church of England is contained in the Thirty-Nine Articles; and whatever the opinions of private persons may be, this is the standard by which the sense of our Church is to be taken." London, 4th edition, p. 95. 1631.

(c) Let us hear next what Bishop Burnet says: "The Thirty-Nine Articles are the sum of our doctrines, and the confession of our faith. Burnet on Articles, pref., 6. 1. Oxford Edition. 1831.

(d) Let us hear next what Bishop Beveridge says, in the preface to his great work on the Articles: "The Bishops and clergy of both provinces of this nation, in a Council held at London, 1562, agreed upon certain Articles of Religion, to the number of thirty-nine, which to this day remain the constant and settled doctrine of our Church; which, by an Act of Parliament of the Thirteenth of Queen Elizabeth, 1571, all that are entrusted with any ecclesiastical preferments, are bound to subscribe to." Beveridge on Articles, vol. 1, p. 9. Oxford Edition. 1840.

(e) Let us hear, lastly, what Bishop Tomline says: "The Thirty-Nine Articles are the criterion of the faith of the members of the Church of England." Elements of Theol., vol. II., p. 34. 1799.

Such are the testimonies which I offer to the attention of my readers, in proof of my assertion that the Articles, much more than the Prayer Book, are the true test of Churchmanship. The title prefixed to the Articles by Cranmer and Parker;—the famous statutes of the Thirteenth Elizabeth and Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth Victoria;—the Royal Declaration of Charles I., in 1628;—the Royal Circular to the Bishops in 1721; the express opinion of Rogers, Archbishop Bancroft's private chaplain—the deliberately expressed judgment of five such men as Hall, Stillingfleet, Burnet, Beveridge and Tomline—all these witnesses, taken together, supply a mass of evidence which to my eyes seem perfectly unanswerable. In the face of such evidence I dare not, as an honest man, refuse the conclusion, that the truest Churchman is the man who most truly agrees with the Thirty-nine Articles.

It would be easy to multiply witnesses, and to overload the subject with evidence. But in these matters enough is as good as a feast. Enough, probably, has been said to satisfy any candid and impartial mind that the ground I have taken up about the Articles has not been taken up in vain. He that desires to go more deeply into the subject would do well to consult Dean Goode's writings about it, in a controversy which he held with the late Bishop of Exeter. In that remarkable controversy, I am bold to say, the Dean proved himself more than a match for the Bishop. (Goode's Defense of Thirty-Nine Articles, and Vindication of Defence. Hatchard. 1848.)

One remark I must make, in self-defense, before leaving this branch of my subject. I particularly request that no reader will misunderstand the grounds I have been taking up. Let no one suppose that I think lightly of the Prayer Book, because I do not regard it as the Church of England's standard and test of truth. Nothing could be more erroneous than such an idea. In loyal love to the Prayer Book, and deep admiration of its contents, I give place to no man. Taken for all in all, as an uninspired work, it is an incomparable book of devotion for the use of a Christian congregation. This is a position I would defend anywhere and everywhere. But the Church of England's Book of Common Prayer was never intended to be the Church's standard of doctrine in the same way that the Articles were. This was not meant to be its office; this was not the purpose for which it was completed. It is a manual of public devotion: it is not a Confession of Faith. Let us love it, honor it, prize it, reverence it, admire it, use it. But let us not exalt it to the place which the Thirty-Nine Articles alone can fill, and which common sense, statute law, and the express opinions of eminent divines unanimously agree in assigning to them. The Articles, far more than the Prayer Book, are the Church's standard of sound doctrine, and the real test of true Churchmanship.

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES

Prepared by J. T. Bougher. Reading Terminal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

Lesson No. 33.

Topic—Death.

(Read 1 Cor. 15:1-58.)

This topic while not pleasing perhaps to some, should be of intense interest to all. The Holy Scripture recognizes the term "death", in two different aspects or meanings as two different "births" are also recognized, viz.: the natural or physical "birth", and also a spiritual "birth", when the same person after hearing the Gospel, receives the Lord Jesus Christ as his or her Saviour and is thus born of the Spirit into the family of God (John 3:8); and thereby receives the life eternal.

The physical death overtaking the earthly body is one of the results of sin, thus also proving that sin is universal (Gen. 3:19). There is also the second, or spiritual death, which takes place at the Judgment of the wicked, and involving eternal banishment from the presence of a Holy God and of the redeemed (Rev. 20:6, 14; Rev. 21:8). This spiritual death is reckoned as already being the state of the unregenerate man, who has not been born again (Eph. 2:1), hence he is without the new life, that can come only through Christ, the eternal one. When extended beyond the bodily or physical death, to the final habitation and from which there is no return, it is termed the second death (Luke 16:19-28).

PHYSICAL DEATH.

1. Man appointed to die.—Heb. 9:27.
2. Passed upon all.—Rom. 5:12.
3. A consequence of sin.—Gen. 3:19.
4. House of earthly pilgrimage.—Ps. 119:54.
5. Unearthly dwelling place.—2 Cor. 5:1.
6. The sting of death is sin.—1 Cor. 15:56.

DEATH IS NOT THE END.

1. The seed an illustration.—1 Cor. 15:37.
2. God supplys a body.—1 Cor. 15:38.
3. Sown a natural body; raised a spiritual body.—1 Cor. 15:44.
4. Some raised to everlasting life, and some to everlasting contempt.—Dan. 12:2.

THE SPIRITUAL OR SECOND DEATH.
Eternal Separation From God.

1. Judgment of "wicked dead".—Rev. 20:12.
2. The wicked and all nations that forget God turned into Hell.—Ps. 9:17.
3. Eternal banishment.—Rev. 21:8.
4. Includes all who are not recorded in the Book of Life.—Rev. 21:15.

5. Degrees in punishment.—Luke 12:47, 48.
6. Death and Hell also, find their awful doom.—Rev. 20:14.
7. No second death for the believer.—Rev. 20:6.

THE BELIEVER'S TRIUMPH OVER DEATH.

1. Death is swallowed up in victory.—1 Cor. 15:55.
2. Thanks be to God, a victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.—1 Cor. 15:57.
3. Christ has the keys of death.—Rev. 1:18.

5. But some will say, How are they raised up?—1 Cor. 15:35.
6. As the seed of grain.—1 Cor. 15:36-38.
7. Raised a spiritual body.—1 Cor. 15:44.
8. As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.—1 Cor. 15:22.
9. Christ, the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me though he were dead, yet shall he live.—John 11:25.
10. As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.—1 Cor. 15:49.
11. The earthly tabernacle dissolved, and a new one from heaven provided.—2 Cor. 5:1-7.

THE SINNER BELOVED and Other Modern Biblical Miracle and Morality Plays: By Phillips Endicott Osgood. Harper and Brothers, New York. Price, $1.75.

This is a volume of religious plays by one who is described as a pioneer in the restoration of the religious drama for the Church's use. Some of us question whether there are not already enough ways by which the Church can be drawn aside from her main task without adding another, particularly as the minister is supposed to give some of his too much divided time for leadership in it.

The book contains plays for parish house, or out-of-doors, and Miracle and Morality Plays for use in church. A drama of Hosea, a Christmas play, an allegory on Abraham, are among the number, some of the plays are good, others seem to be very defective in their teaching. The author has no conception of Evangelical Truth, his Dialogue on Nicodemus regards the Saviour largely as the Great Social Reformer of modern theory. The New Birth is a change into a world of other values.

He tampers also with the story of Hosea, and becomes the critic of Ezra. No doubt pageantry can be made a useful means of inculcating truth, but it should be loyal to the facts and should not pervert Scriptural truth in the interest of socialistic and liberalistic theories.

CHRISTIANITY OR RELIGION? By Arno Clemens Gaebelein, D. D. Publication Office, "Our Hope", 456 Fourth Avenue, New York. Price, $1.50.

In a day when Christ's deity is being denied and He is being reduced more and more to the level of a man solely, when God is imprisoned in His own world and pantheism is rampant, when the evolutionary hypothesis talks of a "fall upward" and the world is being deluded by false ideas of development in religion, Dr. Gaebelein has rendered a signal service in his book, "Christianity or Religion".

The book is no rearranging of one's prejudices as some one has defined much present day thinking, but represents the ripe scholarship of the consecrated intellect of one who coupled with a lifetime of spiritual experience and study of the Bible, evinces wide reading which is further attested by the number of authorities cited in the bibliography.

Starting with the definition of religion, he advances to the universality of religion in which he conclusively shows that "the religious and moral phenomena at present in the human race isolates mankind from animals."

The chapter on the origin and development of religion presents an unanswerable argument to the Modernist contention that the religion of man has evolved from polytheism to monotheism. Rather from a mass of evidence the religions of the world today are shown to be a corruption of a higher and purer religion and that the evolution has been downward, starting with purest monotheism and degenerating into polytheism.

In the chapter on the true origin and growth of religion the author disproves the higher critical position with regard to religious evolution. He accounts for the latter by Romans 1:28, "The various religious systems", he says, "are therefore accounted for by the Bible. They came into existence when man gave up the knowledge of the Creator".

He rises to a wonderful climax in the last chapter on Christianity. Here he meets the Modernist view that since Christianity is a religion it has defects as other religions and hence cannot be the final religion.

"But is Christianity a religion? No. Christianity is a supernatural revelation." In this chapter he gives seven supernatural facts attesting that Christianity is not a human religious system and not the result of a religious evolutionary system. This is a great piece of work. To use a musical figure having silenced some discordant notes of error sounded in the earlier part of the book the conductor assembles the whole orchestra of truth with the music of the gospel swelling in a wondrous diapason of tones that entrance and lift one to ecstatic heights. Or to change the figure as a master builder we see the temple of truth with its parts bound together by a cogent logic with facts buttressing, reinforcing and clinching the whole in such a way as to convince any one that it is "a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens".

Apart from clearing up difficulties by its masterly refutation of present day denial of the Bible, the author has set forth the Gospel in such clearness and fullness that for the sake of this clear exposition it is a book to be desired. We hope that it will be read by many and passed on to others to read.

THE ANGLICAN EPISCOPATE OF CANADA AND NEWFOUNDLAND: By O. R. Rowley. Morehouse Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis., and A. R. Mowbray and Co., London, England.

The following is an extract from the first chapter of a most interesting book entitled, "The Anglican Episcopate of Canada and Newfoundland", by Owsley Robert Rowley, author of The House of Bishops, Canada, 1907; with foreword by The Most Rev. and Rt. Hon. Randall Thomas Davidson, D. D., D. C. L., LL. D., K. C. V. O., G. C. V. O., Lord Archbishop of Canterbury:

Modern Civilization owes a great debt to the influence of Christianity, for the respect it has developed for properly constituted authority, without which authority, duly transmitted, there can be no stability of government. An official may be selected by popular vote, but authority to hold office must be derived from one duly empowered to transmit that authority and administer the oath of office.

The Church had its beginning with the Hebrew people. God revealed Himself for centuries to the Children of Men, through the medium of the Jewish Church, with its Bible, its Sacraments, and its Three-fold Ministry. As to who should constitute that Ministry, or concerning its authority, there has never been any doubt.

The great purpose and work of that Church was to prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah, and the completion of that Spiritual Kingdom, which should thereafter be known as the body of Christ. In the fulness of time God sent His Son into the world to take our nature upon Him, to become incarnate in human form that He might more fully reveal the Father, and establish a permanent medium of communication between God and man.

Christ came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but to fulfill. Therefore, it is inconceivable that He should have set aside the Sacramental system of the older dispensation, or that He should have annulled the divinely appointed Ministry and turned His Disciples adrift in the world to be guided by their own emotions, to find their own leaders, and to work out their own system of Church government. He gave them very definite and detailed instruction, and was very careful in the training of His Apostles, and in the forming of that Ministry that was thereafter to represent Him on earth. He sent them forth to the work of the Ministry with the commission of Divine authority, and that this authority was to be perpetual is evident from the promise, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world".

The Apostolic Ministry was not weakened by the defection and suicide of Judas, for under the direction of the Holy Ghost the vacancy was filled by the selection and consecration of St. Matthias.

Others were added to the Apostolic band as the needs of the Church required. In the Thirteenth Chapter of the Acts of the Holy Apostles, the Holy Ghost said, " 'Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them.' And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away. So they being sent forth by the Holy Ghost departed." There is no obscurity here. The inward call and the outward ordinance, the spiritual mission and the tactual commission, the Divine empowerment and the human authentication of it, cannot be separated.

The Son of Man did not come into the World to live, suffer and die, only to leave the deposit of Divine truth, unorganized and disembodied. His own coming was a true Incarnation, and His continued incarnation in the Church is just as real and just as certain.

By the Apostolic Succession the order of ministers begun by Christ, has been continued in an unbroken line from century to century, so that any one now elevated to the high office of the Episcopate is the lineal successor of the original Apostles, and receives his authority direct from Christ through that unbroken succession. To protect this succession and to prevent any break in its continuity, the Church has been very careful from the earliest times to provide that no one may be consecrated to the Office of Bishop unless at least three valid Bishops unite in prayer for that purpose, and also join together in the laying on of hands.

Thus the Apostolic Succession is not merely a chain, but rather a net, in which, through the ages, hundreds of interlacing lines mingle, making the continuity absolutely certain. It is therefore, comparatively easy to trace the succession of the present Bishop of Montreal, to whom this work is dedicated, from any of the original Churches at Jerusalem, Ephesus, or Rome.

St. James, spoken of in the Scripture as the Lord's brother, was the first Bishop of Jerusalem. He presided over the first Church Council, the record of which is found in the Fifteenth Chapter of the Acts of the Holy Apostles, and so on to John III. This John III., the fifty-first Bishop of Jerusalem, in 577 A. D., consecrated David to be the first Bishop af Wales. We, therefore, now trace the succession through the lines of Welsh Bishops, as follows:

52. David to 151 W. Howley.

152. John Bird Sumner, the ninety-first Archbishop of Canterbury, 1850, with the Bishops of Salisbury, Chichester, Oxford, Norwich and Toronto, consecrated Francis Fulford to be first Bishop of Montreal, who with six others in 1863 consecrated

153. J. W. Williams to be fourth Bishop of Quebec. He, with the Bishops of Huron, Niagara, Montreal, and Algoma, in 1879 consecrated

154. A. Sweatman to be third Bishop of Toronto, who with the Bishops of Quebec, Niagara, Ontario, Huron and Maine (U. S. A.) in 1909 consecrated

155. John Cragg Farthing to be fifth Bishop of Montreal.

THE CAUSE OF MANY A FALL.

Gipsy Smith tells a story of a young couple with whom he once stayed. They had an only child to whom they were devoted. One night at supper time a thud was heard on the floor of the room above. Both parents realized their little son had tumbled out of bed, and hurried to the rescue. No harm, however, was done; and the next morning Mr. Smith's chaffingly questioned the little fellow about the noise he had heard; and the child, when asked why he had tumbled out of bed, replied, "Cos I stayed too near where I got in".

VIRGINIA DELEGATION AND THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES.

Mr. Editor:

In the current issue of your valued paper the Rev. Mr. Ellis makes the following statements:

"It seems to be admitted on all sides now that a grievous mistake was made by the Virginia delegation when, at the last General Convention, they voted to remove the Thirty-Nine Articles from the Prayer Book . . . . should the members of that delegation, which so voted, embarrass their friends by asking them to send them to Washington? Should they not frankly say that having made the error, they will stand aside and let others try to undo the harm they have done? . . . . This we must do, not as a rebuke to our friends who composed the delegation and who cast the vote of Virginia for the resolution thus to mutilate the Prayer Book . . . etc."

It so happens that another Church weekly carries in its issue of April 21, a tabulation of the vote on the Thirty-Nine Articles in the House of Deputies at the General Convention of 1925. It is given by the Secretary of the House of Deputies himself and, with the record before him, we assume that he has made no mistake. He states that the clerical and lay deputies of the three Virginia Dioceses, Virginia, Southern Virginia and Southwestern Virginia, were unanimous in voting NOT TO OMIT the Articles from the Prayer Book.

It is difficult to picture the gentlemen who composed the Virginia delegation going about asking their friends to "send them to Washington"; but be that as it may, we feel sure that, in view of the above facts, Mr. Ellis will welcome the opportunity of withdrawing the charges he has made, and will no doubt feel moved to express his approval of the vote of the Virginia delegation in terms as vigorous as those in which he now condemns it.

Carleton Barnwell.

Mr. Editor:

Guilt being admitted the prosecution should be excused from consulting the record to prove innocence.

It was common talk when I came to the Diocese in January (I heard nothing of this before) that the Virginia Delegation had voted, as stated in my letter, to remove the Thirty-Nine Articles from the Prayer Book.

Members of the Clericus will recall that at a late meeting of the Clericus, with ten or fifteen members present, it was admitted by three of the brethren, members of the delegation, two in apologetic speeches, that they had voted affirmatively to remove the Articles from the Prayer Book.

I was told at the same time by a brother who was at that meeting that he had a letter in his pocket from the fourth member, expressing regret (being penitent, as he put it) for his vote to remove the articles.

Such was the situation at the time of the writing of my letter. Having no reason to doubt the word of these gentlemen, I can't see that I should be blamed for not consulting The Living Church to prove these brethren innocent by disproving their statements.

I wrote in all friendliness and seriousness, and can't see cause of regret in what I did with the facts as stated before me for guidance.

"HOKUM"

(An Appreciation of The New York Churchman).

Mr. Editor:

We have recently noticed two editorials in The New York Churchman with the caption, "Hokum". Not every editor would be so frank as to indicate the quality or nature of his editorials by such an approbrious title. Much modern thought, especially the thought that is tainted by a Russian complex, might be so captioned.

But the writer seems to be serious in his complaint against The Southern Churchman's suggested list of scholars. He does not know James M. Gray. Now it would not be astonishing to hear the average layman profess such ignorance; nor would it be exactly startling if the average clergyman professed ignorance as to Dr. Gray's identity. But to hear the Editor of the Church's most blatant journal of radicalism confess such ignorance, is, to say the least, rather amazing. An Editor is usually supposed to know what is going on about him. The Editor of a paper which professes itself to be "liberal" should assuredly know who are the prominent men, even though these men might represent a different school of thought.

Who is Dr. James M. Gray? He is at present the Dean of a Bible School which has an enrollment of about a thousand students. A recent pamphlet indicates that fourteen hundred men and women have gone forth from the school as missionaries. That makes a fair-sized school. He was a friend of Dwight L. Moody's, an honored friend, and was selected to be Dean of the School Moody founded, The Moody Bible Institute. That at least stamps him as a true Christian gentleman. He is the author of numerous books, which have had a circulation running into hundreds of thousands. One of his books, "Synthetic Bible Studies", was recommended by one of the professors of a certain "liberal" divinity school as being one of the best books for Bible study in print. This might indicate at least a modern attainment in scholarly pursuits. Dr. Gray's books may be found in practically all libraries and can be purchased in almost any book store which pretends to keep a representative stock of religious books. The general popularity of his books may be indicated by the fact that one can run across them in almost any second-hand book store. If the Editor of the New York Churchman will browse a bit in Schulte's, New York, he might run across one.

Dr. James M. Gray has lectured in practically every large city in the United States. He has conducted Bible classes in which the average attendance over long periods of time has been over five hundred.

Who is Dr. Gray? He is a man who has won thousands of men to Christ and who has never engaged himself in the business of destroying the faith which our Lord came to establish. This will not interest the Editor of the New York Churchman, but as a matter of information he should know it.

Who is Dr. Gray? Well, he is a sound Bible teacher, a scholar of the first water, a man who has never been identified with "Reds" or "Pinks" in either politics or theology.

We are confident that Dr. Gray would not know who is the Editor of The Churchman; but that the Editor of The Churchman should not know of Dr. Gray! Well, the editorial that confesses the ignorance has been properly headed "Hokum".

A Churchman.

"ALTARS."

Mr. Editor:

I was greatly interested in reading your editorial, "Altars", in Churchman of last week (April 21). Perhaps you would be interested to read the words of Mrs. Stevensson, the wife of Andrew Stevenson, our minister to England, who writes in a letter of 1840 thus: "Nothing has pleased me more in my visits to the splendid mansions, to the stately homes of the English nobility, than their strict observance in their families of every religious duty, prayers generally night and morning and every Sabbath evening. All their dependents are required to assemble in the great halls of their castles, or in the chapel, when the master or mistress of the family read the lessons, etc., and offer up a prayer. In most of the great families there is a chaplain, but if not the head of the family performs the duty. Oh, there is a moral beauty in it beyond all description, and when we witness such scenes one can no longer wonder at the happiness, prosperity and glory of this little Island."

Robert Coles.

NO LAW OF THE CHURCH.

Mr. Editor:

Letters coming to me from laymen and laywomen in various dioceses advise that certain clergymen have undertaken to forbid the laity to circulate the petition to the General Convention of the Church, asking it to vote down the resolution to do away with the Articles of Religion, and have made the statement that the laity have no right to do so without the permission of the rector of the parish.

I sincerely trust, therefore, that you will make public in your columns the fact that, under the Constitution and Canons of the Church, no Bishop or Clergyman has the right to forbid the laity to circulate this petition to the General Convention; and, further, that there is no law of the Church which requires a layman to secure the permission of his Bishop or Rector to circulate the petition. The statement, therefore, of these Clergymen is wholly without foundation and misleading to the laity.

The circulation of the petition cannot be blocked that way.

The laity of the Church have a perfect right, without the interference of Bishop or Clergy, to circulate and sign any courteous and respectful memorial or petition whereby their wishes may be made known to their General Convention, and I assume full responsibility for the statement that any Bishop or Clergyman who makes any statement to the contrary is deliberately misleading his people.

The Revised Prayer Book.

The following should be of interest, as it was written for "The Forerunner" by the Rt. Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery, D. D., Bishop of Massachusetts, and Chairman of the Commission on the Revision and Enrichment of the Book of Common Prayer:

The General Convention of 1913 appointed a Commission to study the Revision of the Prayer Book. A Commission, which has been steadily changed by death and new elections, has therefore been at work for fifteen years upon the difficult task. Representing as it does all schools of thought within the Church and all parts of the Nation, the members have been singularly united in the common endeavor to serve the most devout spirit within the Church. Because most of our recommendations have been unanimously voted by the Commission they have ordinarily been accepted by the Convention.

The Conventions of 1922 and 1925 have been quite insistent that the Revision should be completed in the Convention of 1928. The Commission has assumed that this insistence was a command upon them, and therefore at the Convention in Washington will present no new material, simply asking the Convention to act upon the material adopted for the first time at New Orleans. The Commission at its November meeting unanimously and whole-heartedly approved this decision to finish the work of Revision in 1928. Both laity and clergy are eager to have in their hands the Prayer Book as it now exists by the successive stages of the Revision. The inconvenience and uncertainty of the old and new in different books ought to come to an end.

Quite apart from the inconvenience of further delay is its futility. From time to time an individual here or there pleads that the revision be extended till 1931. Most of the reasons for such a plea have been presented to the Commission and to the Convention, and have been rejected. It hardly seems likely that they would be accepted if three years more were given. Each member of the Commission would like to plead longer for certain changes, but the Commission has had a fairly long experience, and its judgment on the futility of further delay ought to be carefully weighed. To wait three more years, and to find nothing gained would lead only to chagrin.

The Convention of 1925 gave to the Commission authority to edit the book, and to correct obvious errors. Such corrections will cover for the most part such trifles as punctuation, spelling, capitalization and the use of italics. But sometimes the editing may pass to slightly larger matters, provided they seem to the whole Commission obvious. For example, it seems to the Commission clear that when the provision to sing Agnus Dei "during the Communion Time" was not passed by the Convention, the rubric for the permission to sing a hymn, in the Prayer Book of 1892, should be restored. That it was not restored in the printed material sent out by the Convention of 1925 seems now to the Commission simply an oversight. To restore it is only legitimate and necessary editing.

There is not likely to be long discussion in the Convention over most of the material proposed in 1925 coming up for action in 1928. The only details in the Holy Communion which will come up are (1) printing the Prayer for Christ's Church Militant in paragraphs, (2) adding a few words to the closing paragraphs, and (3) the permissive insertion of Benedictus qui Venit after Ter Sanctus. Doubtless (2) and (3) will be fully debated, and having been rejected in previous Convention, are quite likely to be rejected again. At least that is the general experience in a conservative body.

The Commission, in its endeavor to dignify the Sacrament of Holy Baptism, made the office into a single service, so that it might be clear that it stood side by side with Holy Communion. Recently a severe criticism has been directed against this service; but the single service has been before the Church for nine years, has been adopted by two Conventions and only comes before this Convention because the printer of the Journal of 1922 had disarranged the parts of the service, and it seemed easier to the Commission to present the office as new matter in 1925. The Convention of 1928 is hardly likely to reverse the action of 1922 and 1925, especially since all the arguments now put forth have been heard by the previous Conventions. For the comfort of those who think the service for either infants or adults may be hard to follow, it may be said that the Commission believes that it can so print the service that any one can easily follow the order in either case.

The only other question which is likely to cause any division of opinion is the dropping of the Thirty-nine Articles from within the covers of the Prayer Book. They are technically outside the Prayer Book now. A few good orators on either side might decide this question one way or the other.

We have all been deeply interested in the fate of the English Revision. We must be impressed with the fact that our revision is followed eagerly by Prayer Book measure in England. The House of Representatives in Washington does not need to be asked what it things about it. But there is much to be said for the Established Church and for the fact that so many laymen care intensely what changes may overtake it. Our laity, too, have full responsibility. If all the Bishops and all the clerical deputies voted for a change in the Prayer Book; and one less than a majority of the lay deputies voted for it, that one layman could hold back the change.

The Commission believes that the changes so far adopted and the others which are likely to be adopted will add power, beauty and sincerity to the worship of the Church.

Services at Two Venerable Churches.

Bishop Guerry, of South Carolina, preached Sunday, April 22, at the annual service held amid the ruins of the old Sheldon Church, once a magnificent structure, built near Beaufort, on the South Carolina coast, in early colonial days. Nearly one thousand persons from Beaufort County and the counties of Hampton and Colleton, in South Carolina, and from the cities of Charleston, Savannah, Augusta, Columbia, Atlanta and Charlotte, N. C., attended, many of them descendants of the old and wealthy families that lived on plantations in Prince William Parish, of which Sheldon Church was the place of worship. Bishop Guerry confirmed a small class and preached the sermon. The vested choir of St. Helena Church, led the singing, and the Rev. R. M. Marshall, of that church, and the Rev. A. W. Skardon, of Walterboro, assisted the bishop. The purpose of the annual meetings at the church, which stands amid overgrown graves of its founders, is to keep alive interest, with the hope that in time money enough can be obtained to rebuild.

Trinity Church, Third and C Streets, Washington City, celebrated its centennial anniversary Sunday, April 29. Bishop Freeman preached the sermon and the Rev. Jackson Lanksford Cole, Vicar of Trinity, was the celebrant.

Jonathan Edwards presided over the meeting, held December 8, 1826, to consider the organization of Trinity Parish. By April 27, 1827, $700 had been subscribed, and the City Hall, through the courtesy of the president of the Common Council, was its temporary meeting place.

The Rev. Henry Van Dyke Johns was its first pastor and the first church was situated on Fifth Street between D and E Streets. Ground was broken for this church in 1828, and the congregation occupied the new structure on April 12, 1829. A month later it was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. Richard Channing Moore, Bishop of Virginia. Mr. Johns continued as rector until 1830. He was followed by the Rev. Chauncey Colton, the Rev. E. Y. Higbee and the Rev. Paul Owen. Francis Scott Key, author of "The Star Spangled Banner", was senior warden of the parish for a number of years.

In 1840 the Rev. John Stringfellow became rector and he was followed in 1847 by the Rev. C. M. Butler. In 1848 the plan was evolved to build a larger church, and $15,000 was raised for the new project. W. W. Corcoran made possible the present site on C Street at the corner of Third Street. The ground was broken on January 7, 1849; the cornerstone laid on April 2, 1850, and the first services were held in May, 1851.

During the Civil War Trinity Church became a military hospital. A floor was laid across the tops of the quaint box pews, whose nail marks may be seen in the woodwork to this day. Some of those still associated with Trinity Church remember the tall, gaunt figure of President Lincoln standing in Trinity Church where the baptistry is now placed, and looking with sad eyes on the suffering around him. During this period the congregation returned to its first place of worship and services were held in the City Hall and later in the nearby Wesley Chapel.

In 1867, the Rev. Thomas G. Addison began a pastorate of thirty years at Trinity Church. Following the Rev. A. M. Rich, who succeeded Dr. Allison, the Rev. Richard P. Williams was called to Trinity in January, 1897. After Dr. Williams became resident canon of Washington Cathedral in 1911, he was followed in the rectorship of Trinity Church by the Rev. George W. Van Fossen.

The change in the resident population near the church, with many of the congregation moving westward into newer parts of the city made the resources of the parish more and more limited until Bishop Satterlee took the parish under his immediate care and Trinity became the Diocesan Church as it is today with Bishop Freeman its rector.

Arrangements For the General Convention.

Arrangements for the General Convention of the Church at Washington, in October, are being shaped rapidly. It has been decided that the opening service of the Convention shall be conducted in the Cathedral Close, at Mt. St. Albans, if weather permits. If the weather is bad, the service will be transferred to the Washington auditorium. If the service is at the close, one hundred and fifty bishops in their ecclesiastical robes and college colors, headed by a choir of three hundred voices, will form a procession down the hillside of the natural amphitheatre in Cathedral Close to an elevated platform, from which the opening sermon will be preached.

This event will not only be attended by the entire membership of the Convention and various women's organizations, but by the general public to the extent, probably, of 15,000 people. Seats will be reserved for the members of the Convention and other organizations related to the Convention until 10:20 o'clock on the morning of October 10, after which no reservations will be held.

Another most interesting event will be the announcement of the United Thank Offering of the Women's Auxiliary on Thursday night, October 11, in the Washington Auditorium. Wednesday morning, the first day of the Convention, Corporate Communion will be celebrated in Epiphany Church at 7:30 o'clock, after which the entire body will be guests of the diocese at breakfast in the City Club, to its capacity, and the overow will be taken care of in the parish hall of Epiphany.

A reception will be given the entire Convention Friday night, October 12, either in the Corcoran Art Gallery or the Pan-American Building, announcement of which will be made later.

It was decided to invite President Coolidge to address the Convention in joint session at some time suitable to him.

The Rev. Charles T. Warner has resigned as chairman of the committee on opening services of the Convention and is replaced by the Rev. Dr. George W. Atkinson.

Meeting of Department of Publicity.

In connection with the regular meeting of the Department of Publicity the first of a series of study conferences in the publicity needs of the Church brought together for the first time representatives of all of the organized agencies within the Church which deal with evangelism. In addition to officers and members of the Department the following were present: from the National Commission on Evangelism, the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., chairman; the Rev. Wm. H. Milton, D. D., assistant to the chairman, the Very Rev. George R. E. MacDonald, Larkin W. Glazebrook, M. D., and Mr. Willard Warner; Mr. Leon Palmer, General Secretary, Brotherhood of St. Andrew; Captain B. Frank Mountford, the Church Army in the U. S. A.; Mrs. A. A. Birney, President, the Daughters of the King; Mrs. Kingman N. Robins of the Woman's Auxiliary and the Commission on Evangelism.

It was agreed that all of these agencies cooperate for purposes of general publicity with the National Commission on Evangelism, and that under the editorial direction of this agency of the National Council of the Church a department devoted to news of this movement be established in The Spirit of Missions. This conference reported its findings to the regular meeting of the Department, many of the group attending the latter session.

The executive secretary reported a new high peak in the circulation both of The Spirit of Missions and The Church at Work.

Meetings of the National Council.

The outstanding event in the meeting of the Department of Missions and the National Council, April 24, 25 and 26, at which twenty out of the twenty-six members were present, was the report of the Commission sent by the Department of Missions to China. This Commission was composed of the Bishop of San Joaquin, and the Executive Secretary of the Department of Missions.

The report described conditions in China as observed by the Commission during its visit of six weeks. It discussed the evangelistic work of the Church, especially in connection with the training and support of Chinese workers, along the lines of training, promotion of self-support, and the development of the Chinese Church. It reviewed at length the difficulties confronting the educational work of all Christian Communions in China, as a result of the promulgation of regulations requiring the registration of schools under conditions that in the minds of many missionaries and Chinese Christians would be destructive of their Christian character. The report recorded the excellent work done by mission hospitals, more than half of which are now closed or running under conditions which make their normal service to Chinese communities impossible. The Commission summarized its convictions in regard to the future of the Christian Church in China as follows:

As we studied past and present conditions in the Church in China we thanked God and took courage for the future. The Church has been wisely and solidly established. It is ecclesiastically independent. It is caring for some of its local concerns. It is growing gradually in strength and the sense of responsibility to maintain and spread the faith by which it lives. It has still a long way to go before it will realize the ideals of those—both Chinese and foreigners—who have given their best to its guidance and welfare.

Few would care to predict what the immediate future may have in store for China's people. They are feeling the impact of new and sometimes vicious ideas and practices. National customs and convictions are being shaken. China needs to know the constructive power of the Gospel.

The question is asked by some today: "Would you advise young American men and women, desiring to invest their lives wisely for the welfare of others, to give favorable consideration to China as a field of service?"

Our reply is emphatically, "Yes". China needs now, and will need for a long time, the highest gifts of heart and mind that the Christian Church of the West can supply, through her choicest men and women.

It was the Gospel of the Living Church that saved the Western world from ignorance and barbarism. Only the Gospel of the Living Christ can save China in this time of unsettlement, uncertainty and suffering.

As the Bishops of the Chung Hwa Sheng Kung Huei said in their pastoral letter of November, 1927:

"There are encouragements which in our opinion far outweigh the pain and sorrow of the disappointments and loss. We are convinced that the Victory of the Gospel of Jesus Christ is already assured in China, and that its claim is being established to be the one force which can unify and bring peace and salvation to this great country."

The Gospel must be revealed in Christ-like lives. It must be told over and over again in church and chapel and preaching hall. It must be taught in our schools and exemplified in our hospitals.

Yes, "the one hope for China is Christ, and when other teachings have failed, the oppressed and starving people of this land will surely turn their longing eyes to Him".

May the Church in the United States show the courage and faith of the ambassadors for Christ she has sent to China. May she enter into their plans and their hopes and join in their prayers and their sacrifices. Then she will share with her Lord in the victory that will surely be His.

Bible Society Helps Blind.

Ninety-one years of service to the blind in the United States is the record of the American Bible Society. ### Virginia Seminary Faculty Endorsed.

The Valley Convocation at its final meeting on April 25, adopted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, the faculty of the Virginia Theological Seminary has in the last issue of the Bulletin stated in unmistakable terms, the facts about the present situation there; the Valley Convocation congratulates the Virginia Seminary on the facts contained in the Bulletin, which show that in number of students and missionary zeal the Seminary has in the last ten years outstripped any similar period of its history. Especially gratifying is the following statement:

> "The Seminary has sent out more missionaries to the foreign fields in the past ten years than in any previous decade of its history. Its missionary bishops and clergy are throughout the West. The alumni know that as a matter of fact its faculty hold and teach, to the best of their ability, the Christian faith as recorded in the Bible, which they believe to be inspired, and as witnessed to in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. And the divinity of Christ, and the saving power of His atoning sacrifice, are, we trust not only formulae which we accept, but personal faiths in the light of which we try to think and live."

Therefore, be it resolved, that the Valley Convocation, expresses complete confidence in the faculty of the Virginia Seminary, its teaching and missionary zeal, and pray for it God's continued blessing and protection.

Be it further resolved, that a copy of this resolution be spread upon our minutes, published in the Virginia Churchman, the Southwest Virginian, The Southern Churchman, other Church papers and the secular press.

Laymen's Association Meeting.

The regular spring meeting of the Rappahannock Valley Convocation will be held at St. John's Church, Tappahannock, Va., on May 9 and 10. The Laymen's Association hours will be on afternoon of May 9 and speakers will discuss:

1. Can the Laymen's Association be Made to Function Locally as the Woman's Auxiliary Does?

2. What Kind of Program Can We Suggest for Such Local Meetings?

We are hoping that representative laymen will be present from each parish and mission or church in the Convocation May 9.

The April Meeting of the Baltimore Clericus was held at the Church of the Nativity, Forest Park, the Rev. Hugh Powers, rector. A beautiful new church building has been completed within the past year and the members of the Clericus were given an opportunity to inspect it for the first time. Following luncheon an address was delivered by the Rev. Beverly D. Tucker, rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, on the subject, "The Church and Christian Reunion".

Because of the wide publicity which has been given Dr. Tucker's experiments in practical unity in his own parish church, more than ordinary interest was evidenced in his paper. It became clear that the newspaper reports had misrepresented his position regarding confirmation. He had not advocated the non-necessity for confirmation, but simply that the validity of the vows made by members of the Protestant Churches should not be questioned by the necessity of "re-confirmation" when such members wished to transfer to the Episcopal Church. Dr. Tucker has tried this in his own church as an experiment without any assumption that members so received were in full communion with the Episcopal Church at large. A frank and open discussion following the reading of the paper and it was generally felt that this had been one of the most worth-while meetings of the Clericus for many months.

Reports Coming In from the various churches regarding Holy Week and Easter indicate record congregations. At Old St. Paul's 32,600 people were present during the noon-day services through Lent, while the Easter communicants numbered over 1,100. At Grace and St. Peter's four hundred persons were unable to gain admission to the 10:30 Easter service, and the number of communicants at all the services amounted to 1,007. Offerings of over $5,000 were presented for the new parish house and current expenses. At Emmanuel the Good Friday services were attended by more than 2,000. The Tenebrae was very beautifully sung in the evening. On Easter Day 3,375 people attended the services. The offering was devoted toward reducing the mortgage indebtedness on the parish house. Other churches in the diocese were proportionately well attended.

The Corporate Communion of the Mission Study Classes of the Diocese was held at Grace and St. Peter's Church on Wednesday in Holy Week. This service is held annually, the offering going toward the Edith Duer Memorial Library in Porte Allegre, Brazil. Miss Duer was a devoted member of Grace and St. Peter's Church. The Library, erected in her honor, is now completed and paid for.

Trinity Church, Ten Hills, the Rev. Edmund H. Gibson, rector, is attempting an experiment in week-day religious instruction. Every Tuesday and Wednesday, immediately after the close of the public schools, the rector holds classes in applied Christianity for the children of the community regardless of their church affiliation. He is receiving splendid cooperation from the parents.

To Vote to Retain Articles.

The delegates to the Diocesan Convention from Grace Church, Morganton, have been instructed to vote to retain the Thirty-Nine Articles in the Prayer Book, and to vote against the election of any delegate to the General Convention to be held in Washington, who will favor their being taken out of the Prayer Book.

Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Bishop.

Church Club Meeting.

The proposed elimination of the Thirty-Nine Articles from the Prayer Book of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States and other proposed changes in the Prayer Book were discussed at a meeting of laymen of the Church in the diocese on Monday night, April 23 in the Church House, Philadelphia.

The meeting was held under the auspices of the Church Club of Philadelphia, an organization of laymen representing in its membership nearly all congregations of the communion in the Diocese of Pennsylvania. Invitations to be present at the meeting and to take part in the discussions were extended to all the lay deputies to the Diocesan Convention, which holds its sessions in Holy Trinity Church, Rittenhouse Square, beginning May 1.

In addition to the proposed changes in the Prayer Book, the Church Club meeting discussed a number of other important matters which are to come before the Diocesan Convention, with the exception of Bishop Garland's request for a Bishop Coadjutor. Separate committees of laymen and of the clergy are now considering the question of submitting a number of names for Bishop Coadjutor to be submitted to a Laymen's Conference and a Clergy Conference to be called some time before the Convention meets.

The coming Diocesan Convention will be called to take action on the proposed changes in the Prayer Book, including the proposed elimination of the Thirty-Nine Articles.

Miss Beardsley Visits Diocese.

In March and April Miss Edna B. Beardsley, of the Field Department of the Woman's Auxiliary, visited and held conferences and meetings in twenty-nine of the parishes and missions of West Missouri. Renewal of interest in the wider work of the Church and a clearer understanding of its whole program has followed her visits and addresses.

On Sunday, March 18, the Rev. Richard M. Trelease, General Secretary of the Field Department of the National Council, concluded an eight-day mission at All Saints' Church, Neveda, Mo. He was assisted on two days by Miss Beardsley who held afternoon and evening conference with women of the parish. This church is without a rector, but as result of the mission its people have determined to secure and support a priest and in the meantime to have regular Lord's Day services with aid of clergy of the diocese and lay readers. A parish canvass is under way; work of the Woman's Guild and Auxiliary is being enlarged and extended; a Men's Club is contemplated, and many passive Churchmen give promise of resuming active Church life.

The Rev. Henry Neal Hyde, Executive Secretary of the Diocese, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood on Sunday, March 25. He was ordained by Bishop F. D. Huntington, of Central New York, in Trinity Church, Syracuse, of which he was made rector the next day, becoming rector of the parish church in which he had been baptized, confirmed ordained, and served his diaconate. After seven years there he served seven years at Christ Church, Little Rock Ark,. two years at St. Philip's Church Joplin, Mo., and nine years at St. Paul's-by-the-Lake, Chicago. Mr. Hyde kept his anniversary at the altar and in the pulpit of St. Mark's Church, Kansas City.

Distinguished Church Visitors.

Florida has entertained a number of distinguished Church visitors of late among them being Bishop Warren L. Rogers of Ohio, Bishop Joseph Marshall Francis of Indianapolis, Bishop Philip Cook of Delaware, Bishop John Newton McCormick of Western Michigan, and Bishop Nathaniel S. Thomas, one-time Bishop of Wyoming.

In addition to these Episcopal prelates, several of whom brought their wives with them. Florida has also had the privilege of entertaining and hearing the Rev. Edmund J. Lee, minister-in-charge of Grace Church, Anking, China. Mr. Lee spoke to the Church School and the morning congregation of St. John's, Jacksonville, on Sunday, March 18, and delivered a most interesting and instructive address on the present situation in China. To have heard Mr. Lee gives the Church at home an optimistic view of the deep roots which Christianity has struck in China and leads one to feel that once again "the blood of the martyrs" has become the "seed of the Church".

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. W. R. Starley, D. D., Bishop.

Mortgages Paid.

The congregation of the Church of the Mediator, Edgewater, has during the past year paid off the balance upon the rectory mortgage. This leaves a fine property free of encumbrances and permits the congregation to turn its thoughts toward the building of a much desired new church.

On the occasion of the Bishop's Visitation for Confirmation, St. Peter's Mission, Rochelle Park, arranged a parish supper in the early evening and at the close of the evening service burned the mortgage, thus setting the mission free from all indebtedness. Plans are now being worked out for a suitable rectory, it being desired as soon as such a house can be built, to secure the services of a resident clergyman for this rapidly growing community.

Teacher Training Institutes.

The Department of Religious Education of the Diocese of Newark has planned for the Church School Officers and Teachers three Teacher Training Institutes at three different centres in the diocese: St. Paul's Church, Jersey City; Trinity Cathedral, Newark, and St. Paul's Church, Paterson. It includes a series of instructions of two hours in length on five Tuesday nights, April 17 and 24 and May 1, 15 and 22. At St. Paul's, Jersey City, the Rev. Louis Pitt of St. Mark's Church, Newark, will give a course on the "Principles of Teaching", and the Rev. Chas. E. McAllister, Executive Secretary of the Diocese, will give a course on "How to Teach Missions". At Trinity, New-

O Almighty God, Who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men; Grant unto Thy people that they may live the thing which Thou commandest, and desire that which Thou dost promise; that so among the sundry and manifold changes of the world our hearts may surely there be fixed, where true joys are to be found; through Jesus Christ Our Lord. ### SEASONS.

God nurtures in His garden many fruits:
Some, very slow of growth, becomes at last
Sweet and enduring; some put forth their shoots
With hasty promise, bloom, and soon are past.

Each has its season, and the husbandman
Waits patiently, remembering that each
Must strive within its nature as it can,
Its own appointed destiny to reach.

So patiently the eye of faith can see
The nettle-blooms of war and hate increase
While slowly through the ages grows that tree
Whose leaves are healing, and whose fruit is peace.

"How Little You Trust Him!"

With all the pomp of his court, and with all of his extensive trapping and apparel, the most extravagant king in Jewish sacred history could not touch the majesty of a lily. The rich purple of the sovereign was a put-on glory; it was spectacular, but artificial. The modest array of the lily was a part of its life; it was simple, but it was natural.

Not one suggestion appears here that there should be any avoidance of a glorified existence. The whole section in which this Scripture appears points to highly privileged states of being Birds, flowers, men—all suggest some useful vital function; and to each of these forms of life there was some eternal concern, some intimate creative interest, that gave dignity to living.

If there is found any disturbing element in the teaching of Jesus, it is the evident implication that men easily lose the sense of the real qualities of life. Endowed as they are with the most penetrating perceptions, they allow themselves to be dulled to beauty, unimpressed with duty, and uninspired by the realities that are essentially at the heart of religion.

One purpose of Jesus was to correct this. Men were the children of God; why, then, should any one be allowed to live without the stimulating consciousness that, irrespective to social position or to material privilege, they were intimately involved in an infinite and eternal love! Human existence is essentially glorious. Even average capacities for thoughtful understanding open to any one wide opportunities to live happily and to work intimately with the Creator.

This was a new impulse in religion then. It is new enough, and real enough, to stir us deeply yet. For we still live in times when the commonplace seems thick and drab, and when exalted positions or unusual privilege tend toward artificiality.

This drift toward the artificial is evident in our religious practice just as it is in other phases of our living. It is to be seriously doubted if we can get as accurate a measurement of spirituality as we think from church rolls, great conventions, or even the number of churches in a community. All of these may mean much; on the other nand, they may mean very little.

How glibly we talk at times of "winning souls to Christ" just as if we are rescuing men and women from an eternal awfulness by some high powered "go-getter" kind of a religion. How high some of our enthusiasms become when we see some modified form of "big meeting" sway people into the kind of committal the immediate situation may require. And these things are so generally prevalent in a great many of the Christian communions today.

Certainly we may be glad that men and women are responsible to religious appeal. We may be glad that some moral effort is made to reach them for the higher interests related to Christian living. But to many observers of these situations there is a pain of spirit because we have not yet devised many efficient methods of really making people aware of their eternal sonship with God. It has not been as much of our interest as it should have been to help men and women to feel in their business of living that there are attainable virtues in daily experience that would go far in making this world conform to the ideals of Jesus.

It is no surprise that a verse a little further on (v. 30) gives us one of the most vigorous appeals that Jesus ever made: "O men, how little you trust him!" What an appeal it must have been—what an appeal it is now!

So many today are passionately interested that the great historic positions of the Church shall be perpetuated that their appeal is that men and women shall yield their lives to help "defend" religion. What a lack of trust in religion after all!

And there are many who still see religion a mere matter of the Bible to such an extent that only as there are Biblical patterns is there any course open for human policies. Their appeal, too, is for "defense" for some thing that does not need it. A lack of faith again, indeed.

Is there not some way whereby this presentation of Jesus can be placed again at the spiritual uses of mankind? There are such fine devotions of the human spirit that need to be brought out so that in natural ways the heart of man can find the heart of God. There are so many accessible beauties today for our consideration, and our meditation, that can be used to open our spiritual appreciations; can we not find a way for the simple interest of Jesus to become effective through these in this matter of turning lives to the resources of religion?

There seems to be a growing hope that ere long we will re-awake to some of these means to bring the life of men into play with the work and purposes of the eternal. It is evident at times that this simple method of approach to the spiritual problem will become our approach. The bird and the flower, the sea and the mountain, the creative abilities of men as they can be seen in art and music and vast varieties of thought production, are bidding to be the new avenues of spiritual experience. Our widening and deepening insights into human history, our growing knowledge of the moral struggles of the races, and our extending understanding of the sweep of the universe are also promising to bring men into closer relationships with God.

"O men, how little you trust him!"

What I Saw in Bible Lands.

Again and again, at second hand, I have heard about the work the Near East was doing. I want now to bear witness to the things that my eyes have seen and my hands have handled concerning the Near East Relief work.

Let me take you first of all to Athens where I found several hundred refugee orphan boys under the care of Near East Relief. It was bitter cold then in December. There was no heat in the building, dinner was being prepared. The boys were dancing about to keep warm when suddenly they broke forth into a glorious harmonious Greek chant expressing thanks to Almighty God for His benefactions. I have never forgotten those boys, before bare board tables, singing their thanks in one of the most glorious chants I have ever listened to.

Come down from Athens to Corinth—to old Corinth where Paul walked and taught. And yet I confess that the more vivid recollections concern Old Corinth, but New Coriinth just a few miles away with the Near East Relief orphanage. I shall not forget that day when I stood before 1,200 boys and girls and tried to represent America. I spoke in English—a man on my right translated it into Greek and a man on my left into Armenian. We have a great reputation to live up to, at least in one place in the world, and that is in the hearts of those children of the Near East.

Let us go over from Corinth to Beirut. More splendid orphanages and a rescue home for girls from Turkish harems. Scores upon scores of girls, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen years of age rescued from the harems. No friend on earth except the Near East Relief. And then I went south from Beirut toward Nazareth. Past Sidon the marching ground of conquerors: Hittite Kings, Egyptian Pharaohs, Sennacherib, Alexander the Great and Napoleon all were there. But upon those hills there walked the feet of another Conqueror—Jesus. History would not give these men the memorial that that greatest of conquerors left—the Near East Relief Orphanage upon the hillcrest of Sidon. There were just two main things in Nazareth that reminded me of the Master. One was the "Virgin's Fountain" and the other was the Near East Relief Orphanage where they are teaching boys to be carpenters in His home town.

I come back thus to bear testimony to the things I have seen. The thing Near East Relief is doing is tremendously worth while. We must keep on with it until it is finished. The parable of the Master shall not be true that we started a tower which we were unable to finish. Our help means life or death to these children, but there are hours when I think perhaps it is more important that we should keep this work up because of what it will do to us. I suppose it is not wicked to be prosperous; but when you have come back from the Near East, where you have seen the beaten and homeless populace, you cannot walk the streets of our cities without feeling that we are under one of the most tremendous temptations that ever faced a people. Let us welcome every chance to give for the care of these orphan children under American care and to give until it hurts.—Rev. Harry E. Fosdick.

IN MAY.

Virginia Woods.

Come out to the garden where columbines sway,
For cloudless above is the deep blue of May.
The sweet, sunny Harrison roses are gay,
And bright golden lilies are blooming:
And the cardinal sings with exuberant zest,
And joyous, the orioles fashion their nest,
And the locusts, aglow with the roses of the West,
The light blowing breeze are perfuming.

Now as for her bridal the earth is made fair,
Her songs of rejoicing are heard everywhere,
A flush of new vigor now thrills through the air,
In the radiant sunlight residing.
And now by the life of the May time we know
That the Infinite Love His new life will bestow,
As we joyously yield Him the love that we owe,
Our all to His keeping confiding.

Made Perfect in Weakness.

My grace is sufficient for thee, for"—what follows? It is a very strange reason. What would you expect to find? "My grace is sufficient for thee, for My strength is infinite, unchanging, unwearying, abundant, inexhaustible?" That would be a sufficiently good reason. "My grace is sufficient for thee, for thou art so persevering, so faithful, and loyal? Thy strength is so nearly adequate that I can easily make up for what is deficient." That would be a natural reason. The reason assigned is just clean contrary. "My grace is sufficient for thee, for My strength is made perfect in weakness, and you now are weak enough to appreciate and appropriate and assimilate My grace."—Prebendary F. S. Webster, M. A.

Said a dear little lass,
And danced about in a flutter.

Oh! don't you wish you were me!"

PARAPHRASE
(Psalm 103, vs. 1 to 14).

Gene Scott Wright.

Praise thou the Lord, my soul!
His mercies be thy theme,
Who hath forgiven all thy sins,
His blood, the cleansing stream.
His kindness crowns thy life,
None shall thy soul destroy—
He saves thee in the midst of strife,
Renews thy youth in joy.

The Friend of all oppressed,
He is to anger slow;
As far as east is from the west,
So far our sins shall go.
If we but fear His name,
And call to Him for aid,
He will remember all our frame,
That we of dust are made.

Suffer Little Children.

It was evening, the tasks of the day were finished; the little family of David was on the housetop of its little home in the outskirts of Capernaum. The mother held wee Joseph in her arms, humming softly, while Andrew and Rebekah, wide-eyed, listened to the tales Father David was telling of his boyhood.

In the quietness came the sound of some one running and Philip, a lad who lived next door, burst in their midst. "Oh, Andrew, Rebekah—every one—listen," he cried. "Dost remember the Jesus whom we heard them talking about at the market place yesterday? 'Tis said he'll be at Capernaum on the morrow. Wouldst thou care to go there—mayhap, we will see Him?"

"O Mother! Father!" the children's voices rose high and clear. "May we not go—wilt thou take us—may we look for that Jesus?" "Hush, my children," said the mother. "We will ask thy father."

Turning to David, she said, "What sayest thou, David?" Slowly, as was his custom, David spoke. "Aye, Mary, it would be a fine thing for our children to see this Jesus of whom men are talking so much. Thou art going, Philip—thou wilt help Mary watch over the little ones?" "Aye, Mother, and I will both go and help with them." Andrew and Rebekah clapped their hands joyfully. "We'll be so good," they promised. "Perhaps thou'll begin thy good behavior by going to thy rest at once," said Mary. "Art thou ready? See, the baby is fast asleep and I must take him in." Readily Rebekah and Andrew followed their mother down, leaving Philip to talk with David.

As the children knelt at their prayer before going to bed, Mary heard Rebekah say softly, "O God of our Fathers, may we see Jesus—wilt Thou help us to find Him?" In her heart Mary echoed that prayer. Knowing how her children longed to see Jesus, she too whispered a prayer that on the morrow they might find Him.

When the children were safely in bed she called David to help her make plans for the journey. Together they decided the time to start—early morning, for though not an hour's journey for a grown man, it would take much longer for Mary and the little ones. "Thou must take a bit of lunch, Mary," spoke David. "The little ones will be hungry. It will be a long day for them." "Aye, we will take bread and dates," returned Mary. "The children like best the dates of our own trees." "Now, thou, too, must rest, my Mary, for it will be early when thou must arise on the morrow." So Mary, too, lay down to rest, and she, as well as the children, dreamed of the next day's journey

It was scarcely daylight when Mary and David arose in the morning. Soon they heard the voices of Andrew and Rebekah in excited whispers. "Come, my little ones," called Mary. "Thou must help me this morning. Andrew, thou wilt fetch me fresh water. Rebekah, thou must dress wee Joseph while mother prepares the morning meal." Swiftly the children rose and dressed; then went about their tasks.

As he went past Philip's house, on his way to the well, Andrew called out, "Art thou ready, Philip, to start for the village"? "Aye," came the answer, "Mother and I are ready to go now." So Andrew hastened home, that they too might be ready to start soon.

When the meal was finished, and the favorite lunch of oat cakes and dates made ready, Mary, with Joseph in her arms, and Rebekah and Andrew at her side, bade David good-by. Laughing, David swung Andrew high in the air, then said as he set him on the ground, "Be a good child, my son; and thou, too, my little Rebekah. Take good care of thy mother."

Philip and his mother joined them as they started forth. "Give me the baby. He is too heavy for thee to carry." So saying, Philip lifted the laughing baby high on his shoulders and strode ahead. Rebekah and Andrew raced on beside him.

As they went on their way, others joined them. They, too, had heard of this Jesus who loved every one. Little, lame Samuel was there, hopping bravely along, and the mothers whispered among themselves that he might be made whole. As the laughing children went on, they gathered flowers in their hot, little hands, for, as one little maiden said softly, "Even Jesus must love the flowers".

As they drew nearer the city, Philip cried out, "Let us rest a bit in yonder grove. The roads are dusty, for we have had no rain; the women are tired, and the little ones are ready to eat a bit." For a little while they rested in the cool shade; then as they saw more people journeying toward the city gates, they hastened on. At last they were within the city, but now they must go slowly, for there were many people. "I wonder where Jesus is," whispered Rebekah to her mother. "Over there," was the reply. "See where the crowd is gathered."

Slowly they reached the edge of the group around the Master. In spite of the crowd, they managed to see Jesus as He stood there, His splendid head held high, His voice ringing clearly as He talked.

Closer and closer drew the children. At last they were surrounding the Master, their happy faces lifted up to Him, their eyes shining as they watched Him. And then—they felt themselves pushed away by men who were saying, "Stand back, the Master is busy. He has no time for children."

For an instant the happy faces dimmed, but almost before they could realize the hurt, they heard the voice of Jesus says, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of God."

Instantly they turned to the Master, who stood with His arms outstretched to them. The children surrounded Him -even shy, little, lame Samuel crept close until the Master's hand rested upon his curly head, and the Master's voice said softly, "Thou art whole now, my little Samuel, and thee, too, my little ones," as He gathered them closer. "Ye are all mine—my love rests upon thee forever."

To the mothers standing near those words brought a sense of peace and happiness. They knew their little ones had received much. They knew that the blessing of the Master would guide them and strengthen them, always. It would never be lost—it must live on and on in their lives—and in the lives of their children—forever and ever.—Ruth Rodan, in Herald of Gospel Liberty.

One Little Indian and How He Grew.

By Edith Scamman.

"Let us play Indian now!"—how many of you boys and girls have said this when you have become tired of other games? But how would you like to be a really, truly Indian boy like Swift Arrow? If I gave you three guesses I don't believe you could tell me how Swift Arrow got his name.

Once upon a time his grandfather, Big Buffalo, was chief of a tribe of Indians. He ruled over their pow-wows, went with them after big game and led them out to fight other tribes. One summer it was very hot in the land of the Dakotas. There had been no rain for weeks and weeks. The growing corn, so fresh and green in the springtime, was now so dry and thirsty that the leaves rustled and rattled in the hot wind.

Many of the Indians do not know about God, our dear Heavenly Father, whom we love. They think that there are many other gods—gods of the sun, the moon, the woods, the rivers and the mountains, but they do not love these gods; indeed they are very much afraid of them. So Big Buffalo thought that the gods must be angry with his tribe. For weeks he and his warriors had prayed for rain.

One hot summer afternoon a big, black cloud appeared in the sky, the thunder boomed, and zigzag streaks of lightning leaped from cloud to cloud. The Indians believed that the lightning bolts were the arrows shot from the big bow of the Thunder God. The shower happened to come on the very day that Big Buffalo's little grandchild was born. So he named the wee papoose Swift Arrow, as a way of saying "Thank you".

Swift Arrow's mother made him a cunning little cradle, very different from your cradle and tied him in tight. Sometimes she carried the little papoose cradle and all, on her back, and sometimes when she was busy cooking in the tepee, or working in the garden, she hung him, snug and cozy in his cradle, on the branch of a big tree.

When Swift Arrow had seen the wild cherries ripen seven times, which is an Indian way of saying that he was seven years old, the "pale face" mission teacher came to live in the village. "Winona" or "Bread Giver", the Indians called her because she was so kind and was always doing nice things for them.

At first Swift Arrow shook his head when his playmates, Gray Wolf and Lone Eagle, begged him to go with them to the little frame house where Winona lived, and where day after day, a group of Indian children gathered about her. Instead he raced up and down the prairie on his little pony, Dust Maker. But one Sunday, as he peeped in the window and listened to the "big music" his friends were making, he decided to venture inside. After that every morning found Swift Arrow in the tiny school house. Winona taught the children to read and sing from the "talking leaves", told them pretty stories, and showed them how to play strange new games.

One afternoon, two summers later, on returning home after a ride Swift Arrow was much surprised to see a group of braves in front of his grandfather's tepee. Several Indian women were moaning and waving their arms back and forth. His grandfather sat inside holding Red Bead, Swift Arrow's little sister, in his arms. Her eyes were closed. On one bare brown foot was an ugly red spot. An old Indian, his face smeared with yellow and black paint, stood beside a rusty kettle. He looked so fierce and savage that I think you boys and girls would have been dreadfully afraid of him. But Swift Arrow recognized Long Arm, a well-known medicine man of the tribe. Swift Arrow also knew too well what the red spot meant. Darting out of the tepee he ran as fast as an Indian boy can run to the little frame house. For did not Winona know more than Long Arm who made big medicine and called on the Indian god?

When they reached the tepee Long Arm was going away shaking his head sadly. Winona bathed Red Bead's swollen foot and looked carefully at it. "A bad snake bite!" she exclaimed, "I am afraid it is too late. There is a Doctor —Doctor Lowell—who might save her, but he is too far away, at Red Gap, a good twenty miles north." Swift Arrow thought of the long ride, and of the night which would soon come, hiding the prairie in darkness. But he loved Red Bead dearly.

"I go," he said quietly, "get pale face doctor—be quick," and before Winona or Big Buffalo fully understood, the hoof beats of a pony were heard outside, and a cloud of gray dust, like a puff of smoke, could be seen across the prairie. Dust Maker certainly lived up to his name that day. When it grew dark, Swift Arrow felt very lonely and afraid. The dark shadows of bushes or over-hanging rock seemed to leap out at him. A coyote barked not far away. But he kept thinking of Red Bead, and gripping the pony's mane urged him on faster. You can imagine how glad he was to see the twinkling lights of Red Gap ahead. He had never been to the town before, but he soon found the doctor and told him his story. The doctor was a follower of Jesus and, like Him, loved little children whether white or black or red. So, without any delay, he started back with Swift Arrow down the long trail across the plains.

Big Buffalo met them at the entrance to the tepee. "She still breathes," he said. Swift Arrow almost fell off the saddle, he was so stiff and tired. But his heart beat fast with joy. For they were not too late, and the pale face doctor made Red Bead well and strong again.

"Heap brave Indian boy—the pride of my eyes. I give you anything you want," Big Buffalo told his grandchild a few days later. "A new pony? A saddle? What you wish!"

"I want to go to Santee, the mission school the pale face told me about when we rode through the dark," Swift Arrow replied at last.

Big Buffalo was true to his promise. And so it came about that Swift Arrow was one of a happy group of Indian boys and girls from different sections of the West who enrolled at the mission school in the fall. He lived in the Boys' Cottage—a wonderful home to him—and helped feed the pigs, dig potatoes and harvest the crops for the school. In the springtime the boys had great fun working together in the garden and raising delicious vegetables different from any Swift Arrow had tasted before.

Swift Arrow was eager to learn all the strange new lessons the teachers and books taught him, for some day when he is grown up, Swift Arrow means to be a Christian doctor, and help cure other Indian children as the pale face did Red Bead.—Selected.

SLEEP SONG.

Two little beds, and the sun goes down,
Pulling the darkness over the town.
Two little beds, all soft and white,
And one little moon that sails the night.

One little moon and two little beds
For two little sleepy, sleepy heads,
One little bird, head under its wing,
Fast asleep where the branches swing.

One little bird and two little heads
Pillowed deep down in two white beds.
One little song, "tick-tock, tick-tock",
Sung by a sleepy, sleepy clock.

One little clock with one little song,
"Nick-nock, nick-nock", the whole night long.
One little song, and deep in their beds
Two little, dear little, sleeping heads.

GWATHMEY: "Entered into the joy of Paradise on Wednesday in Holy Week, 1928, MARY L. TAYLOE GWATHMEY, widow of the late William Watts Gwathmey, of Norfolk, Virginia. Born at Cloverdale, Botetourt County, Virginia, September 16, 1836, she was in her ninety-second year. Admired and loved through her long life of sunshine and shadow, her family and friends can only think of her in terms of gratitude to God."

WILLIAM LLOYD HUNT.

Departed this life on Good Friday, April 6, 1928, at 3:30 A. M., WILLIAM LLOYD HUNT, in the 48th year of his age. Born in Cincinnati, O., the youngest child of the late William Lewis Hunt and Eleanora Gano Hunt, of Cincinnati, he attended the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University and in his 30th year he married Laura Lenoir Gwynn, of Asheville, N. C., who, with a daughter, Eleanora Gwyn Hunt, survives.

Their only son, William Lloyd, Jr., was called back to his Heavenly home in his second year. A brother, Frederick Gano Hunt, of Washington, D. C., also survives.

William Lloyd Hunt was ill for four days with pleurisy and pneumonia, his heart failing in spite of the best medical efforts of three specialists. He had no disease but had never been strong and being talented, ambitious and manly in spirit he usually over-exerted his physical body, always finding the "limitations of the flesh" a heart-breaking handicap, though he strove manfully to reconcile himself to God's will and to "do his duty in that state of life into which it had pleased God to call him". Unassuming and modest, he underrated himself, and his sensitive and artistic nature was best appreciated by those who knew him best. His ideals were of the highest, his sympathies generous and quick to recognize true worth in others, his tastes were conservative and refined and he had an innate aversion to false display or insincerity in any form. He lived a clean, courageous life himself and left the world better for his influence and example; giving, up to the last, loving sympathy and material aid to all with whom he came in contact.

Best of all, and embracing all, he was an earnest, professing Christian and Churchman, giving gladly of his time, strength and money to further Christ's Kingdom on earth and to the Church's work.

He enjoyed both the morning and evening services of his church, Trinity, Asheville, N. C., on Palm Sunday, and on Wednesday of Holy Week he said to his wife and daughter (between gasps of pain): "Oh, I appreciate more than ever before what Christ's sufferings on the cross for us must have been—and—I may be with Him this Easter!"

And so we know that "as in Adam all die, yet in Christ shall all be made alive".

The Rev. James H. W. Blake Dies.

The Rev. James H. W. Blake, twenty-two years rector of Christ Church, Georgetown, entered into life eternal on Friday morning, April 27, after a short acute illness, but a long period of failing health. The eleven o'clock service at Christ Church on the Sunday following was given over to a spirit of meditation, when the music, lessons, prayers, etc., fitted well into the thoughts and moods of those present. The sermon, preached by the rector, the Rev. E. Pinkney Wroth, was developed from the text, "As a servant of the Lord", and had for its keynote the faithfulness in service of him who had served the parish so long and well.

Funeral services, held in the church, on April 30, were conducted by the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop of Washington, who was assisted by the Rev. E. Pinkney Wroth, the Rev. Richard Trapnell of Wilmington, Del., and the Rev. Henry F. Kloman of Cumberland, Md. Besides these, a large number of diocesan clergy were present in the processional and in the chancel.

At ten o'clock in the morning the remains of Mr. Blake had been placed in the chancel which he had occupied so many times before, and remained there, until the hour of the funeral. The Easter theme was brought out in quiet organ playing, which constituted all the music of the service.

Mr. Blake was born in Annapolis, Md., in 1853. His earlier education was received in Maryland, and later he received his Bachelor's and Master's degress at Dickinson College, Carlilse, Pa. He was ordained to the diaconate in St. Mark's Church, Frederick County, Md. in 1879, by Bishop Pinkney, and was advanced to the priesthood in 1880 by Bishop Peterkin in Charleston, W. Va. After serving in several parishes in Maryland and West Virginia, he went to Lafayette, Ind., Tiffin, Ohio, and Akron, Ohio, from which city he was called to Christ Church, Georgetown, in 1903. Here he served until 1925, when ill health made it necessary for him to retire from active service. At this time the vestry of Christ Church made him rector-emeritus of the parish, thus holding on to him as an integral part of the life of the church. He is survived by his wife, two daughters, Mrs. Duncan Bradley and Miss Frances Blake, and a son, Mr. Vinton Blake, of Akron, Ohio.

The strife is o'er, the battle done,
The victory of life is won,
The song of triumph has begun.
Alleluia.

Personal Notes

The Rev. William H. Anthony, Ph. D., first assistant at Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., who recently received, during the same week, two calls, one to a Pittsburgh rectorship, and the other to St. Peter's Church, Phoenixville, Pa. (Philadelphia), has accepted the latter, and will begin his rectorship on May 1. He has served most efficiently as President of the Pittsburgh Clericus, and as one of the Examining Chaplains. He has further made a profound impression throughout the diocese as an effective and able preacher, and in all his messages ever radiating the missionary spirit.

At the recent meeting of the National Council it was announced that Bishop McKim had been asked to take charge of the Tokyo Diocese until the election of a new bishop.

The Rev. R. Bland Mitchell, who recently resigned as Executive Secretary of the Field Department of the National Council, ceases active service with the National Council on May 1. However, his address until further notice continues to be, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

The Rev. John Forbes Mitchell, Canon of Aberdeen Cathedral, Scotland, and rector of the Church of the Holy Spirit, Bensonhurst, Brooklyn, has resigned the latter position, having officiated for the last time there on Easter Day. Canon Mitchell will devote himself entirely to his work as National Secretary of the Bishop Seabury Memorial.

The Rev. Francis B. Cannon is in temporary charge of Christ Church, Lykens, Pa., and St. Bartholomew's, Millersburg, Pa.

The Rev. Jeffrey Jennings, Ph. D., Vicar of Christ Chapel, Brooklyn, will become rector of the Church of the Atonement, Brooklyn, on May 1, succeeding the Rev. Harry T. Morrell, who has just removed to Christ Church, Sag Harbor.

The Rev. Elwood L. Haines, formerly rector of Trinity Church, Bethlehem, Pa., began his duties as Executive Secretary of the Diocese of North Carolina on April 15. His address is 1130 E. Fourth St., Charlotte, N. C.

The Rev. Newton Middleton, formerly rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Norfolk, Va., has accepted a call to St. John's Parish, Jacksonville, Fla., with address, St. John's Place, Jacksonville, Fla. The change is to be effective June 1.

The Rev. Mr. D. P. Griffiths, of Jermyn, Pa., who has been ill for a long while, has resigned the missions of St. James, Peckville, St. Annes, Winton and St. Paul's, Jermyn, to take effect the first of June. His people regret very much that this step was necessary, but having reached the pension age, he felt that was a wise thing to do.

The Rev. John Oliphant, retired, of Orbisonia, has had a serious relapse and is in the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia, Pa.

ORDINATIONS.

On Friday, April 27, 1928, in Christ Church, Chattanooga, the Rt. Rev. Jas. M. Maxon, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Tennessee, ordained to the diaconate Alfonso Constantine Adamz, formerly a Congregational minister. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Arthur G. Wilson, rector of Christ Church, who also preached the sermon. The Rev. James R. Sharp, chaplain to the Bishop, was the celebrant of the solemn aucharist, and the Rev. Roger B. T. Anderson, O. H. C., was subdeacon. The Call to the Ministry was read by the Rev. Henry C. Salmond, and the Litany by the Rev. Edward W. Mellichampe. The Rev. Mr. Adamz will be in charge of the missions at Tracy City and Coalmont, which he has been serving as lay reader, while continuing his studies for the priesthood in the Theological School of the University of the South.

TO THE LAITY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

There is in circulation among the laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church a petition, prepared by one of our Bishops, to the General Convention which will assemble in Washington next October, asking that body to refuse its assent to the proposal to eliminate the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion from the Book of Common Prayer, which would mean their abrogation.

"WHEREAS, the last General Convention adopted tentatively a resolution to revise the Book of Common Prayer by omitting the publication in connection therewith of the Articles of Religion; and

"WHEREAS, there is no provision for publishing elsewhere or for recognizing in any other way the Articles of Religion except in connection with the Book of Common Prayer; and

"WHEREAS, the Constitution of this Church has ever since 1801 recognized in this way the Articles of Religion; and

"WHEREAS, the Articles of Religion define the Church and state clearly the historic doctrinal differences between the Anglican Communion and the Roman Catholic Church;

"THEREFORE, we the undersigned adult communicants of the Protestant Episcopal Church do most earnestly memorialize our Right Reverend Fathers-in-God, our Reverend Clerical Deputies and Honorable Lay Deputies, in General Convention assembled in their respective Houses, to vote against the resolution to omit the Articles of Religion from publication in connection with the Book of Common Prayer and to vote against any proposed amendment to the Constitution that would omit reference to the Articles of Religion.

"AND we do further memorialize our Fathers-in-God, the Bishops, to send us a message of assurance that the name, the doctrine, the ceremonies and nomenclature of our Church and her missionary purpose and her fraternal love for all Christian people are and should be as expressed in the Book of Common Prayer.

"So we believe you will bring comfort and peace to the hearts of many, give confidence to those within our Communion and make clear to all men the true Catholic nature and Protestant heritage of our dear Church and revive zeal for the salvation of souls through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen."

We believe that a great majority of the communicants of the Church are opposed to the elimination of these Articles of Religion, established by the Church in 1801, and are likewise opposed to the introduction into the Church of the Mass, Reservation and Adoration of the Sacrament Prayers to the Virgin Mary, Invocation of Saints, Worship of Images and Relics, Auricular Confession, Penance, use of the Rosary, Holy Water and other doctrines and ceremonies peculiar to the Church of Rome.

We therefore heartily endorse this petition and express the hope that all Protestant Episcopalians will signify their approval of it by their signatures and by aiding in the widest possible circulation of it.

Copies of this petition may be procured without cost from Latsch & Arnold, 97 N. Second Street, Memphis, Tenn.

WHETHER the Incas, a race of Peruvian Indians, stood at the beginning of civilization or whether, as some believe, they represent a culture as old as that of Egypt and more advanced than that of their Spanish conquerors, is still disputed. But, they certainly left some remarkable monuments which tell of a strong and highly gifted race.

All that is left of the Monuments and Architecture of the Incas is the granite.

It is well for us to learn this lesson, a fact that is proven by the history of all races—Granite Monuments last longer than any other. Scientific tests prove that granites vary in the quality of durability and show

WHEN HE CAME TO HIMSELF

The work of a brilliant scholar and story-teller. It gives a thousand graphic pictures of Palestine with its crowded roads and incredibly dense population; of Tiberius and Rome; of Herod and Herodias; of John the Baptist and Jesus; of what Jesus said upon divorce; of the Nazarites and of the Twelve.

The vividness of the style transports the reader as a living person into the greatest period of Christian history. A book which will raise a great controversy and be the most talked of religious novel in years!

ONLY a daring and adventurous spirit could have conceived this novel. And it could have been achieved only by much learning (carried as a joy and not a burden), by great insight into the hearts of men and women, and by a visual power strong enough to make the people and places of the first Christian century spring into life and color and three-dimensional reality.

The nature of this boldness is apparent when the cast of characters is considered: Jesus Himself, the Twelve, John the Baptist, Bar Abbas, Pilate and his wife, Herod, Herodias and Salome, Tiberius, Sejanus and others whose familiar names are a challenge to the imagination. To these are added the created figures in the personal drama of Bar Ad the Prodigal and his love for Karis — slave girls, gladiators, robbers, sailors, Jewish bankers, Roman patricians, Nazarites, soldiers, great ladies of the modish world.

A thousand vivid pictures are conjured up—of Palestine; of the fortress-palace of Herod; of Jerusalem, the streets through which Jesus walked to Olivet, the Temple and the Woman's Court; of Rome with its weltering poverty, ignorance and immorality; of Capri, Tyre and Cæsarea. The climaxes sweep from Roman arenas to the Cross of Golgotha and its amazing aftermath.

MOTHERS

To-morrow, May 13th, will be "Mother's Day" in the United States. Hundreds of thousands of Americans of all ages will wear on their breasts flowers, outward and appropriate symbols of the sweetest, purest, tenderest emotions and affections that stir the human heart and lift thought and memory away from and above the drab and sordid and commonplace. It is right and very beautiful that the sons and daughters dedicate a special day for feeling and thinking as the vast majority of them should and will, but the day should bring also to the mothers of children yet at the formative ages serious and honest self-examination and introspection.

A little Catholic magazine published recently a story, evidently true, written by a priest and telling of a family he calls Murphy. The father was an humble employee of a great corporation and earned a hundred dollars a month; the mother a devoutly pious, handsome, laughing Irish girl, their small daughter being trained to strict allegiance to the doctrine and faith of their church. Prosperity came. The diligence, fidelity and ability of the man won for him gradual advancement and presently high place and munificent income. They moved to a fashionable neighborhood and away from religion and habits of piety and their plain and honest standards and modest ambitions. The mother became absorbed adapting herself to her new life, sent the daughter to be finished at famous finishing schools and colleges and contrived to marry her to a vicious young rake of a leading local family. At twenty-four the daughter was a wreck, abandoned by her dissolute husband, love gone, hope gone, life shattered, begging the priest to help her back to the trust in God and Christ and their pity and mercy for the beaten and disconsolate she had known as a child and from which her mother had torn her.

One of the wisest and most essential sentences of the litany, and to be most devoutly and fervently said, is: "In all times of our tribulation, in all times of prosperity, in the hour of death and in the day of judgment, Good Lord deliver us."

In the hour of death and the day of judgment we must account for our use of tribulation and prosperity alike.

The priest's story is old, sadly familiar to rectors and preachers of all denominations. It is old as history. More than four thousand years ago, according to Deuteronomy, Jeshurun, lifted from the desert and destitution to abundance and dainty food and drink, waxed fat and kicked, forgot the God who made him and the Rock of his Salvation. "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall," Solomon tells us. The profound philosophy of the Book of Job is illustrated constantly in ordinary human experience. We see souls come purified from the deep waters of affliction, the dross consumed and the gold refined by fiery trials, beautiful manhood and womanhood grow from poverty and obscurity, lovely and noble character formed by tribulation; promising youth, fine natural equipment, stunted, warped, horribly degraded and wasted by success and prosperity. Most of us who have lived to middle age can recall mournful instances of ruin by early and easy triumphs and misdirected, ignoble ambitions. The follies, vices, pitiful miseries and downfalls of pampered children of the very rich are before us in the newspapers daily. "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth," says Jeremiah.

The life of any one of us may be a universe of purposes, potentialities, consequences, its mysteries, workings and results known only to the Creator and Director of all. The woman who gives a child to the world and who uses her power as mother to guide the child toward good or evil, usefulness or absurd vanities, may be making blessing or woe for multitudes in ages to come. We can not know how far the influence of word or deed of any person may go. When the mother of Columbus gave him birth she had no dream that she was beginning the discovery of a new world and the creation of many nations.

Tribulations, misfortunes, adversities, of now may be the first steps toward event or development to come generations hence. We may not know. Imagination halts, bewildered and baffled, in effort to foresee the future of our race, or any part of it. The one thing we can do toward directing that is to use all the wisdom, courage and Guidance God will grant us to keep the twig upright, trusting to Infinite Mercy to let the tree grow so, to train up the child in the way he should go, hoping humbly that he may not depart from it. And it is in the time of prosperity that the responsibility is heaviest, the need for self-watchfulness, rigid self-government, to shun the disasters like those of which the old priest's story tells is most urgent.

Hundreds of thousands of decent men and women will be cherishing to-morrow tender, grateful, reverent memories and thoughts of mothers, living or dead. For some it will bring sad and bitter reproach, let us hope never to be spoken, for the fearful and irrevocable mistakes and neglects of mothers, callous to the responsibility given them, for false standards inculcated, forgetfulness of God, disregard of the large and real things and duties and work, waste of powers and labor on fripperies and trivialities. May the number of such unhappy victims lessen each year.

Visual Education

THERE is a subtle something about a church that either leads newcomers and visitors into regular attendance, or drives them away. One cannot help getting an impression of coldness and inactivity in some churches and Sunday schools, while others seem to brim over with warmth and enthusiasm and activity in the greatest work of all—the Lord's work. While a church's atmosphere does not wholly depend upon its equipment, yet carefully chosen accessories do make a large contribution to the air of welcome and comfort. In a well-equipped church you are usually invited by the far-reaching notes of a set of silver-voiced chimes or clear-noted bells. As you enter, an organ leads you into an attitude of quiet and reverence. Comfortable pews, attractive pulpit or altar arrangements, pleasing hymnals, and dignified communion ware all produce a feeling that indeed this is the house of the Lord.

The atmosphere of the Sunday school is necessarily different. Eagerness to learn of the marvels and the promises of the Bible may be legitimately stimulated in classes of all ages by vivid presentation. Schools that make regular use of visual education equipment know just how much greater interest is gained and how much deeper is the impression made by the use of appropriate pictures. The stereopticon is of course the most generally used apparatus, with an almost endless variety of pictures available (every photograph and illustration in books, magazines, and the like, can now be used); and a number of churches have added to the stereopticon a motion picture machine, for which suitable libraries of films are developing.

The use of visual projecting equipment is a great help to week-night meetings, and the announcement of its use in church and Sunday-school suggests a live and progressive church. The talks of returning missionaries are greatly enlivened if their pictures can be shown, and the spiritual life of many a person is made richer by a full appreciation of the trials and opportunities of service in the mission fields.

The purchase of a stereopticon, if you do not already possess one, would add much to the efficiency of your church or school. If you have any questions or problems concerning the buying of church equipment that is not offered in the adjacent columns, full information will be promptly furnished if you will write to Church Equipment Service, The Southern Churchman, 628 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

Be Friends With Your Children.

"I can not understand why Jim is slipping away from me," said Cornelia in one of her moods of seeing things as they are, not as she would have them.

"His friends I hardly know! And my own son—well I know the real Jim—less. All my life, I've been making friends, thinking of him, hoping that the sons and daughters of my friends would be his companions, but now there isn't a boy in his crowd whose parents I know. The other day I remarked on all this to Jim.

" 'But, Mums,' he protested, 'I know every mother of the bunch. They're all fine! They're all pals with us.' "

" 'All pals with us!' " cut in the always-wise and understanding Aunt Emmy-Lou. "There you have it, Cornelia. You have not lived with Jim. You've lived above him."

"Perhaps," admitted Cornelia, wistfully. "I have been so interested in making him a thorough-bred, an intellectual, maybe I've forgotten the human side of my boy. I had not thought of that before. Just the other day he said to me, 'Jim's mother is back. He tells her everything. Mums—things that I expect would shock you.' And I replied, 'I can't see why a clean young fellow need have anything shocking to tell!' And he just walked out of the room with 'Oh, Mums, you don't get me'. I see now that he only meant silly foolish things that boys like to tell to some one."

"My dear," Aunt Emmy-Lou replied, "if you're going to be easily shocked you'll never hear anything. Don't you know that boys and girls during the adolescent age may be frightened away from their parents by an oversensitiveness, a fear of being criticized?"

"Yes, Aunt Emmy-Lou, you're right. And why should I criticize Jim's friends so long as they're manly boys? I guess—well, what I need to do is to be friends myself with Jim—to walk, talk and play with him. I guess I have been living above him. Why—"

But just then a voice called down the stairs, "I'm going to the basket-ball game tonight, Mother".

"That's fine, Jimmy. I think I'll go too."

There was a surprised silence and then, "Oh, gee, Mums, that's great. Ned's mother is a regular fan. She never misses a game".

Tears filled Cornelia's eyes and she smiled with a great joy lighting up her face, as she nodded. "The beginning of a new relationship between us. I'm so happy to have discovered the trouble before it was too late."—Helen Gregg Green, in National Kindergarten Association Publication.

YOUR MOSES.

Anna Hamilton Wood.

Why seek your Moses on a distant hill
To guide uncertain currents of your will,
Or mould the pattern of your life? Can space
Make any holier a holy place?
Ah, closer than the human flesh to bone
The heart of man clings always to its own;
And he who fights beside you knows the pain
Of loss, the bitterness that hides in gain.

The big dreams die because the dreamer gives
Too much of self; only the shadow lives
To mark the path humanity must climb
Across the valleys and the hills of time.
Then seek your Moses where the rushes grow—
He at your level best can see, and know!

There may be times when silence is gold, and speech is silver; but there are times also, when silence is death, and speech is life—the very life of Pentecost.—Max Muller.

THE DEAR OLD SONGS.

Martha Shepard Lippincott.

Oh, sing to me the dear old songs,
As mother used to sing,
The ones that ever to the heart,
Sweet memories, will bring:
The songs of love and happy homes,
Where joy was always found.
I long to dream of peaceful scenes,
Where love will e'er abound.

Dear mother's voice, I fain would hear,
In memory again,
As oft I've heard in childhood days:
How sweet it sounded then.
Oh, sing to me the dear old songs
My mother used to love,
Before the Father called her home,
To heavenly realms above.

The soul responds to songs like those,
And we again rejoice
As memory once more recalls
The sound of mother's voice,
In songs intended to uplift
The soul to love the right;
And shed around, in human hearts,
The Heavenly Father's light.

The Spirit of Easter.

Easter is the promise of the Lord that all the best and noblest in man shall be renewed, even as growth and bloom and ripening shall not cease.

Belief in eternal life compels us to believe in good deeds and honest thought. The good man toils not for today, nor for tomorrow alone, but because he knows that his labor shall survive long after his hand has fallen from the plough. The good man pours himself into the world and makes it new. He is among the blessed who win sight out of blindness, order out of chaos, and life out of death.

Since the first Easter morning the soul of man has shone with unwasting light; for then he looked into the radiant face of the risen Christ and knew that God's universe shapes itself not to destruction but to a yet more glorious genesis; yea, it endureth from everlasting to everlasting.—Helen Keller.

IT'S HARD TO BE A CARPENTER.

I wonder what He charged for chairs
At Nazareth.
And did men try to beat Him down,
And boast about it in the town,
I bought it cheap for half a crown
From that mad Carpenter?

And did they promise and not pay,
Put it off to another day,
Or did they break His heart that way,
My Lord the Carpenter?

I wonder did He have bad debts,
And did He know my fears and frets,
The Gospel writer here forgets
To tell about the Carpenter.

But that's just what I want to know.
Ah! Christ in glory, here below
Men cheat and lie to another so
It's hard to be a carpenter.
—G. A. Studdert-Kennedy.

A young man once wrote Phillips Brooks asking the secret of his power. The great preacher replied: "You ask me for the secret of my life; if I have any secret, it is my constantly growing relation to Christ. I can not tell you how personal this grows to me. He is here, He knows me and I know Him. It is no figure of speech. It is the realest thing in the world."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

John Wesley wrote over his college door, "Unite the pair so long divided, Knowledge and vital piety".

The life that feeds on excitement is administering to the soul a drug that enslaves.—Rev. Dr. Wm. Porkess.

"A solemn murmur in the soul
Speaks of a world to be
As travelers hear the billows roll
Before they reach the sea."

"There are two things even more incompatible than oil and water, and these two things are trust and worry."

Gather you, gather you, angels of God—
Freedom and Mercy and Truth;
Come: for the earth is grown coward and old;
Come down and renew us her youth.
Wisdom, Self-sacrifice, Daring and Love,
Haste to the battlefield, stoop from above,
To the day of the Lord is at hand.
—C. Kingsley.

"No matter how hurried you may be, no time is wasted in thanksgiving."

Rivers to the ocean run,
Nor stay in all their course;
Fire ascending seeks the sun—
Both speed them to their source:
So a soul that's born of God
Pants to view His glorious face;
Upward tends to His abode,
To rest in His embrace.—Ex.

A little boy who was told by his mother that it was God who makes people good, "Yes, I know it is God, but mothers help a lot".—S. R. Grabill.

All of us exercise unconscious ministries. When we never dream we are affecting anybody we are touching and turning others all the time. We fret, and others feel our fretting, though never a syllable has passed our lips. We play the game, and just because we play it, folk we have never heard of play it better. We sing at midnight because God is with us, and prisoners in other cells are cheered.—G H. Morrison.

TO MY MOTHER.

Eugenia Bragg Smith.

I gaze upon your face so fair,
Your tender eye and lovely hair,
My thoughts go back to childhood days,
When you guided my feet, my ways,
Yes, you, my mother.

I look upon your mouth so sweet,
Where firmness and forgiveness meet,
Where strength and gentleness entwined
Makes each complete yet all combined
In you, my mother.

I think and dream of your dear voice,
That made my childish heart rejoice,
That even now like some sweet strain,
Echoes again through heart and brain,
Your voice, my mother.

But best of all your life so true,
That leads me on until I too
Shall rest with you in realms above,
Where all is joy and peace and love
With you, my mother.

The Story Quilt.

Cora was sick, at her grandmother's house. Not very sick, but she had to stay in bed a day or two. The time seemed long.

"I can't stay with you many days, grandma," she sighed, "and there were so many lovely things I planned to do! Go down to the brook where mamma went wading when she was a little girl, ride up from the meadow on a load of hay, pick raspberries by the stone wall in the pasture—oh, dear, dear!"

Grandma smiled at the little girl.

"You like stories, don't you?" she asked.

"Oh, yes!" said Cora, her eyes brightening, "and mamma says you used to tell the nicest ones to her and Aunt Katie!"

Grandma turned back to the bedspread.

Underneath was a bed quilt made from many small bits of cloth, in what grandma said was "log-cabin style".

"This quilt is a real story book," she said.

Cora looked puzzled.

"I don't quite know what you mean!" she said.

"Well, look at this piece of pink cloth, with fine white stripes. Your mamma had a dress of that to wear at a Sabbath school picnic when she was about your age. See—"

"Oh!" interrupted Cora, "she fell into the river, and the minister brought her home, all wet, in his nice top buggy. She's told me about that."

"Yes, that very picnic! This dark blue print, with red dots, was left from a big apron she wore when she washed dishes."

"Didn't she hate it—washing dishes, I mean?"

"Perhaps she didn't enjoy it, but she was very good about helping."

"That bright yellow piece is pretty; what's the story about that?"

"That was a bit of some cloth your mamma bought out of her birthday money, to make a dress for the cat."

"The cat!" Cora was sitting straight up in bed. "You don't mean the cat, grandma?"

"Yes. She liked to play with a dressed-up cat better than with a doll, because it was alive."

"How funny! What was this white piece, with little blue rings spattered over it?"

"That was your Aunt Katie's best dress one summer—a fine cambric, made with ruffles, trimmed with yards and yards of narrow lace. There's a story about that, too—why, Katie had to have another 'best' dress before the summer was over."

"Tell it, please."

"I have to do some housework now. I'll tell the story later. Pick out the pieces that look most interesting and I'll tell the stories when I can sit down. Perhaps you'll be sorry you were not sick longer, so you could hear more of the quilt stories."

THE DAWN OF CHINA'S NEW DAY

Stamping Out Communism—Church Membership Doubled Amid Persecution—Back to the Old Faith—Winning Souls With New Testaments.

A NEW day is dawning in China; and many signs indicate that it will be an era of unparalleled spiritual progress.

One of the most roseate rays of the approaching day is the change of attitude with regard to Communism. A year ago bolshevism was sweeping over China like a prairie fire. Today both civil and military leaders are doing their utmost to stamp it out. The outbreaks in Canton and elsewhere simply show that it is more difficult to quench a conflagration, than it is to kindle the flame.

For months the prayers of God's children in many lands have been focussed upon China, and the present war against Bolshevism by the military leaders, constitutes one of the most remarkable answers to prayer in modern times. Now let us pray that those in authority may realize that the Lord Jesus Christ and the Word of God are the only hope of China.

Another encouraging sign of the new era lies in the fact that the seeming menace of fiery persecution has racked but not wrecked the Church in China. It has purged and purified the true and faithful followers of Christ, and has prepared the way for a great outpouring of the Spirit of God. In some cases the churches have grown and increased even while passing through the fiery furnace of persecution. Mr. K. Wiesinger, a China Inland Missionary from Hunan, writes:

"We had to go through a very fierce persecution. Our mission compound was attacked by a Bolshevick anti-foreign and anti-Christian mob of about 3,000 for more than three hours, but our dear Master did not deliver us into their hands. He saved us in a wonderful way.

"At one of our out-stations the persecution was especially fierce. The evangelist was paraded through the streets, beaten, and imprisoned. The chapel was badly damaged and sealed. Bibles, hymn books, and tracts were taken out and publicly burned. But praise the Lord, the Devil could not destroy the faith in their hearts.

"When I was there a few days ago we had crowded meetings. The people stood inside and outside the chapel and on the street. Amongst them were many of the former persecutors. They listened, and not a few accepted Jesus Christ as their Saviour. We have conditions like this throughout the whole district.

"Two years ago I requested two hundred and fifty Pocket Testaments. But, praise the Lord, since then things have changed. During the past year the membership of the church in Sinning has been doubled. We should have at least 1,500 Testaments. We have the men to carry and to read them. We are greatly longing for the life-giving Books."

Another indication of the new order of things lies in the desire of the Christians for ecclesiastical independence. But this is the very goal for which the missionaries have been longing and praying for decades past. One Missionary Society has splendidly grasped the new situation. They are turning their churches entirely over to the Chinese; while the missionaries, accompanied by about one hundred evangelists, will do pioneer work in preaching the gospel in unreached towns and villages.

Still another augury of the new day is seen in the widespread dissatisfaction with intellectual sermons and social service; and a turning back to the simple preaching of the Cross as the only thing that will satisfy the soul, and lead sinners into the Light. A group of Chinese pastors and evangelists have returned to Shanghai after a tour of several weeks in South China. The report of the leader of the party, Mr. C. K. Lee, is as stimulating as an ocean breeze. He tells how both pastors and people are turning away from the husks of subterfuge, and are hungry for the old gospel. Mr. Lee has a vision of sending flaming evangelists throughout the length and breadth of China to preach Christ and Him crucified.

From North China comes similar tidings of a turning back to the old paths. The Rev. T. Darlington, of the Milton Stewart Evangelistic Fund, tells of three pastors in one gathering that were about to give up their churches and go into secular work. But all three gained a new vision of Christ, and have gone back to preach the simple gospel in the power of the Spirit. Indeed from far and near in China come encouraging reports. They tell of open and receptive hearts following the recent turmoil. Here in Shanghai some weeks ago I witnessed the remarkable sight of nearly one hundred converts baptized at one time. They were part of the splendid harvest of souls being reaped by "Bethel" conducted by Dr. Mary Stone and Miss Jenny V. Hughes, and by the Oriental Missionary Society.

Another sign of the new era is the readiness of the people to hear the gospel message. One of the evangelists whom God has most largely used in China in recent years is Mr. Leland Wang. He was converted while serving in the Chinese Navy. Later he resigned from the Navy to devote his entire time to preaching Christ. He is saturated with the Word of God. He reads thirteen chapters daily. Recently in Hongkong the largest theatre in the city, was crowded out, with hundreds standing, to hear him preach the old gospel of salvation through the blood of Christ. Mr. Wang and his associates have used thousands of the pocket Testaments. Recently he sent in a request for 2,000 more copies for use in evangelistic meetings in Foochow, his home city.

Yet another hopeful sign is the spiritual quickening that is coming to some of the mission schools in China. The Rev. Marcus Cheng, who was formerly Chaplain General of Marshall Feng's Army, has been conducting meetings in schools in and near Shanghai with encouraging results, both in attendance and in the interest manifested. In one or more schools daily prayer meetings have been started by the students themselves.

Another auspicious event is the bold testimony for Christ given by General Chang Chih Chang in high governmental and other circles. General Chang is Marshal Feng's representative in the Nanking Government. He unflinchingly proclaims the gospel to high and low and rich and poor. In an address to Shanghai bankers a few months ago, he told them that Christianity and the Christians are the hope of China. General Chang loves the Word of God so much that he has purchased thousands of Bibles and Testaments for distribution.

Another harbinger of the new day that is dawning in China is the success which is attending the nation-wide distribution of New Testaments in connection with the Million Testaments for China Campaign. In spite of civil war, and lack of transportation facilities, and anti-Christian propaganda, and the absence of so many missionaries, the work of circulating the Testaments has gone steadily forward. Thus far over 600,000 of the life-giving Books have been sent to missionaries, pastors, and other workers for wise and careful distribution. This great victory has been wrought by a great volume of believing prayer on the part of God's children in many lands.

From far and near come tidings of the glorious blessing that is following the presentation of the Testaments. Mr. Hermann Becker, of Hunan Province, previously requested 8,000 Testaments for his large district of a million and half population. Now he desires 25,000 copies. He writes:

"The first 1,000 Testaments have been given away in this city. The blessing received far exceeds our expectations. The Christians are more than ever reading their Bibles. Our meetings are full of souls who are wanting to learn more about Christ. Many have decided for Christ, and have given their names as inquirers. When we have received more Testaments, we will start at our eleven outstations.

"When the soldiers had to retreat they forced the people to carry their goods. One of the Christians was taken. He said: 'I am a Christian.' The soldiers said: 'How can you prove it?' He took his small Testament out of his pocket, and the soldiers let him go."

Mr. Wang, a Chinese worker, received such blessing from giving the Word to others that he has decided to distribute Testaments as long as he lives. He writes: "There were many military officers billeted in our church. I took the opportunity to preach to them, and to give them Pocket Testaments. They were very glad to receive them. Some of them were converted. I have myself determined to be a preacher, and to distribute Pocket Testaments throughout my life time."

Another Chinese worker, Mr. Yien, tells of the remarkable results that came from giving copies of the Testament to those who were opposed to Christianity. He says: "I received twenty copies of the Pocket Testament, and distributed them to twenty men who were anti-Christian. We followed up the work, and now I can tell you that fourteen of these have been converted, and have become Christians."

One of the most enthusiastic of all the hundreds of Chinese pastors and workers who have helped in the distribution of the Testaments is Mr. T. H. Lin, one of the staff of the American Bible Society. During a recent visit to Central China he sent urgent requests for 4,000 of the Pocket Testaments. He wrote:

"Everything is quiet, so that many missionaries have already gone back to their old positions. Pocket Testaments are in great demand. Many people are waiting and longing for the Word. Revival fires are being kindled in many places."

One of the most outstanding features of the Million Testaments' Campaign has been its timeliness. The Rev. Edward H. Smith, of Foochow, writes:

"The case of five hundred Testaments is just at hand, and deeply appreciated. I am sharing them with the entire Mission. We shall seek to use them for the glory of God. Nothing could be more opportune than this entire campaign. God will bless it. Only eternity can measure the spiritual results of this huge seed-sowing. We cease not to pray God for your work."

In Shanghai, a few weeks ago, a wire was received stating that Marshall Feng welcomed back Mr. and Mrs. Sallee and their party of missionaries to the Province of Honan. They set off at once, and arrived safely in Kaifeng, the capital. Mr. Sallee now reports that thus far he can discover no trace of anti-foreign feeling; and that the authorities are entirely friendly.

He found their school compound occupied by about a thousand wounded soldiers. They began preaching to them twice daily. On the second Sunday memorable scenes were witnessed. The church, which seats about six hundred, was packed to the doors. They filled the aisles, the pulpit platform, and the window sills. They drank in the gospel message. At the close of the service so few left that a second sermon was delivered. Then the men were requested to go, and the building was filled again with women.

Mr. Sallee finds a great eagerness for the Word of God. He says: "Many of the Christians and missionaries are doing personal work in the ward and at the bed sides, and we have never in all our experience seen people so eager to hear the Gospel. They plead with the workers to stop and preach to them, and pray for them, and they beg for Bibles. Last night one man met Mrs. Sallee and Mrs. Tong in the yard and told them he was leaving right away for the front, and begged for a Bible. They tried to put him off, as they had none to give him, but he would not take no, so Mrs. Sallee came in the house and found one of ours and gave it to him."

Last night an express letter came from Mr. Sallee asking for a thousand copies of the Pocket Testament. Mr. Sallee writes: "It is important that they come at the earliest possible date, as men are being sent to the front weekly." The letter closes with an appeal for prayer.

In spite of all the missionary effort in China for decades past, many people believe that probably three hundred million people in this land have never yet clearly heard the gospel message. It has been laid upon the hearts of Mr. and Mrs. Alex. R. Saunders of the China Inland Mission that a great forward movement should be inaugurated to preach "the gospel to every creature in China". Mr. Saunders says:

"In apostolic days was it not in a time of great affliction that the spread of the gospel went forward? May not God's time for a great gospel forward movement in China have arrived? 'To every creature' is our Lord's command, and at least three hundred million in China have not yet heard. It may yet be possible for every creature in China to have at least one opportunity to hear the good news before our Lord comes. Shall it be given them? Already God is setting His seal upon the effort. Before we left America a friend told us he wished to see a movement of 'the gospel to every creature in China' carried out. He is prepared to finance a scheme to give the gospel to every creature in one county—why not in all the two thousand counties of China?"

Not the least of all the signs of the new day in China, is the manner in which the Holy Spirit is laying a burden of intercessory prayer for a great spiritual awakening upon the hearts of His children in many lands. Mr. Robert W. Porteous, a missionary to China, who knows the power of prayer to open the windows of heaven, says:

"The prospects for a mighty revival in China were never brighter. 'Behold I will do a new thing—now it shall spring forth.' God's work out here is just beginning. But we need more prevailing intercession. Pray that all China may be moved! Pray believingly!"

Shall we not continue to pray earnestly and fervently—if possible setting apart a special period for intercession daily—for the missionaries and pastors and Chinese Christians, for the spread of the Word of God, and for a mighty spiritual awakening, so that these roseate rays of the dawn may speedily be changed into the bright sunlight of a day of unparalleled spiritual progress?

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart" (Psalm 119:11).

This week the following verse was submitted by Miss I. E. Skinner, of Raleigh, N. C.:

"Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass" (Psalm 37:5).

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

STATEMENT.

There was published in our issue of April 21 a letter from the Rev. Mr. Walker Gwynne addressed to The Southern Churchman and marked "personal". This letter, through oversight in our office, was published in our paper against the wishes of the Rev. Mr. Gwynne, for which oversight we tender our apologies and regrets to Mr. Gwynne and to Mr. Shipler.

THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES

By the Right Reverend John Charles Ryle, D. D.

III.

ONE more point now remains to be considered, which is of so much importance that I dare not pass it by unnoticed. What the Articles are we have seen. What their position and authority is in the Church of England we have also seen. Ought we not now to see what are the great leading characteristics of the Articles? I think we ought, unless we mean to leave our subject unfinished. There are certain grand features in them, without descending into particulars, which stand out prominently, like mountains in a landscape. What those features are we ought to know. I shall therefore proceed to point them out to the reader, and try to impress them on his attention. If those who are induced to read them with attention, in consequence of this paper, are not struck with the singular distinctness and prominence of these leading features in the Articles, I shall be greatly mistaken. To my eyes they stand out in bold, clear, and sharply-cut relief. I ask the reader to give me his attention for a very few minutes, and I will show him what I mean.

(1) Let us mark, then, for one thing, as we read the Articles, the strong and decided language which they use in speaking of things which are essential to salvation.

Concerning the nature of God and the Holy Trinity, concerning the sufficiency and authority of Scripture, concerning the sinfulness and helplessness of natural man, concerning justification by faith alone, concerning the place and value of good works, concerning salvation only by the name of Christ; concerning all these grand foundations of the Christian religion, it is hard to conceive language more decided, clear, distinct, ringing, and trumpet-toned than that of the Thirty-Nine Articles. There is no doubtfulness, or hesitancy, or faltering, or timidity, or uncertainty, or compromise about their statements. There is no attempt to gratify undecided theologians by saying, "It is probably so", or, "Perhaps it may be so", or, "There are some grounds for thinking so"—and all that sort of language which is so pleasing to what are called "broad" Christians. Nothing of the kind! Of all the points I have named the Articles speak out boldly, roundly, frankly, and honestly, in a most unmistakable tone. "This is the Church of England's judgment," they seem to say; and "These are the views which every Churchman ought to hold."

I ask special attention to this point. We live in days when many loudly declare that it is not right to be positive about anything in religion. The clergyman who dares to say of any theological question, "This is true, and that is false—this is right, and that is wrong", is pretty sure to be denounced as a narrow-minded, illiberal, uncharitable man. Nothing delights many Churchmen so much as to proclaim that they "belong to no party"—that they are "moderate men", that they "hold" no "extreme views". Well! I only ask these Churchmen to settle matters with the Thirty-Nine Articles. I want no clergyman to go a bit beyond the authoritative statements of his own Church; but I do want every clergyman not to fall below them. And I shall always maintain, publicly or privately, that to call any one an "extreme" man, or a "party" man, because his doctrinal views are in harmony with the bold, decided statements of the Articles, is neither just, nor fair, nor reasonable, nor consistent with common sense. Give me the clergyman who, after reading the Articles to his congregation, and solemnly promising to abide by them, acts up to his promise, and speaks out boldly, decidedly, and unhesitatingly, like a man, about all the leading doctrines of Christianity. As for the clergyman who, after declaring his assent to the Articles, flinches from their doctrinal distinctness, and preaches hesitatingly, as if he hardly knew what he believed, I am sorry for him. He may be a charitable, a liberal, and a learned man, but he is not in the right place in the pulpit of the Church of England.

IS THIS IT?

By Lyman P. Powell

MOODY a generation ago gave to conversion a new reality, and it ill becomes a Churchman to depreciate a man from whom our own Prebendary Carlisle of the English Church Army got his inspiration. Not even Billy Sunday who added business efficiency to religious zeal can be disparaged; he has done good.

Now Dr. A. Earl Kernahan gives the touch of timeliness to Evangelistic methods by returning to the simple plan which Jesus followed when He sent the seventy out, two by two, to bring unbelievers to a knowledge of the Christ. During the month ending Palm Sunday, Dr. Kernahan and his staff, brought to New York by the Greater New York Federation of Churches, directed a house to house visitation made by men and women from one hundred and sixty-one churches, to pledge people to a new loyalty to Christ and to turn non-churchgoers into regular attendants on religious services. Those who "signed up" number 9,734—an amazing record.

But members are not final with real Churchmen. They dig beneath the figures. They see nothing spiritually final in adding to the lethargic a few more lethargic of whom a minister may have one day to say:

"They light me once,
They hurry by,
And never come again."

The St. Margaret's Committee of Twenty were prepared as carefully as possible during the weeks preceding, by rector and chairman. They averaged twenty every day through the week's special visiting. They reported every day and at the end, out of one hundred and twenty-eight visits, eighty-six visited had promised at least to take more notice hereafter of the Church. That was something. Checking up and calling on the eighty-six, I find one-fourth do not belong to us. They have been sent where they belong. Another fourth are difficult to classify because they are on the edge of Judaism, Romanism, and the Greek Church. One Jewish Father has since brought his five children to be baptized with him and has also joined the confirmation class. A Romanist has sent to us four men I might not otherwise have found. A Greek Catholic wants to be confirmed now that she knows what it is all about. At least half of those who "signed up" seem to be dependable as regular attendants and half of the half desire to be confirmed.

The biggest thing of all is the quickening of the parish spiritually. One who came a while ago to us has just decided to go back to her own field. She says: "St. Margaret's is too religious for me." Our Committee have a new joy only those can know who are used to impart a new life where before there seemed little life. Several families once broken up among different churches are finding in their concentration on St. Margaret's a new family solidarity. And I could name several men who are now taking out in their own name a title to Church attendance who once held it—re-enforced by Sunday paper and radio—in their wife's name. Such are some of the results no figures ever indicate.

For St. Margaret's Visitation Evangelism has proved a high adventure. The Committee steered clear of cant and sentimentalism. There was no indulgence in emotionalism and honest difference of opinion was carefully skirted. Even if now and then our visitors found people reluctant to talk about their inner feeling for the Christ, the visiting was mixed with so much consecrated common-sense that only once was Christ reported "an acquired taste", then, by an "old timer", who, perhaps, motors out on Sunday to the Country Club to worship the "God of Nature".

Our Committee got a thrill. One quaintly said: "I like this better than making cake for suppers. I feel that I am doing something worth-while." Several want to "go right on". We are, therefore, turning the temporary into the permanent by having the contiguous territory now surveyed by an expert. From the prospects he turns in, lists will be prepared for more leisurely visiting through the coming months; adding to St. Margaret's, as in the early Church, such as "are being saved".

Is this new plan workable in our Church? Yes. In this recent campaign our reservations were respected. The work together was on common ground, on which all Christians can work as in the Great War they had to work. The language of the literature used was scarcely Churchly. That, however, is a detail which can be—for Churchmen—changed another season. The larger plan is adaptable.

Apart from the spiritual values already flowing from the experience St. Margaret's has had, I now see, two specific benefits for all concerned:

1. Our Church is better understood. We make no sacrifice or concessions. In my meetings with various ministers, I found that "good wine needs no bush". Some have told me that they now understand better what the Sacramental idea is and why the Episcopal Church puts into its ministers' lives so much routine that our ministers have not the time some others have for "fellowshipping". One man said to me, "I now realize what Nanson meant in 'The Servant in the House', when he said, 'I have my work to do'."

2. We better understand others working for Christ in ways different from ours. There comes a redistribution of emphasis in such contacts. One can hold to the Historic Church with all its Apostolic Marks and yet re-stress conversion, the frequent re-quickening of the inner life, the getting and keeping right oneself with God before one can get and keep right with one's fellows. No man, minister or layman, can go through such an experience as we have had with Visitation Evangelism, and not get a new vision out of the all-inclusiveness of the Christ of Whom 'tis written:

"All things grow sweet in Him
All fierce extremes
That beat along Time's shore
Like childen waves grow wild
And creep to kiss His feet."

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES

Prepared by J. T. Bougher. Reading Terminal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

LESSON—No. 34.
TOPIC—Excuses.
(Read Luke 14:16-24.)

"He that winneth souls is wise" (Prov. 11:30. The highest privilege and most sacred duty of the "believer", is to make known the "Gospel Tidings" to others. The chief obstacle with which the soul-winner has to deal, is that of "excuses", and which appear to be the first thoughts of the unsaved. Generally, the excuse first given by those out of Christ, is not the real one and it is therefore important to tactfully ascertain the actual condition of the soul with whom we are dealing. The Word of the Lord has a remedy for every sin-sick soul, and for all who are in darkness, and as the reliable physician has certain remedies for stated diseases, so the Great Physician has provided an answer for every "excuse". We need therefore to speak "according to the word" (Isa. 8:20; Ps. 119:25, 41, 58, 65, etc.; Gal. 1:9).

The "excuses" to be encountered are many, and the Scriptural replies are abundant but for our present brief space we quote God's answer to the most common reasons advanced for rejecting the gift of God which is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord (Rom. 6:23).

| MAN'S EXCUSE. | GOD'S ANSWERS. |
|---|---|
| 1. "Always lived a good life." | 1. "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God."—Rom.3:13; John 3:58. |
| 2. "As good as some church members I know." | 2. "Every man shall give an account of himself to God."—Rom. 14:12. |
| 3. "Am doing the best I can." | 3. "He that believeth not is condemned already."—John 3:17-18. |
| 4. "Am not good enough just yet." | 4. "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."—1 Tim. 1:15. |
| 5. "Heart too hard"; "No inclination." | 5. "Today if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart."—Heb. 3:15; Ezek. 36:26. |
| 6. "Fear I could not hold out." | 6. "He is able to keep us."—2 Tim. 1:12. |
| 7. "Have tried and failed." | 7. "He that hath the Son hath life."—1 John 1:8-10; We may fail; Christ never. |
| 8. "Too great a sinner." | 8. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow."—Isa. 1:18. |
| 9. "Cannot give up the old life." | 9. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away."—2 Cor. 5:17. |
| 10. "Companions would ridicule." | 10. "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the council of the ungodly."—Psalm 1:1. |
| 11. "Not tonight." Procrastination. | 11. "Behold. . . . now is the day of salvation."—2 Cor. 6:2. |
| 12. "I don't believe the Bible." | 12. "Unto us which are saved it is the power of God."—1 Cor. 1:18; Rom. 1:16. |

Those who insist upon being "excused" now, will also be "excused" when ushered before the bar of unbiased justice", at the great and terrible day of the Lord"—for it is then we shall be without excuse.—Rom. 1:20.

THE SURRENDERED LIFE---IN CHRIST

Conducted by the Reverend Frank Cox

THE Cross of Christ, the world's stumbling-block was St. Paul's boast. Since that time the Cross has continued to be a mystery to the worldly wise. They cannot understand the necessity for self-denial. They may attempt what usually passes for self-denial, as when in Lent they will deny themselves some pleasure for the few weeks, but of the self-denial of which Christ speaks, the denial of self, they know nothing. Yet the cross was to make that very thing possible. Christ was crucified that we might have power in turn to crucify self and to rise to a new life. He came to destroy the works of the devil. Baptism is to represent to us that very truth. We are baptized unto the death of Christ. It means that when we take the baptismal vows upon ourselves we recognize the utter worthlessness of the old self life, and renounce anything connected with it. We no longer expect to profit by it, nor do we attempt to find any saving health in it. We do not expect to be justified by anything that we have done in the flesh.

The recognition of the worthlessness of the self life causes us to turn from it utterly, to surrender everything that we have into His hands. So in our baptismal covenant we promise to renounce world and flesh and devil utterly, everything upon which the self has fed, or longed for, we turn from it to follow God.

Our Lord's offering of Himself quickens that desire to renounce self. In Him we see the utter abandonment of selfish aim. Though He was rich, yet for our sakes

He became poor, He humbled Himself even to the death on the cross. He accepted a criminal's end that He might save us from ourselves.

When we see that offering we become ashamed of our self-seeking. We who deserve nothing often desire so much and He who possessed everything was willing to humble Himself so low. More than that we see that it was our sin that led Him to His cross. It was for the sin of the world that He suffered the shame. It was the world's selfishness that refused to accept Him. The revelation of the great love of God in Him brought out more darkly by contrast the unloveliness of the world. As we realize the contrast we discover that our selfishness is of a piece with that of the rest of the world and we hate that which could drive God's Son to the cross.

I hate the sin that made Thee mourn
And drove Thee from my breast.

In the cross we see clearly the amazing love of God disclosed. A love that sought the lost. A love that stooped from a throne to a manger, and that went through a criminal's death to rescue and to heal. And yet more, a love that used the very instrument raised against it, the cross, to save, for those men who were engaged in nailing the Son of God to the cross, were perfecting unwittingly and unwillingly the only hope of salvation for themselves. In reply to their threats and mockery and scorn, there was but one word, "Forgiveness". Was it any wonder that the hymn writer wrote:

When I survey the wondrous cross,
On which the Prince of Glory died,
My richest gain I count but loss,
And poor contempt on all my pride.

As the cross provides the motive for the renunciation of self, so it provides also the power. Our old man was crucified with Him that the body of sin might be destroyed that henceforth we should not serve sin. By faith we are to enter into the fruits of that victory. Continually we are to mortify all our evil and corrupt affections. Daily we are expected to die from sin. The old desires springing from our selfish nature are to be cleansed, and the new desires are to take their place.

It is no wonder that much of our preaching today is shallow, and that it fails to search the heart. In the theology and experience of many the cross has no place. Where the cross has no place, self has the throne. Once more let us return to its satisfying message. Let us glory only in the cross, our only hope the Crucified.

THE GOD OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Canon G. Osborne Troop

I VENTURE to assert that popular attacks upon the God of the Old Testament are strangely unintelligent. Those who make such attacks seem completely unconscious of the fact that even if we could banish altogether the God both of the Old Testament and the New, and rid ourselves completely of Christ and of the Scriptures, we should accomplish nothing whatever, save the putting out of the Light. We should be left in impenetrable darkness. All the alleged problems and contradictions and tragedies of human history and of the universe would remain unaltered. It is inconceivable folly to suppose that man can generate his own God. The men of this twentieth century are as helpless in this respect as the men of the first century of human existence. The idea so prevalent in the minds of many, that "every man is his own god", is childish nonsense. If the one living and true God has not revealed Himself, it is obvious that no one can know anything about Him.

Moreover, we should not forget that if there is a living and true God, who is not the God of the Old Testament, then this supposed other God at least allowed all the terrible things of which we complain. It is certain that, whoever He was, He in no way interfered. He is, therefore, no better than the falsely accused Old Testament God.

I shall not be counted conceited if I claim to be a man of average intelligence. I have been studying the Bible for fully sixty years, conscious of its many difficulties, both real and supposed. I find the Bible to be its own best defender and interpreter. With all my heart and intellect and conscience I believe the God of the Old Testament and the God of the New to be one and the same God. My conscience answers to the God of the whole Bible, as the God and Father of our Lord and only Saviour Jesus Christ. We all know that the Old Testament was Christ's Bible while He was on earth and that He declared the Old Testament to be a constant witness beforehand to Himself. The Bible that was good enough for Him should in all conscience be good enough for us. Can we know more about it than Christ knows, who is the Divinely appointed Judge of the living and the dead?

We are all aware that the Old Testament opens with the majestic words: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

Do we stop to think of the extraordinary nature of that wonderful statement? Some one wrote it, and wrote it long before Christ became incarnate. Whoever the writer was, it cannot be denied that he wrote in the midst of an idolatrous world. Where did he get his clear knowledge of the one Supreme Creator? He mentions this one God in the brief creation story no fewer than thirty-five times. The writer also knew that light existed before the sun, which no scientist now denies. But who revealed this fact to the despised writer of Genesis? We should like to see our university scholars give us their account of the creation in as few words as are used by the writer of Genesis. Unless we are ready to give up God altogether we had better abandon our puny attacks upon His revelation of Himself in the Old Testament. The path of wisdom, pleasantness and peace lies in walking humbly with our God.

VIRGINIA PRINCIPLES

Address of Dr. Lyon Gardiner Tyler, before the Waynesboro (Virginia) Historical Society, October 11, 1927.

IF the issues involved in the war were the concern only of the past generation, I would not care to notice them tonight, but to quote the same able writer, Mr. Whitcomb, who professes an entire change in his convictions, "the questions involved are those of eternal right and wrong and are subject to the law of Lincoln's doctrine that no question is settled until it is settled right". "The objection that the war is water over the dam and that the problems of the present demand our attention is valid, providing that history is all bunk and that there is nothing to learn from our past." There is no treason to the present in recalling the past. In common with other Southerners I accepted the results of the war in good faith and proceeded to make the best of the conditions. But a Southern man's true attitude is like that of the Scotchman. There is no more loyal part of the British Empire than Scotland, but how the Scotch love to brag of Bruce and Wallace and sing of Bannockburn, where the Scotch had the English beaten to a frazzle. And the Englishman doesn't care.

Lincoln knew the value of words, and his speeches and messages are one endless struggle for fine phrases to conceal the weakness of his logic. His Gettysburg address, which, soberly considered, contains very absurd conclusions, has a remarkable rhetorical effect. But as might be expected, his use of rhetoric did not often accomplish the purpose intended, and his juggling with this question of secession—in no way to be separated from self-determination—in his special message July 4, 1861: "If one State may secede, so may another, and when all shall secede none is left to pay the debts of the Union."

This argument which appeared to leave the debts of the Union in midair without any support could have hardly fooled any schoolboy, who could have instantly told him that the States would have been obligated to pay the debts, even if all did secede. Lincoln was deplorably ignorant if he did not know that one of the objects of the mission sent by the Confederate Government four months before was to effect an apportionment of the debts between the two governments. It was so expressed in their instructions.

Lincoln declared that "the central idea of secession was the essence of anarchy" which is good rhetoric, but any schoolboy could have told him that the Union which he proposed to hold as it was, was a child of secession from the great British Empire, and had grown in size by territorial secessions from other nations.

One cannot help suspecting that Lincoln laughed to himself at his own solemn absurdities. This he must have done, if he had the sense of humor ascribed to him. The erection of West Virginia into an independent State was the forced secession of forty-nine counties from the State of Virginia. Yet in defending the measure Lincoln executed this remarkable stunt: "It is said that the admission of West Virginia is secession and only tolerated because it is our secession. Well, if we call it by that name, there is still a difference enough between secession against the constitution and secession for the constitution." Surely Lincoln knew that if the essence of secession was anarchy, secession could never be otherwise than anarchy whatever the conditions, and it followed that he was not above approving even anarchy if it happened to promote his wishes—which gives us grave reason to doubt his sincerity on any topic.

There was no reason why, if the Southern States had prevailed, the nation thus created would have disintegrated by secession. Secession was not a blind piece of moving matter incapable of stopping except by the application of an extraneous force, but it was the act of intelligent beings who could stop themselves. A community of economic interests and fear of the great Northern Republic would have bound the Southern States together. To quote again that able writer, Paul Whitcomb: "Grant has admitted in his Memoirs that if the Southern States had been allowed to secede, they would have set up a government that would have been real and respected, and the assertion that secession was the essence of anarchy was purely academic. It is no more the essence of anarchy than the essence of all liberty is anarchy, or that the essence of government is despotism, or of war is extermination, or than the essence of discharging a governmental official is to discharge all officials and arrest the processes of government, or than the essence of shaving is to cut one's throat . . . The essence of secession is not anarchy but freedom, independence and nationalism."

Secession in 1861 was after all a long deferred consequence of a discordant Union which was threatened with rupture from the very start. The early literature of the United States is replete with evidence of the division of the Union into two nations—a mercantile and an agricultural nation, the latter of which was preyed upon. As early as the first Congress Senator William Grayson of Virginia pronounced the South "the milch cow of the Union", and by the funding and assumption laws, the internal taxes on tobacco, carriage, &c., the tariff, and bounties to New England Shipping the South was made to bear the whole burden of the support of the government. Left peacefully to develop, the colonies, there is little doubt, would have crystallized into two Confederacies under the British crown and it was only the accident of British oppression that brought about the Union.

Lincoln made the preservation of the Union his justification of a destructive war on the South, and in doing so logically condemned George Washington, who broke the integrity of the British nation. He rested his argument upon the idea that man was made for government, rather than government was made for man. The majority of Northern writers, since 1865, notably J. F. Rhodes, as if conscious of the weakness of Lincoln's position, have made the effort to sidetrack the principle of self-determination by emphasizing slavery, a mere incident in the war. Thus Rhodes, in his History, uses this language: "The cause of the war was slavery, the South fought to preserve and extend it. The North fought to repress and further restrict it." This statement he has the impudence to make in face of another that "the objects mentioned were avowed by neither side". In answer the cause of the war was not slavery, for there would have been no war had Lincoln not denied the right of self-determination, nor did the South fight to preserve and extend slavery, for had Lincoln withdrawn the troops from Fort Sumter and recognized the independence of the Confederacy, the Southerners would have done no fighting at all. Indeed, by secession the Southerners deliberately gave up one of the chief bones of contention with the North the right of taking their slaves into the territories and thereby extending slavery.

Indeed, if Rhodes' interpretation of the war is correct, Lincoln, in repeatedly denying that interpretation, must appear as either lacking in sense or sincerity—a fool or a hypocrite. But it is not correct.

Nor was slavery the cause of secession, for slavery was antecedent to the Constitution and coexistent with the Federal Union. It was undoubtedly the intemperate agitation in the North against slavery, added to the numberless past grievances, that prepared the way for secession. But the actual secession turned in the Cotton States upon the election of a sectional president on a platform that defied the Supreme Court, and in Virginia and the other border States upon the unconstitutionality of Lincoln's resolve to coerce the seceding States. And as for the matter of war, there is overwhelming evidence that Lincoln's final determination turned, not upon secession, nor upon slavery, nor upon preserving the Union, but upon the tariff. "What will become of my tariff if I allow the Southern States, with their ten cent tariff, to go?" was the question asked by him on three several occasions. It was currently feared that, as a result of the low tariff of the South, that section would become the ruling power in North America, and "grass would grow in the streets of New York".

Secession and war had nothing in common, although every effort has been made by Northern writers to confound the two. Secession was a mere civil procedure and involved no violence, and it depended upon Lincoln whether he would have war or not. When Norway seceded from Sweden, Sweden recognized the independence of Norway, and there was no war. The real anarchy is war, which is a condition of chaos and destruction—"a hell" on earth, according to Gen. W. T. Sherman, and Lincoln in preferring war to the recognition of secession was the real anarchist.

The linking of slavery with war, and of war with secession, is merely an effort to obscure the issue—"a red herring drawn across the trail". How can it be denied that, whatever the occasion of secession, the primary object of the South on seceding was to shake off all connection with the North? There was no time during the war that the South would not have stopped fighting if its independence had been recognized, and for independence the South was prepared to sacrifice even their slaves, as was shown by the Mission of Duncan F. Kenner to England, towards the close of the war, for recognition with the promise of freedom to the slaves.

Nor is there any reasonable ground for believing that Lincoln would have saved the South from the anarchy of reconstruction, which followed the anarchy of war. As a matter of fact he had no fixed views on any subject, and least of all on Reconstruction. When just before hostilities the Confederates sent a commission to Washington to confer with him about the troubles, he denied them audience, and yet towards the close of the war condescended to meet Southern commissioners at Old Point. He had practically decided to withdraw the troops from Fort Sumter, but changed front when a conference of nine tariff Governors brought pressure to bear upon him; he decided to issue a proclamation of emancipation in July, 1863, but when Seward, the Secretary of State, showed to him its impropriety at the time, he pocketed the paper and for months later talked on both sides of the question. He at first decided to write a paper justifying the action of Captain Wilkes in seizing the Confederate commissioners from the British steam packet Trent, but shortly united with his Cabinet in making a humiliating apology to Great Britain. He formulated a plan of reconstruction in his proclamation of Amnesty, December 8, 1863, but, when Congress formulated another one, he professed in another proclamation July 8, 1864, that he was not bound up to any single plan and would enforce that too, "if the loyal people of any State" wanted it. How two plans, having contradictory provisions, could have operated in harmony he never undertook to explain. Two other instances may be given occurring during his last year demonstrative of Lincoln's utter lack of stability. In February, 1865, he recommended to his cabinet a plan of bringing the war to a close by paying the Southern people $400,000,000 for their slaves. But when the Cabinet refused to agree with him, Lincoln, instead of insisting on his view, humbly submitted.

Nothing, indeed, shows better than this offer that Lincoln never understood the Southern people. They would have scorned his proposal to pay them, as they were not fighting for the money value of slaves but in defense of their Fatherland and for independence.

The final instance of his instability is afforded in his very last act of a public nature. Upon the evacuation of Richmond, Lincoln made haste to visit the city which had defied him so long. In his delight over the result he wrote a letter to General Weitzel, who had the command, "to permit the Virginia gentlemen who had acted as the legislature of Virginia" in support of the Rebellion to assemble at Richmond, and to take measures to withdraw the Virginia troops and other support from resistance to the general government. A few days later while the members were coming together, Lincoln who had returned to Washington sent a telegram withdrawing the permission. In a letter afterwards he stated that he had not given permission for the Legislature to assemble but only "those gentlemen who had acted as the Legislature", and that Lee's surrender rendered their coming together unnecessary. But that this was only a subterfuge is revealed by the fact that General Sherman, who had an interview with Lincoln at City Point, in the terms he granted Johnston recognized the old Legislatures of the Southern States, and the testimony of Lincoln's Secretaries Stanton and Wells is to the effect that Lincoln sent his telegram only after Stanton's vehement protest and in the very words that Stanton suggested.

All of which shows that Lincoln would have made no successful resistance to the plan of the vindictives in Congress, had he lived to see the years of madness which followed the war. What mainly occasioned this madness was not the assassination of Lincoln, but the resentment felt at President Johnson's policy of admitting to Congress Southern Brigadiers and Senators who would help to make laws for the loyal men of the North. Had Lincoln dared to initiate the same policy he would have met with the same resentment as Johnson, which would have been speedily followed by his speedy, hearty cooperation with Congress.

It was a curious reversal of all the logic of force championed by Lincoln when Woodrow Wilson, born in Virginia, came forward as the champion of secession in the World War. The sacred character of the principle of self-government was affirmed by him in his inaugural address March 4, 1917, and in his letter to the new Russian government when he wrote as follows: "No people must be forced under sovereignty under which it does not choose to live." On this principle Europe was reorganized, by the establishment of numerous new states, but undoubtedly the example of Wilson lost much of its virtue and effect by his representing a country which owed its own authority to a policy of blood and force.

Why disguise the fact? We have now a great nation it is true, but it is a great Northern nation to which the South has had to conform all its policy and sacrifice all its ideals. The national authority so much lauded is after all only Northern authority. Whatever liberty the South enjoys is by permission, and the attitude of the North is that the South may be indulged but must be carefully watched. Practically the country is governed by the Republican party, which every one knows is a mere sectional Northern party. No sooner does the party of the North of more liberal principles, aided by the South, get into power than the old jealousy is aroused, and the party is fired out by a great Northern vote.

So marked is this spirit that a distinguished Southern Senator was compelled to say to another just the other day in the United States Senate Chamber that "the latter's great-great-grandchildren would never see a Southern man nominated for President of the United States".

Had the South established the independence it would have had its own laws suited to its own conditions. As it is, it is forced to live under laws made by Northern majorities in Congress in favor of Northern interests. If the South ever becomes a dominant part of the Union, it will be because human legislation cannot, in the long run, defeat the will of nature, for the South occupies one of the noblest and richest sections of the world. Retribution may overtake the North when the South thoroughly Northernized will be the seat of all the industries of the Union.

It is always unfair to argue against a present which, so to speak, did not occur a present which did. No doubt if the American colonies had failed in their war with Great Britain there would have been after a short time plenty of people in the United States who would have condemned George Washington and declared the American failure "a blessing". Indeed, it is a fact according to "Big Bill Thompson", Mayor of Chicago, that several school histories used in our schools today pronounce the American Revolution a mistake. The argument sometimes heard that, if the South had been allowed to establish an independent government, the after-condition would have been one of repeated wars, is contradicted by the long-continued peaceful relations held between this country and Canada, and at any rate the war which actually occurred, being one in contemplation of absolute conquest, was more dreadful in its waging than would have been many wars susceptible of settlement as between recognized independent powers. But no matter what the promise the future holds forth, it does not change the character of the war of 1861, the end never justifies the means.

The next political principle for which Virginia stood and which has been almost forgotten by some of our people, is the right of a person to abandon his citizenship and acquire a residence elsewhere. This is called the right of expatriation, and found its first noble expression in the act of 1779 drawn by Thomas Jefferson, the same great statesman who drew the Declaration of Independence. It was an answer to the British doctrine of "Once a citizen always a citizen"—a doctrine of pernicious consequences because its assertion involved in war two countries of kindred blood, which ought to have been the last to go to war. The correlative of expatriation is the right of making a new home in any part of the globe. Old Virginia always believed in liberal naturalization laws, as instances in some vital episodes in our history prove.

On the motion of Mr. Madison of Virginia in the third Congress, the period of probation for citizenship in the case of foreigners was put at five years. The Federalists, who had their headquarters in New England, abused all foreigners—especially Catholics—passed the alien and sedition laws and changed the period of probation to fourteen years, but when Mr. Jefferson was elected in 1801 the probation period was restored to five years, and its reasonableness has triumphed over all attempts to change it since that time.

It was due to this Virginia policy of liberal encouragement to settlers that the West and North were filled with a vast population which redeemed the vacant lands and contributed to the growth and expansion of the country. The merits of Virginia are all the greater because from inherent racial objection to the presence of the black man the emigrants would not come South then, and they do not come South now, in any great numbers. The thoughts of her statesmen extended to the natural rights of mankind, and one of the proudest years in the history of Virginia is the year 1855, when the forces of "Know-Nothing-ism", which had swept over the North, was met by Virginia, under the lead of Henry A. Wise, on the threshold of the South, and brought to a sudden halt. The secret order was formed on the idea of inhibiting all foreign and especially Catholic immigration, but when in addition to Virginia, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi gave their verdict against the new movement, the tide was rolled back upon Massachusetts where the "ism" originated, and although the Know-Nothings had the boldness to put forward Millard Fillmore in 1856 for President, the force of the movement was spent.

No doubt, to the loss of Virginia influence and power in Congress by the war of 1861 has been due the enactment of the absurd laws on emigration that now prevail. The rights of expatriation and of emigration—the leaving of citizens and the coming in of foreigners—are no doubt subject to restrictions, but they should not be imposed in any arbitrary manner. It is not reasonable that a man should have a right to leave his State when it is in danger of invasion or get rid of laws which affected him when he left, if he voluntarily returns, and every State has a right to protect itself against dangerous people; but I hold, in the spirit of the Virginia Fathers, that every decent white man and woman, no matter where he comes from, has a natural right to the United States. A law shutting out the wicked and vicious, or forbidding different races, because of the danger of amalgamation, is just; but such laws as we have in the Federal Statutes permitting admission of the different nations according to an arbitrary proportion, taking no account of the worth of the individual, are unjust, absurd and tyrannical.

GOD AND YOU.

A Lenten Meditation.

GOD comforts men.
Comfort is one of the world's greatest needs, but it is one of the world's rarest gifts.
When sorrow enters your life the world withdraws.
It resigns. It puts crepe on the door.
It adds gloom to your heart.
It doesn't know what to say. It leaves you alone.
At such an hour GOD knocks at the door.
He comes into your life.
He comforts your soul.
He wipes away all tears.

—The Rev. Charles Stelzle, from Charlotte Observer, March, 1927.

PRAYER.

O God, we know that "all that will live godly in Christ shall suffer persecution". Give us courage to face all opposition and hardship which we are called upon to endure in Jesus' name. May we never be guilty of cowardly silence when we should speak out for Him; and do thou own and use our faithful witness to the good of others and the glory of others and the glory of our Lord and Master. We ask in His Name. Amen.

INTERIORS OF VIRGINIA HOUSES OF COLONIAL TIMES: By Edith Tunis Sale. The Colonial Syndicate, 1121 Bank Street, Richmond, Va.

This volume is truly a beautiful specimen of the book-makers' art. The printing, binding and paper used are all most attractive in appearance, and of finest quality. Scattered through the five hundred and twenty-eight pages there are three hundred and seventy-one exclusive illustrations. In addition to the beautiful exterior and interior photographs of these charming old structures there is given in almost every instance, a floor plan with measurements. These, together with the accurate and beautiful descriptions of these old colonial residences, should make the book not only intensely interesting, but peculiarly valuable to persons interested in the study of the architecture of that period. No one thinking of erecting a home of colonial design ought to fail to make a study of this book before settling on a plan. In addition to full and beautiful treatment of those well known places like Brandon, Shirley, Stratford, Westover, Marmion, Kenmore, Sabine Hall, and many more of this prominent class, we find in this book many others not so generally known, and yet quite as interesting and deserving of acquaintance and study.

"The interior of many of the old dwellings have never before been open to the public or the camera-man, their inner histories have never been revealed, making thereby the greater part of the material in this book entirely new. . . . Until now no attempt has been made to describe in detail these beautiful old rooms, and this is the only book that has undertaken to tell exclusively their stories. Both text and illustrations have been gathered from personal visits to these ancient dwellings where precious family papers and rare records were graciously placed at the disposal of the author. Though much has been written of Virginia's historic buildings, of her romantic old gardens, this is the first time the interiors of her true Colonial houses have been seriously considered, though it is in the interiors that one sees clearly what the daily life of the Colonists was. In these, the builders always managed to touch the very heart of things regardless of the obstacles they had to overcome. Both the founders and their master-workmen were conservative artificers and they have left us a heritage that can never be duplicated." The author's purpose, so aptly expressed in the above quotation from her "Foreword" has been most truly and beautifully realized in this charming and valuable book. It is a real contribution not only to the understanding and appreciation of the architecture of Old Virginia Homes, but quite as much so of the tastes, culture, manners and customs of the Virginians of the Colonial Era. Not only are Mrs. Sale and her printers. The William Byrd Press, of Richmond, Va., to be congratulated for their splendid accomplishment in the production of this work, but the reading public all over America is most fortunate in having made accessible to them in such interesting and attractive form a volume which is both a record and an interpretation of the domestic and social life and surroundings of the more prominent families of the Old Dominion. The book is published in a limited edition, and the sales have already been so large that the book will soon be out of print and no more copies can then be put on the market as the type has been distributed. Two of Mrs. Sales' previous books, "Manors of Virginia in Colonial Times" and "Old Time Belles and Cavaliers", have been out of print for several years, and when procurable from second-hand dealers, bring readily more than five times the price at which they were published. The same will undoubtedly be true very soon of the present volume.

JESUS CHRIST: By Anthony C. Deane, M. A., Hon. Canon of Worcester. Doubleday, Doran and Company, Garden City, L. I.

The Canon here attempts to give material for an answer to Our Lord's supreme question about Himself. He attempts to reconstruct the ideas of others about Him, His own ideas of His Mission, and the religious thought of the age in which He lived. We question whether the attempt is worth-while. There must always be a great deal of speculation and unreality connected with any attempt to reconstruct the views of the ones who first saw Our Lord, and the Canon has admitted a good deal to the speculative into his narrative.

Two other points must be noted. The Canon sets the Prophetic and the Priestly elements of the Old Testament over against one another in the approved fashion of a certain modern school, and fails to take into account the fact that the Lord did not give His teachings concerning the Kingdom broadcast, but confined them to His disciples. To the multitudes He spoke in parables.

The author accepts the Resurrection without spiritualizing it, and believes the story of the Virgin Birth, we are glad to say, but the portrait of the Saviour lacks the touch of reverence and of awe so necessary for any true description. The author's idea of sin seems vague and unsatisfactory, which probably accounts for the lack, and the image of the Saviour is blurred by the outlines of the Social Reformer. We doubt whether the book will wring from the reader the cry, "My Lord and My God"!

MENTAL PHASES IN A SPIRITUAL BIOGRAPHY: By George Preston Mains, D. D. Cloth, Pp. 255. Harper and Brothers, New York. Price, $2.

The older of us well recall the honored firm, Eaton and Mains, from which all literature relating to Methodism, and other isms too, might be obtained. To browse in a book, therefore, written by one of these men, a contemporary of James M. Buckler in the day of his splendid supremacy, is a refreshment and an inspiration. We remember the fear of Methodist fundamentalists that the Publishing House was going over to Modernism, in the early days of that movement. And Dr. Mains is not delicate as to the question. He frankly avows that the new knowledge has affected the rigidity of belief to which former Methodism was attached. But holds that there can be no conflict between Religion and Science. This debatable question, ever provoking because of the inability of the contenders to agree as to definitions, is, however, not a large factor in the book. There is a freshening stimulus as the author reviews the changing attitudes and brings before us the thought of the age past which was one of firm conviction. He allows, "I was the child of a Christian home—a home whose atmospheres were sweetened by the sanctities of a commanding faith, a home in which the Bible was daily read and family worship conducted. After a life-time of observation, I unhesitatingly rate this as the most precious patrimony which parents can bestow upon childhood". If only we could believe that the now different ideals which he notes, and at times commends, might produce the like result, we should be more certain of our footing. This good man had an inheritance; he remembers it with gratitude; he finds at the close of his life that beneath all the shiftings and sinkings of the sands of religious controversy there is a rock upon which one may stand. We praise him for that. His message should bring courage to wondering minds. However, his Christian philosophy moves far afield of the Wesleyan teachings. Must one reject treasurable standards of truth, only because they seem to be out of joint with the age? How far shall we accept the challenge to readjust our convictions, only to find later on, as Harnack has contended, that we have "forsaken positions to which we must return, ere there can be a solution of the present unrest"? And confessedly, at times, Dr. Mains does meet Harnack's behest. He wants to save from the wreckage of cold materialism something of the supernatural, the sublimely ethical, the transcendingly sovereign in the person of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. And we do thank him for it. It really is not a book exclusively for Methodists. All Christians will be stimulated by reading it; though not all will accord in its entirety with certain postulates and derivations. But how can a man in this conflicting age write in full union with every phase of thought? He submits his thesis as a tribute to that ancient faith in which he was reared; and believes it still has a commanding power in the lives of men.

THE SAME OLD NET AND THE SAME OLD POND.

"Did you ever notice," said the old lady smiling into the troubled face before her, "that when the Lord told the discouraged fishermen to cast their nets again, it was right in the same old place where they had caught nothing? If we could only get off to some new place every time we get discouraged, trying again would be an easier thing. If we could be somebody else, it might not be hard to have fresh faith and courage; but it is the same old net in the same old pond for most of us. The old temptations are to be overcome, the old faults to be conquered, the old trials and discouragements before which we failed yesterday to be faced again today. We must win success where we are if we are to win it at all, and it is the Master Himself who after all the toilful, disheartening failures, bids us "try again".—S. S. Times.

Letters to the Editor

REGRETS PRESENT COURSE.

Mr. Editor:

There are just four clergymen now at work in this Church of ours who have a somewhat unique background in regard to the Virginia Seminary.

Each of these men was trained as a student in the Seminary, later on served as a member of the faculty, and is now engaged in some other field of the work of the ministry. These four men: Doctor Grammer, of St. Stephen's Church, Philadelphia; Bishop Tucker, of the Diocese of Virginia; Doctor Tucker of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, and the writer of this letter. These men have thus had an unusual opportunity of knowing the Seminary from every point of view, while not being now engaged in its work. They have therefore unusual advantages for estimating fairly the character of its work while at the same time being outside of its problems.

The writer of this letter has also a background of relation to The Southern Churchman, not unusual in Virginia. The Southern Churchman came into the home of my parents for years before I was born, and one of my earliest memories "In the dark backward and abyss of time" is of hearing The Southern Churchman read aloud on Sunday afternoons. From that day to this, the paper has continued to come into my home, and I expect it to continue to come as long as I live. I have therefore this background of lifelong friendship and affection for The Southern Churchman; and thus perhaps my relationship at once to the Seminary and to the paper, furnishes sufficient justification for this letter concerning the present unhappy controversy in which the paper feels it to be its duty to attack the Seminary.

I believe I am one of a very large number of readers greatly deploring this distressing controversy, and I feel constrained to say that in my judgment The Southern Churchman, both in the substance of its utterances, and in the spirit and temper of its expressions, has departed far from the high traditions of its honored past.

This thought is forced upon me all the more strongly on reading The Bulletin of the Seminary issued April 19, 1928. In that issue The Letter to the Alumni signed by the whole faculty gives with frankness and clearness an excellent statement of faith that should be reassuring to any who may have been disturbed by thinking that the Seminary is departing from the eternal verities of the Gospel. This letter to the Alumni is written with admirable restraint, and with a fine spirit and dignified expression such as befit the serious import of the whole matter.

Also Professor Bell's very striking paper on the Divinity of Jesus will repay careful reading and re-reading, and is further evidence to the fair minded reader of spiritual insight and doctrinal soundness.

The Southern Churchman has found space for many letters strongly approving its present course. I trust therefore that it may find space for this letter from a lifelong friend of the paper who greatly regrets its present course in attacking the Seminary.

ATTENTION, (NEW YORK) CHURCHMAN!

(A Subscriber Answers.)

Mr. Editor:

Have you a sense of glorious achievement? You ought to have. You have "arrived"—you have broken into the columns of the (New York) Churchman and have had one of your editorials reproduced therein.

The Christian gentleman (?) who edits that paper has fancied that he has detected errors so grievous that to publish them is but to "show you up". But in his own editorial remarks he tells us that he is consciously trying to be funny. In essaying to the role of critic, and in his conscious buffoonery, the gentleman becomes an a-s. He says: ". . . we attempt a bit of humor, occasionally, in the (New York) Churchman". He should have said, "Blasphemy and humor". Blasphemy in editorials. Humor in Gargoyles. First-class blasphemy! First-class humor!

Your principle error was that in your letter you denied being a Fundamentalist, while in your editorial you used the expression "we fundamentalists". The very criticism indicates the type of mind possessed by the gentleman who edits the (New York) Churchman. We are glad that he has published your editorial. Any one who reads your editorial will not fail to understand it; nor will he be impressed with anything contradictory or inconsistent. "Consistency is the bugbear of small minds," said a noted statesman. He, of course, had reference to a certain kind of "formal" or "literal" consistency.

In one place you implied that you were a fundamentalist; in another you specifically denied being a fundamentalist. That is the case against you. Let us turn the tables for a minute. We know of several "LIBERALS" who would vehemently deny that they were liberals if by that term was meant the type of liberalism which is represented by the editor of the (New York) Churchman. Yet these men call themselves liberals. Probably they are liberals. They are simply NOT THAT KIND OF LIBERALS.

Now there are fundamentalists and fundamentalists. After having read the (New York) Churchman (we read almost anything) for several years we must conclude that in the eyes of the (New York) Churchman any true Prayer Book Churchman is a fundamentalist. Any one who believes that Creeds and believes that a clergyman who does not believe them is a hypocrite is a Fundamentalist—according to the (New York) Churchman. Now this writer, according to the above definition, is a Fundamentalist. So are most of the clergy and practically all of the laymen in the Church. We believe that a man who joins the Masons and then tries to cut the heart out of the doctrines of Masonry is a hypocrite. The Masons would not let such a character "get away with it". Not even if he talked about progressive relations!

You could very consistently call yourself a Fundamentalist in one place and deny that you were a Fundamentalist in another. In one place you doubtless referred to the fundamental doctrines of the Church; in the other you doubtless referred to certain organizations from which there emanate rather extreme doctrines. In fact, your editorial makes it clear that that is precisely the situation.

It may be objected, Mr. Williams, that you did not make these distinctions in your letter. But who in the world would ask you to do so? The editor of the (New York) Churchman knows what you believe. He knows also that you preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ. He doesn't like that—and that, Sir, is really the trouble with the gentleman.

You also made an error in some one's name. That doesn't matter either.

By the way, did you notice what the editor of the (New York) Churchman had to say about the Bolsheviks? He claims that every one in his office is claiming the honor of being associated with Lenin and Trotsky. On this ground we cannot question him. He asks us to laugh as we read the statement. We couldn't laugh at that until we had forgotten Sacco and Vanzetti—and the (New York) Churchman.

"WHAT DO YOUR READERS WANT?"

Mr. Editor:

If I were to miss a single issue of The Southern Churchman, I would indeed feel that I had lost something. The fact is I would rather miss not only one, but several meals than miss a single copy.

I have a somewhat heavy mail, but no matter, The Southern Churchman is never neglected.

Possibly you may recall that I am just a layman in the Southern Presbyterian Church. We have a fine pastor and I am pleased to state that he has never been bitten by the "Evolution Bug", and will further state he is neither a rabid Fundamentalist, or a disbelieving Modernist: he is a firm, earnest and able Christian minister. And nearly if not every week there are conversions and additions to his church as a result of his earnest and faithful presentation of the Gospel as "it is writ". Am mailing you one of our bulletins and if you will examine it you will see what this "Church Believes".

Am pleased to see you have invited your readers to send in favorite Scripture verses.

We notice in your last number you say, "What Do the Laity Want"?

Would it be presumptuous to say, "What Do Your Readers Want"?

I have viewed with alarm the appalling increase of crime, especially among the youths of our land. There must be a reason.

This is humbly suggested. Would it not be a good idea to set aside a column or two, possibly a page and ask readers to present their views on this important phase of our present-day life?

Recently our local grand jury presented the startling statement that ninety per cent of the reported infractions of our laws as reported were caused by youths under twenty-five years of age.

Is there a question that is more important to our Christian citizenship than to find why this saturnalia of crime and to earnestly prescribe a remedy?

Will you kindly let me know what you think about it? If you approve of such a course I shall be pleased to submit some thoughts and suggestions on this—to me—the most important question of the present hour.

Beg your pardon for making this communication so long, but I only plead that this is one question that should be presented your readers.

Will close by saying that I am not a pessimist or a gloomy layman.

Yours with love for the cause of Christ,

"THE CONTROVERSY HAS GONE FAR ENOUGH!"

Mr. Editor:

There may be many, we presume, who think with the writer, that the controversy in The Southern Churchman about the Seminary has gone far enough; there seems that but little good can come from continuing it, to either side.

That there may have been some grounds for starting it is a mooted question. criminations and recrimination breed suspicion, and suspicion separates Christian brothers instead of drawing them together, only irritates the wounds it makes instead of healing them. That some unfortunate, erratic and probably exaggerated views, that were classed as tending towards Modernism, at one time did emanate from the Seminary, has been common talk. On one occasion, when this ill omened poison gas was being issued by such unbalanced minds as Stickney Grant and others, the writer was discussing the harm of it in a vigorous way, a prominent young clergyman said in a friendly way, "Hold on there, don't be too rough, I am a conservative modernist myself". He was asked, "Where do you get that from? what are you trying to do"? He said, "I got it from the Seminary". In mentioning this to one of our late bishops, this bishop said, "The fellow didn't know what he was talking about, there is no modernism taught at the Seminary, except to teach the fallacy of it, unless some one has lied to me"!

Our present bishop in Southern Churchman, February 25, says: "I have direct personal knowledge of the teaching that is being given the students at the Seminary. I feel sure that the writer (in Southern Churchman) has been misinformed as to some of the facts upon which his criticism is based."

If some one at some time has overstepped the bounds of safety, let's hope he had for the time forgotten what he learned as a child "that it is a dangerous pastime playing with fire and is generally followed by bad results", and that he will not do it again.

It should be apparent that conditions there now are in good shape as in "The Bulletin", April 19, 1928, of the Seminary, the whole Faculty has signed in a statement that the suggestion, "that the institution destroys rather than creates Christian faith in its students, that its Faculty has discarded some of its Christian beliefs", is untrue. These gentlemen could hardly sign such a statement of conditions there now unless they knew what they were signing. Let us take their word for it. Every one has the utmost confidence in the consecrated beloved head of the Seminary. If there is any man one would be willing to follow blindfolded, it is he. May God bless him.

To The Southern Churchman we would say, so far as your paper stands for the Bible as the true Word of God, you are on safe ground, as long as one's feet are planted on the Rock of Ages no man can pull him down.

"Firm on the Word of God I stand,
All else is but as shifting sand."

As a champion for the truth of the Word of God, you are unassailable, all the shafts that have been hurled at it in four thousand years have not made a dent in it. But the Word of God and the Works of God are marching down the ages hand in hand, the truth of one illuminating the truth of the other.

Let us discard suspicions. Let us look for the good that is in each other. We are all working for the same aim, for the spread of Christ's Kingdom among men. Let us forget our controversies, but focus our eyes on the glorious Personality of Jesus Christ, and having them riveted on Him, side by side, let us march on together as true soldiers of the Cross.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION.

The following referring to the editorial by the Rev. P. W. Reed, published in our last issue under the title, "Unmasking the Plot", is being distributed in circular form, together with a reprint of the editorial:

These reprints are from The Southern Churchman of May 5, 1928, which I am having printed and beg to add a few lines.

First, I wish to say that our Vestry unanimously voted against the removal of the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion and I have already heard of Vestries in this and other Dioceses who have done and expect to do likewise.

Have had a number of letters from various Laymen and practically all are in hearty sympathy and accord, as well as our own Rector.

When a good old conservative Church paper like THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN sounds the alarm, I think it is indeed high time for all to at least take notice.

I do not think the Laity, as a whole, begin to realize the situation regarding the proposal to drop the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion from our Prayer Book.

This is another move by the Anglo-Catholic Party in the Church, whose significance can hardly be over-estimated.

I have watched the Catholic workings for years and especially since 1913 (in the attempt to change the name of our Church to the "American Catholic") and two years after seeing what I did at our General Convention at New Orleans in 1925, am fully convinced they are infringing more and more on the rights and privileges of Evangelicals and Protestants in the Church.

There is and has been for years, a decided tendency to introduce more and more of the Roman Catholic ideas into the Church, and we wonder what will be the end.

Believing the overwhelming majority feel as I do, and that we have been silent long enough, I am sending this, calling your special attention to this danger (for I feel that we are already on the very edge of the precipice), that you may mention this to those interested.

These Articles of Religion are the one outstanding bulwark that we have against the medieval and Romanish tendencies in the Church, as indicated by repeated items in our Church papers such as The Southern Churchman and The New York Churchman.

Perhaps we Laymen do not read our Church papers closely enough to realize how things have drifted in recent years, and right here, beg to suggest reading them more in this crisis and threatened upheaval and especially just now and prior and during our next triennial Convention in Washington this coming October.

The Anglo-Catholic Party is waging a very bitter fight, their intent being apparently to change our services as near as possible to the Roman ritual.

The present service is most beautiful. Is loved and revered by many (if not all) of our devoted Churchmen and Churchwomen and to make some of the proposed changes would, I am sure, create serious dissension, cause heavy loss in membership, drive away many prospective members, and I really think disrupt the Church.

There is a great deal more I could say and some things I could talk better than I could write.

Silence and Patience have long ceased to be virtues and I am at last writing this after all sober reflection, much reluctance and deliberation.

I hope and pray that this break may be averted.

We cannot expect to escape the trials of life. Our way lies through them. A woman who had taken passage on a steamer was nervous and timid. Her eyes wandered from the quiet waters of the harbor to the rougher waves outside, and especially to the bar, where the breakers told of hidden rocks. She happened to know the pilot, and she tried his patience with useless questions. "Isn't there any way for us to keep clear of the reefs and rough sea out yonder?" she demanded. "Yes'm, just one. The boat can stay right where she is, safe and peaceful till she falls to pieces from old age," said the pilot, grimly, "but she can never get anywhere else or be of any use without taking her chances in the seas." This is life.—Sunday-School Journal.

Church Intelligence

Birds of a Feather Flock Together.

From the New York Times we take the following:

A new creed is needed to supplement the old, which the Church can no longer expect its members to accept literally, the Rev. Dr. W. Russell Bowie, rector of Grace Protestant Episcopal Church, Broadway and Tenth Street, told his congregation Sunday morning.

As an example of a creed "intended to embody the modern spirit and to meet current needs," Dr. Bowie read the expression of faith adopted by the Rev. Dr. Karl Reiland last month at St. George's Episcopal Church. Later, however, he explained that he did not expect to incorporate this or any similar expression in the services at his church "at present".

Insisting that any new form adopted should be only a supplement to the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, the minister said:

"Aside from their historic value, the old creeds are highly important, because they express for us the poetry of religious emotion. We must expect liberality in their interpretation and it is not really important whether or not individuals accept literally all the dogma expressed in them.

"It matters little if men do not believe in a physical Ascension as it is implied in the old Creeds with a heaven so near that it might almost be possible to touch it, or even if they discard the conception of a physical Virgin Birth. But every Christian must and does accept the essential basis of his religion as it is expressed in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. He must believe in God as the Father and Maker of the world, in Christ as the Redeemer, and in the Holy Ghost as life-giver."

Encouraging Reports.

The largest increase for fifteen years past in the number of active Chapters was shown by report submitted by General Secretary Leon C. Palmer, at the spring meeting of the National Council of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, in Philadelphia, April 21, and a still larger increase is expected during the coming year. Many new Chapters have been organized, and inactive Chapters have been either revived or dropped from the rolls.

The Treasurer's report showed prompt payment of all current expenses and a general improvement in the financial condition of the Brotherhood. Vice-President G. Frank Shelby reported gratifying progress in raising the budget for the current year.

A "Ten Point Chapter" standard program was submitted and approved, and plans for promoting it throughout the field were developed. A Chapter Directory based upon a survey of the entire field and listing all Chapters of the Brotherhood with an analysis of the activities of each, was presented and received with approval. Thirty-one new booklets, pamphlets and charts have been prepared and issued during the past five months.

Eight new Council Members were elected, and plans for nine Junior Boys training camp conferences were reported.

The program and plans for the approaching National Convention of the Brotherhood in Washington were approved and steps taken towards a still closer cooperation between the Brotherhood, the Daughters of the King and the National Commission on Evangelism.

"I Was In Prison and Ye Came Unto Me."

Mr. F. M. Smith, prominent business man of Philadelphia, and the Rev. Vincent J. Steffan, Prison Chaplain at large of America, drove down to the Virginia State Penitentiary for the regular Protestant Sunday morning service, which was conducted under the auspices of the Rev. Burwell (colored), who was present with the choir of a local colored Baptist Church.

Bibles In the Hotels.

For many years the New York Bible Society has furnished the guest rooms of the hotels of New York City with Bibles. Within a comparatively few years it has placed more than 80,000 Bibles in these hotels. The Gideon Association supplies the hotels in the cities and towns throughout the country but not in New York City.

At a special service on Easter Sunday afternoon in the lobby of the new Hotel Lincoln, New York, 1,375 Bibles presented to the hotel by the New York Bible Society were dedicated. Mr. John C. West, President of the Society was in charge of the service and presented the Bibles to Mr. James T. Clyde, the manager of the hotel, who replied with a few chosen words of appreciation. The service was a very impressive one. Mr. Hobart Geer with a chorus of more than fifty voices from the Gospel Tabernacle Church nearby led the singing and Mrs. Saxby Lewis sang a helpful solo, entitled "God's Word means just what it says". The Rev. Walter M. Turnbull, D. D., the pastor of the Gospel Tabernacle gave a spiritual message. Mr. Samuel B. Van Buren, President of the New York State Gideons, offered prayer and spoke for a few minutes. The benediction was pronounced by the Rev. F. Noel Palmer. Through the entire service the emphasis was placed upon the value of the Bible in the hotel room.

The supplying of hotels with Bibles is only one branch of the great work of the New York Bible Society. The Society which is in its one hundred and nineteenth year of service is making a large distribution of the Scriptures among the immigrants as they arrive, among the sailors on ships of all kinds, in hospitals, prisons, among the needy poor and in raised type for the blind. The Society is circulating the Scriptures in sixty-seven languages and the work is carried on from the Bible House at No. 5 East Forty-eighth Street, New York.

Mr. Smith addressed the women prisoners, selecting for his Scriptural text, St. Matt. 11:28, 29, 30, while Mr. Steffan delivered an address from St. John 20:30, 31, laying particular stress upon the marvelous prominence of the Lord Jesus Christ as set forth by signs which He demonstrated, and which are recorded in the Gospel of St. John:

St. John, Chapter 2—Water turned to Wine, showing Christ the Master of Nature.

St. John, Chapter 4—Healing of Nobleman's son, showing Christ the Master of Disease.

St. John, Chapter 5—Healing of withered limbs, showing Christ the Master of the Body.

St. John, Chapter 6—Feeding of Five Thousand, Master of Food Supplies.

St. John, Chapter 6—Walking upon the Sea, Master of the Elements.

St. John, Chapter 9—Giving Sight to Blind, Master of Physical Blindness.

St. John, Chapter 11—Restored Lazarus to Life, Master of Death and Lord of Life.

Mr. Steffan pointed to the fact that the Lord Jesus Christ said: "Greater works than these shall ye do," which greater works at present are seen in the salvation of lost men and women—bringing them to God and suitably preparing them for fellowship with Him through time and eternity.

The Lord was pleased to place His seal of blessing upon the meeting. Men and women manifested outwardly their desire to repent and turn from sin to the Lord Jesus Christ, accepting Him as their personal Saviour.

This meeting was followed immediately by another very unique service held at the Prison Farm. The gracious reception given the visitors at the Penitentiary and Prison Farm was an indication of profound sympathy toward them and their work on the part of the authorities. This was particularly noticeable in the attitude of Mr. Penn, Superintendent of the Prison Farm. The visitors were very happy to note that here was one place that is not burdensome to the State in caring for those incarcerated, but through the unusual administration of the authorities, every one who is imprisoned, including a totally blind man, is called upon to work with his hands.

The day was a blessed one. Mr. Smith and Mr. Steffan heard again and again individual prisoners say to them, "Come back soon," "Come again," "We want you to return." V. J. S.

Church Army.

The whole American force of the Church Army, except two men, were together in New York over the week-end of April 21 to 24, seven men who have been in the United States for some time, and fourteen just arrived from England to help with the summer work. The two absent were Captain Atkinson, on holiday, and Captain Jarvis, in charge of the new training-center in Providence. The twenty-one had a Quiet Day at Trinity Chapel, led by the vicar, Dr. Sutton, on Monday, and returned there again for the early service Tuesday morning—singing gloriously—before separating for their widely scattered fields, in Florida, New Jersey, Connecticut, Vermont, Albany, Colorado, and Eastern Oregon, as well as the headquarters in New York. Requests for their work have come in such quantity from the bishops that if two hundred men were available, fields could be assigned them at once.

Some friends entertained them at tea in the Diocesan House Monday afternoon, where the guests had a rare opportunity to meet all the men together.

China Needs Food.

The Chairman of the Chinese Relief Committee at Tehchow, a large city of Shantung, estimates that in an area of one hundred square miles around Tehchow, with a population of approximately three million, 900,000 are doomed to die of starvation and are beyond reach of help; that another 900,000 can be saved if given food or a chance to earn it, and that a third 900,000 probably will be able to get along in one way or another though with terrible privation and suffering on the part of many.

This man, who is a leading business man in the famine area, speaks from intimate knowledge of the country and an experience in relief work in previous famines. The result of his survey has been forwarded by radiogram to the National Campaign Committee, for China Famine Relief, 419 Fourth Avenue, New York City, which is making an appeal for $10,000,000 with which to give immediate help in food, and later rehabilitation.

It is only by combined action—in which aid is given by many—that the task of feeding China may be accomplished.

Presiding Bishop Asks Prayers for National Council, May 31, 1928.

It is necessary to hold a special meeting of the National Council May 31, with meetings of several of the Departments on May 30. Important matters which could not be finished at the April meeting will be considered. Will the clergy remember us in their prayers in public worship on one or more Sundays before the meeting.

John Gardner Murray,
Presiding Bishop and President of the National Council.

Notice to the Clergy of the Church.

You may know, or come to know, a man the name of Charles V. Knightley, who is fifty-six years old, slightly lame, and says he is a civil engineer.

If you have contact with this man I should appreciate knowing about it, and may be able to give you information which will help you in deciding what you ought to do.

(Rev.) L. Ernest Sunderland,
Superintendent N. Y. P. Episcopal City Mission Soc., 388 Bleecker Street, New York City.

A Message From the Presiding Bishop to the Men of the Church.

My Dear Brethren:

On October 5 and 9, immediately preceding the General Convention, there will be held in the City of Washington the Forty-second National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, to which all Churchmen, irrespective of Brotherhood membership, are invited. This gathering will be in the nature of a National Conference on Evangelism and the program is being planned in close cooperation with leaders of our National Commission on Evangelism. It is my earnest hope and prayer that many of you will use this opportunity to gain new inspiration and information for the effective discharge of our responsibilities in the spread of Christ's Kingdom on earth.

The principles of definite prayer and personal service for which the Brotherhood stands represent duties that are not peculiar to this organization but are incumbent upon all of us, and the function of the Brotherhood is to provide a method and plan for the practical fulfillment of these universal Christian obligations.

Consecration of life and mobilization of our forces for the task of evangelism is a present positive need of the Church. This need cannot be met by the efforts of the clergy alone: there must also be general cooperative enlistment and active endeavor of the laity. It is, therefore, my very positive conviction that there is a real work for the Brotherhood to accomplish in the Church at the present time, and I earnestly hope that Brotherhood members, deputies to General Convention, and Churchmen universally will avail themselves of the spiritual privileges afforded through attendance upon the Brotherhood Convention, and receive such inspiration as will prompt them to faithful, persevering endeavor for God and fellow man.

Faithfully yours,
(Signed)
John G. Murray,
Presiding Bishop.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

Whitsuntide Conference of Clergy.

Fourteen clergymen of the Episcopal Church attended the preaching conference at Mount St. Alban's, sponsored by the College of Preachers of Washington Cathedral, during the week of April 15. Among them were the Rev. J. Manly Cobb of Blacksburg, Va., the Rev. A. S. Lawrence of Chapel Hill, N. C., the Rev. William G. Gheri of Morgantown, W. Va., the Rev. Noble C. Powell of the University of Virginia, the Rev. Capers C. Satterlee of Clemson College, S. C., and others from East and West. The Rev. Leonard Hodgson of the faculty of the General Theological Seminary, New York, directed discussion, assisted by Bishop Rhinelander, warden of the College of Preachers.

The conference was concentrated on the preaching phases of the Ascension and the coming and work of the Holy Spirit. It was the Whitsuntide Conference, and was one of a series which have been held during the past six months that clergymen from many sections of the country might have opportunity to revitalize their ministry and to prepare adequately for preaching the message of the various Church seasons.

Established three years ago the College of Preachers had sponsored several important gatherings and soon will be located in a permanent building on Mount St. Alban's. A gift of $250,000 has been received for the structure, and it is planned to lay the cornerstone May 17. The college will not compete with theological seminaries, as its purpose is to provide post-graduate training and inspiration to ordained clergy.

Cornerstone for College of Preachers.

The cornerstone of the College of Preachers of Washington Cathedral will be laid with ceremonies on May 17, according to an announcement made by Bishop James E. Freeman at the spring meeting of the Washington Cathedral Committee held at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. John Hays Hammond.

Bishop Freeman declared that this has been the best year in the history of Washington Cathedral. Upward of $4,000,000 had been given by Washingtonians to the Cathedral project since it was started.

The Very Rev. G. C. F. Bratenahl, Dean of Washington, reported on the progress of the Cathedral and told details of its construction.

The principal address was made by former Senator George Wharton Pepper, of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the National Executive Committee of Washington Cathedral.

Senator Pepper said that the Cathedral was to be a spiritual powerhouse in the Capital of the Nation, an outlet for the spirit of service inherent in the American people. He said that the campaign for the Cathedral in Washington in 1923 had been the origin of all the recent development and progress and had made possible the rapid strides the Cathedral project was now making throughout the country.

Senator Pepper pointed out that the Cathedral authorities were trying to raise $6,800,000 within a period of two years from last autumn, which would make possible the carrying forward of the building program to that extent.

At the conclusion of the address Mrs. William C. Rives, chairman of the Washington Cathedral Committee, offered a resolution approving the plans of the Executive Committee of Washington Cathedral as set forth by Bishop Freeman, Dean Bratenahl and Senator Pepper which was carried unanimously.

The meeting was under the direction of the Executive Committee of the Washington Cathedral Committee which includes the Very Rev. G. C. F. Bratenahl, Mrs. Robert S. Chew, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Coleman Jennings, treasurer, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, George B. McClellan, Mrs. George Wharton Pepper, Dr. William C. Rives, Mrs. William C. Rives, Mrs. Walter Tuckerman and Mrs. William Holland Wilmer.

Resolution on the Passing of the Rev. J. H. W. Blake.

Washington, D. C., April 27, 1928.

We, the ladies of the Episcopal Church Home, have learned with grief of the passing of our much beloved Chaplain, the Rev. James H. W. Blake.

During the ministrations of his office at this Home his high character, faithfulness, and devotion were enjoyed and deeply appreciated by all.

Resolved, That while we humbly submit to the Divine Dispensation as the natural ending of this valuable life, we can but bow in sorrow at our loss of one whose sincerity, charity and ability were such that every one would do well to emulate, and use to the upbuilding of God's Kingdom on earth.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to his bereaved family, the secular press, and Church Periodicals.

Respectfully submitted by:

The Ladies of the Episcopal Church Home,

3315 Wisconsin Avenue, N. W.

An All-day Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held at La Plata for the Southern Archdeaconry of the Diocese of Washington on Friday, May 4. All auxiliary women in Washington were invited to attend.

The Laymen's Service Association of this diocese held a joint meeting with the Episcopal Young People's Society of the Church of the Ascension on May 4. The program was furnished entirely by the Young People's Society. Commander C. T. Jewell, President of the Laymen's Service Association, announces that the annual meeting of the Association has been set for May 16, and the pilgrimage to St. Peter's Church, Poolesville, Md., will be held June 10.

The last meeting of this season for the Diocesan Woman's Auxiliary was held on May 1, at Pinckney Memorial Church, Hyattsville. Holy Communion was celebrated at 10 A. M. After a box luncheon at noon, a business meeting was held, at which time important matters were taken care of, as there will be no other Diocesan meeting of the Auxiliary, until November 6. This will be after the meeting of the General Convention in Washington, to be held in October, 1928.

M. M. W.

Conventions.

The National Convention of the Daughters of the King will be held concurrently with the forty-second National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, at Washington, D. C., October 5 to 9, with three joint sessions. The National Commission on Evangelism will be represented on the program by the Rev. W. H. Milton, D. D., assistant to the Chairman, who will speak on "The Program of the National Commission on Evangelism" and by the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., who will give the closing address of the Convention on "The World Call to Evangelism".

Arrangements have been completed for an open-air mass meeting to be held at the amphitheatre, Mount St. Alban, on Sunday afternoon, October 7, as a part of the National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. The Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., will preside at the meeting and the Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, D. D., will give the blessing at the close. The Hon. George Wharton Pepper has accepted the invitation of the Brotherhood to address this gathering and it is expected that the Rt. Rev. Logan H. Roots, Bishop of Hankow, China, will be the other speaker.

Handsome New Church Building.

St. Stephen's Church, Washington City, is to have a new building, at the corner of Newton and Center Streets, with parish hall, in which will be accommodation for eight hundred to one thousand Sunday-school pupils and teachers. The church will seat nine hundred and fifty persons. The buildings will cost $220,000 and, it is hoped, will be ready for occupancy by next Christmas Day. The present church building, on Fourteenth Street, has been sold and will be torn down and replaced by an apartment house. Several years ago the congregation of the Church of the Incarnation, in a section overrun by business developments, was absorbed with the St. Stephen's congregation. One chapel of the new church will be called the Chapel of the Incarnation and much of the furnishing of the abandoned Church of the Incarnation will be used in it.

Toc H.

An impressive service was held in Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, on Wednesday, April 25, at 8:15 P. M., when a Service of Light was the occasion of the Rededication to their Task of the Members of the Washington Branch of Toc H. A special ritual very beautifully planned was used. That which was most impressive was the Ceremony of Light and the Rededication of the Branch. With all other lights out, the founder of the Branch lit the Lamp of Maintenance and in turn each member's taper was lit, and the questions and answers provided in the Ceremony of Light were used. Toc H hymns were sung by the Cathedral choir. Bishop Freeman gave a short welcoming address. Canon Anson Phelps Stokes gave the principal address of the occasion.

Daughters of the King.

The Thirty-second Annual Council of the Daughters of the King of the Diocese of Washington was held in Christ Church, Southeast, on April 26. The morning hours were taken for a quiet hour, a celebration of the Holy Communion and prayers for missions, and after luncheon, a brief memorial service and business session were held. The Bishop of the Diocese delivered an address. The Communion was celebrated by the Rev. Calvert E. Buck, rector of the church.

Girls' Friendly.

The spring conference of the Girls' Friendly Society in America was held at the Washington National Center, April 16, 17 and 18. The program included interesting speakers from out of town and subjects were of wide and varying interests. At the conclusion of the Conference, pilgrimages were made to Mount Vernon, and the Washington Holiday House of the Girls' Friendly Society.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Diocesan Brotherhood of St. Andrew, recently held the second in its series of inspirational meetings at St. Thomas' Church, when the address was made by the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware. The first meeting of this series was held at the Diocesan House, when Bishop Freeman addressed the gathering. These meetings are being held as a means of inspiration and preparation for the annual meeting of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew to convene in Washington in October, 1928.

The Rev. A. McCallum, rector of St. Paul's Church, was recently appointed to represent the Diocese of Washington at the meeting of the Commission on Religious Education of the Province of Washington, taking the place of Dr. W. L. DeVries, who was unable to attend on account of illness. Mr. McCallum's appointment was made by the Diocesan Department of Religious Education at a recent meeting. This spring meeting of the Provincial Commission to which Mr. McCallum has been appointed was held at Virginia Theological Seminary during the week of April 22, and was presided over by the Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, Bishop Coadjutor of West Virginia.

Mission of "The Abundant Life".

A healing Mission, conducted by the Rev. Robert B. H. Bell, of St. Thomas' Church, Denver, Col., and ably assisted by his capable wife, was held recently in Norfolk.

The mission started the Tuesday after Easter at St. Luke's (the Rev. David W. Howard, D. D., rector), and was quietly advertised by a group of people of the Society of the Nazarene. It was styled "A Mission of the Abundant Life".

The schedule of meetings were: 10 A. M., Holy Communion; 10:45 A. M., Lecture by Mrs. Bell on diatetics—Care of the Body; 4 P. M., Mr. Bell lectured on Body and Mind, placing the emphasis on developing the body through understanding its needs; 8 P. M., he preached, emphasizing the spiritual side of life, but always keeping the body and mind in proper place in the triangle of life.

All of these lectures were rational, scientific, illuminating and inspiring. Both Mr. and Mrs. Bell have equipped themselves in a wonderful way, and were a perpetual visible illustration of the attractiveness and power of lives developed equally in body, mind and spirit, and joyful in their hourly expression of "The Abundant Life". It was a ceaseless pleasure to hear them as they spoke from the platform, or as they talked with individuals. The radiance of life always surrounded them, and servants and strangers incidentally met outside of the mission, were markedly attracted.

The mission developed in a remarkable way. Starting with only a handful of people, since there was practically no public advertising, it grew by its own right to grow. By the end of the five days at St. Luke's, congregations had increased until the last service filled the church. In the meantime, Ascension Church, seeing the effects of this "Teaching, Preaching and Encouragement", gladly accepted Mr. Bell's offer to give his three days of rest, left between this and his next appointment—Harrisburg, Pa.—to the same work with them.

The notice was given out Sunday morning at Ascension and no other advertising, except by word of mouth. Monday began the demonstration which has lifted us to wonderful heights.

No one had dreamed that "religion" could mean so much common joy and fascinating experience, as life was cared for all around—soul, mind and body equally—just as Christ cared for his. Young (little children also), middle aged and old—sick and distressed—discouraged and despondent—sinners and "righteous", all responded to "glad tidings of great joy", as the angels knew it would be when they sang on that first Christmas morning.

One interesting bit of outside work was a talk by Dr. Bell to five hundred school children—assembled in their auditorium to hear "another man talk"—bored through and through as usual at the drab prospect of "listening" to another preacher. After half an hour's talk there were five hundred sparkling eyed, enthusiastic, shouting, radiant children, enthusiastically giving their promise to "go after that kind of a life".

Then the healing phase was a demonstration of Christ's promise to "Those who believe in my name". Calm, quiet, powerful were the moments when scores kneeled at the altar for life's healing, and received it. It was just as though Jesus Himself stood there and said, "Go in peace, thy faith hath saved thee". (For myself I saw and heard Him.) There were visits to the bedridden sick, the same healer present, and his blessing of renewed life never failed to appear.

At the closing meeting Wednesday night, every available spot was occupied, a spirit of quiet but enthusiastic joy held every one.

Sixty men and women promised to meet weekly as a "Society of the Abundant Life", to demonstrate the promise, "Greater works shall ye do than these" for "I am with you always", to win the Abundant Life and to help others find it also.

Memorials.

On Easter Day, at Christ Church, Bloomfield and Glen Ridge, six memorial windows were dedicated. The windows are in two groups of three, one on each side of the Nave. The group on the south side represents the Baptism of our Lord. These were provided for in the will of the late Talbot Root and are given in loving memory of his wife, Marie Antoinette Edeloni, George Metcalf Root and Anna VanDuser Root. The windows on the north side represent the Resurrection, Ascension and the Descent of the Holy Spirit. These are in loving memory of Samuel Worthington, Robert A. Fielding, Mabel F. Fielding, Emelia B. Hendrickson and Emma Lund Kirby. The windows were made by Gorham and are of antique glass.

Bishop Lines' Memorial.

With more than one-third of the total sum to be subscribed already raised, the drive among the Episcopalians of the Diocese of Newark to establish a $1,000,000 endowment in memory of the late Bishop Edwin Stevens Lines, is speeding towards success.

The 50,000 members of this church throughout Northern New Jersey apparently are aroused over the crisis facing the religious organizations in this area, and are digging into their pockets to finance a program of expansion to meet it. The rapid emigration of new population from New York City into New Jersey via the Holland Tunnel, recently completed, and the new Hudson River Bridge, now being built, is forcing the churches to adapt themselves to changed conditions or else lose the ground previously won. Social and population experts have pointed out the evolution going on, and have warned the Church people to build now for a coming generation vastly larger than most of them foresee at present.

It is to pay for a program of local missionary expansion, and for the permanent endowment of the episcopate, that the Episcopalians of this diocese are engaged in raising $1,000,000 And because Bishop Lines, during his twenty-four years' service to the people of this state, perceived first the radical changes the future would bring, and repeatedly warned his parishioners against them, the fund is being subscribed as a permanent memorial to him.

The campaign started April 26. The first reports of the sums raised were received at dinners throughout the diocese April 30, when a grand total was announced of $334,945.

The announcement of the final sum raised will be made at a banquet May 8, here in Newark, on the opening day of the annual diocesan convention.

United Thank Offering.

Upwards of two thousand women representing the more than two hundred parishes and missions of the Episcopal Church in Philadelphia and vicinity participated in the annual diocesan presentation of the United Thank Offering in the Church of the Saviour, West Philadelphia.

The United Thank Offering represents the free-will gifts of women of the Episcopal Church for the support of women workers in the mission fields. In every diocese of the Episcopal Church throughout the three years of each Triennium there is held each year a diocesan presentation service, culminating in a national presentation service at the General Convention. Upwards of $913,000 was presented by the women of the whole Church at the last General Convention three years ago, of which the women of the Church in Philadelphia and other parts of the Diocese of Pennsylvania gave more than $86,000.

This presentation was the last prior to the General Convention, which meets in Washington next October. Bishop Garland was the celebrant at the service of Holy Communion on Friday morning at the Church of the Saviour and Bishop Overs, former Bishop of Liberia, was the preacher.

MOTHER.

Mary Davis Reed.

Your sweet smile always brought a quiet gladness
Like golden sunbeams coming after rain;
And sent on flying wings each hint of sadness,
Until content and peace were mine again.

With kind words, you encouraged each new yearning,
Each fresh arrival of a great desire;
You understood when, with ambition burning,
To some far lofty goal I would aspire.

Your gentle touch e'er brought a balm of healing
When bitter suffering claimed from me its toll;
Then rest came, like a benediction stealing
To calm the troubled billows of my soul.

Your loving tones have e'er to me been calling
Across the distance of the changing years;
Like twilight's cooling shadows softly falling,
They soothe and comfort me, and dry my tears.

I know your prayers, with mother love, are bringing Me nearer to the realms of endless day;
If my steps falter, let your dear touch clinging
As in childhood, help me along the way.

Mother to 132,366 Orphans.

Charles V. Vickrey.

She was only forty-three years of age, but the last ten years of her life were worth more to the world than centuries as life is lived by many on the more favored boulevards of opulence and opportunity.

Her heritage was poverty. Her preparations was through paths of perseverance. Her education was in the university of adversity. Her equipment consisted of handicaps.

After a period of care-free and happy married life, she suddenly found herself without financial resources and the sole support of a hopelessly invalided husband, a paralyzed mother and two children.

While facing the problem of earning a livelihood for those dependent upon her a cablegram came from the American Ambassador in Turkey announcing that the Christian population of that country was facing starvation and death. A committee was formed for the purpose of receiving and transmitting help to the stricken peoples, and she offered her services at a salary much less than her ability might have commanded elsewhere. With the same spirit of self-sacrifice that sent relief workers abroad to minister to the stricken, diseased peoples, she devoted herself to the details of the work of the office.

Knowing that life depended upon getting the facts and the appeal before the public, she gave cheerfully long hours of overtime work. Office closing hours and holidays meant nothing to her when there was life to be saved. She had no money to give—but she gave her splendid service and gave it in full-measure.

Through all the terrible years of the Great War—which continued for five years in the Near East after peace had come to the rest of the world she read the cablegrams and letters from relief workers and missionaries in Trebizond, Sansoum, Mersine, Constantinople and other ports where the Christian population of Asia Minor had gathered, and she knew that upon her and those whose work she directed rested the responsibility for transmitting these appeals with promptness and efficiency, to those who could, by their gifts, mitigate such suffering. Her work was never done mechanically. It was ever prompted by the keenest sympathy for those whose cause she served.

Saturday, May 13, 1916, was a specially proclaimed holiday in New York City. From the office in the Metropolitan Building, she turned occasionally from her work to look down upon the 125,000 men and women who were marching in the great "Preparedness Parade". She knew that more innocent non-combatants, men, women and children, had perished during the preceding days in the Near East than there were marchers in that great, possibly unprecedented, parade, and that at least twice as many more, chiefly women and children, were at that moment homeless, penniless, comfortless in refugee camps, absolutely dependent upon America. She knew that, even as the bands played and banners waved, women and little children in the Near East were dying of hunger. She knew that for her and her associates to take a legal holiday, that Saturday, would mean a delay of forty-eight hours in securing the funds upon which depended the lives of many. She did, therefore, what she would wish others to do under reversed conditions. She applied—she practiced—the Golden Rule.

Following the solution of the major refugee problems, she knew that there were tens of thousands of orphans who were not only without fathers, mothers, or responsible relatives, but were also without country. Most of them were under the "teen" age. They were absolutely dependent upon continued aid The immediate ravages of starvation had been checked but would begin again with these innocent orphaned children if the stream of food and benevolence ceased. What if her own children were among the number? She continued to apply—to practice—to live—the Golden Rule.

Then her robust health began to fail. Physicians seemed unable to cope with the trouble. Perhaps she could have lingered longer had she not, through the past decade, drawn so heavily upon her reserve strength. But until the end she continued to think, plan, and pray for the children overseas whom she had never seen, but for whose life and happiness she had given her service with such abandon.

Did it pay? As to the worth-whileness of the investment there will be no doubt in the minds of any who have mingled with the more than a million people who are living today because she and others were Christian in deeds as well as in creeds. More than 100,000 orphan children, rescued from the streets and from disease, have been restored to health and "graduated" from Near East Relief orphanages. They are rapidly winning their way to positions of increasing usefulness to the world.

Remembering, however, the 32,000 children still in need of support and guidance in preparation for life's battles, she asked that the money which some might wish to spend for flowers for her be sent to help the orphans, whom she affectionately called "her children".

When the end came, her girls in the office, with other friends, decided to make a floral offering that would endure. A modest sum provided a simple wreath for her casket and the remainder, amounting to approximately $1,000, was set aside as the beginning of the Amelia B. Horton Scholarship fund for the children through whose lives she, "being dead, yet speaketh".

The Power to Become.

The coming of Easter and the springtime is a most auspicious season in which to proclaim the "power to become" which Jesus Christ gives to men and women. It was the central and supreme thought of his mission, and it should be the superlative note in every evangelistic message. Yet this transcendent truth has dropped almost completely out of much of the Christian preaching and teaching of today. Men are told about the ethics of Jesus, the beautiful character of Jesus, the love and tenderness of Jesus, the brotherhood of Jesus—most of which they already know and in which they already believe. But what they do not know, and of which they have no gripping conviction, is the fact that He can give them power to rise above their old selves and become new creatures in Him. Just as the returning sun of springtime awakens this old earth to life, just as it gives to the seeds and bulbs both the desire and the power to come up out of the dark earth into newness of life, so Jesus Christ enables men and women to become something different and better than otherwise they could be and human society to become something different and better than otherwise it could be. This it is of which men and women need to be more deeply convicted.

The whole modern emphasis is in the other direction. We talk of the ideals and ethics of Jesus as though all that men and nations needed was to know and understand them. We talk of the beautiful spirit and example of Jesus as though all that men and nations needed was to behold and desire them. But already most of us know infinitely better than we do. Human nature of itself is a most frail and unsatisfactory thing; and no amount of theorizing or philosophizing about how large is the divine element within us, congenitally and naturally within us, will suffice to make any man other than very human indeed until he consciously and deliberately receives the God-element into his being. And the supreme function and mission of Jesus Christ is to put that God-element there.

No natural processes ever have or ever will evolve that which Jesus Christ puts into the human heart and life. We may elevate human nature all we will, we may deny the mystical and spiritual element in the universe, we may extol naturalism or humanism or what we will—yet it remains eternally true that men and women are very conscious of their own limitations and of the dire need of something outside of their own selves to lift them and to draw them into that which they should become. And this it is which Jesus Christ does. There is nothing more foundational and vital in His entire gospel than that which John is driving at when he declares: "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God". There is no other one fact of which mankind needs to be more deeply and more surely convinced than that, nor of which it is waiting more hungrily and anxiously to be fully and experimentally persuaded.—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

Reasons For Rejoicing.

"Nine times out of ten Billy bangs the door when he goes out," complained Mrs. Roe to Aunt Meliss.

"Have you asked him to be quest in closing the door?" inquired Auntie.

"Have I?" Mrs. Roe was emphatically indignant. "Why, I tell him every single time he bangs it."

"Did you say anything the one time that he closed it silently?" continued Aunt Meliss.

"Of course not," confessed Mrs. Roe, still on the defensive, and assuming that her little son alone was at fault.

Aunt Meliss shook her head doubtfully. "You haven't learned to search out reasons for rejoicing," she said. "Even in Billy's boisterous behavior you will always find something commendable or favorable upon which you may base encouragement."

If every family could have an Aunt Meliss to drop a bit of kindly suggestion as to ways and means of guiding a husky, normal six-year-old boy, what a blessing it might prove. Aunt Meliss radiates a quieting atmosphere. She is conscious of the noisy and disturbing elements as much as Mother, but she observes and comments on the correct motives and acts. Billy will close the door quietly as many times as possible just to hear Aunt Meliss say with her beaming smile, "There, that was grand! You remembered again!"

Just a few of those "quiet closing" and the act becomes a courtesy that is habitually observed by vigorous Billy.

This business of child-training with its necessary disciplinary adjustments needs to be supported as often as possible by reasons for rejoicing. Sometimes we may have to look for them rather diligently, even feeling at times, perhaps, the need of a mental microscope or a field glass to magnify and reveal them, but the search always has its reward. How inspiring it would be both for mother and child if all reasons for rejoicing could be written in capital letters on the memory while the less pleasant things were recorded lightly. We need to stop shouting about mistakes and substitute songs of joy.

Mothers need to get away from fussiness and nagging and from detail discipline. We should all be happier and likewise more successful guides in character-building if we measured conduct by broad principles rather than by petty individual acts of impetuous words. With regard to child life our vision must be righteous and fair. We shall then find ourselves stressing the good, the true and the fine, and under this emphasis the undesirable will disappear.

"Buddy had clean hands at meals three times yesterday," Mother said to Daddy. Not a word about the grim little fists that had just presented themselves at table from a hurried outdoor game.

"Please excuse me a moment," came from Buddy after a quiet thoughtful pause, as he rose and left the table. He was back in five minutes scrubbed and carefully groomed.

Thus it is that every reason for rejoicing creates a new cause for joy if properly noted and encouraged.—Edith L. Reid.

THE PRICE.

Maria G. Neville.

"And they took the thirty pieces of silver and bought with them the Potters' Field, to bury strangers in."

Thy precious blood, O Spotless Lamb, hast paid the price,
For home and shelter for the poor lost ones of earth:
Friendless, and homeless, strangers, without a name,
No loved ones come to claim their worn-out frame,
Or state their birth.
Alas! no room for them on earth!
But Thou, who had'st no place to lay Thy weary Head,
Hast paid the price, that their poor dust,
A resting place might claim,
Their souls, O Risen Lord, through Thy dear Name,
Find rest, and peace with Thee in Paradise
And Home forevermore in Heaven.

New Visions.

The promise of the guiding power of the Holy Spirit given by our Lord before His Ascension, makes it evident that He was preparing His Church for progressive revelation. Here is unfolded though not yet understood, the method whereby God determined to make known His eternal purpose for the world. We are living in days of progressive thought, and for us this promise of the guiding power of the Spirit has singular significance. The words, "Ye cannot bear them now", ring through the centuries with solemn warning as pioneers in scientific, social and religious development have in their time been scorned, silenced and slain. Each generation has deplored the blindness of its predecessors and yet has failed to open its own eyes to new revelation. Yet we are being led to see that in our own time the thoughts of men are moving onwards and upwards. The Church no longer fears the progress of science, but rather welcomes all scientific discovery as revelation of the truth of God. Social progress in like manner is encouraging us to see in modern movements God's progressive revelation. Reform in our social system no longer suggests the rumbling of the thunder of revolution, as the leaders of men and nation! Here is the human spirit under Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. As in scientific and social progress God is revealing His truth, how much more is this so in religious evolution! Here is th ehuman spirit under the guidance of the Divine Spirit is seeking and finding new interpretations of experience, which are giving us new visions of the character and purpose of God.—Selected.

The Real Authority.

Has the Church lost its authority? Yes, if you mean the authority assumed by Hildebrande, Calvin, Henry VIII, the persecutors of the Christians at Rome, of the Quakers in New England, and that weilded by various ecclesiastical bodies in every age. When and where did Christ sanction or practice or confer any such use of force to "defend the faith"?

He did hold a "church trial" for Peter at the seashore one never-to-be-forgotten morning. But what a tender, sympathetic confession and restoration! "Peter, do you love me?" Thrice He put that yearning, penetrating, meaningful question, and thrice did Peter pledge his love. "Peter was grieved"—but the festering sore in his heart was lanced and healed by the Great Physician! Never, almost never, have we practiced the Master's method or manifested His spirit in similar circumstances. Authority! What authority does the Church wish, or need that is not contained in those great words, duty, conscience, love, or in those greater words, Fatherhood and brotherhood? Jesus said, "Ye shall receive power"—but what kind of power? "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw (not drive) all men unto me"—the love compelling power of Christ! There is nothing more powerful than love that is willing to sacrifice to fulfill its purpose. Love is stronger than brute force. Oh, that the Church today would test and prove that finer, nobler, and mightier kind of authority!—Rev. Claude Allen McKay, in The Congregationalist.

A Prayer for the Unnoticed.

We thank Thee, Lord, for the brotherhood of all who are named with the name of Christ. Whether we live or die, let us have part in that great communion. Open our eyes to see unnoticed saints and to discover signs of the coming of Thy Kingdom in unaccustomed places. Give us a quick apprehension for all saintly qualities. And help us by the guidance of Thy Holy Spirit to grow more and more like Thee. Provide for each his special work and if no man praise us, help us to do our part as in Thy presence, in remembrance of Thy loving kindness and in the joy of love to Thee. And let no one of Thy hidden saints lack heart's assurance of Thy favor. And this we ask of Thee in remembrance of Christ who for our sakes made Himself of no reputation. Amen.—Isaac Ogden Rankin.

In spiritual things two are more than one. Two pulling together at a load can accomplish a hundred times as much as two pulling in different directions.—W. S. Danley.

MOTHER.

Prayer for Her Birthday or Any Day

Lord Jesus, Thou hast known
A mother's love and tender care,
And Thou wilt hear, while for my own
Mother most dear I make this birthday prayer.

Protect her life, I pray,
Who gave the gift of life to me;
And may she know, from day to day,
The deepening glow of Life that comes from Thee.

As once upon her breast
Fearless and well content I lay,
So let her heart on Thee at rest,
Feel fears depart and troubles fade away.

Her every wish fulfill;
And even if Thou must refuse
In everything, let Thy wise will
A comfort bring such as kind mothers use.

Ah, hold her by the hand,
As once her hand held mine;
And though she may not understand
Life's winding ways, lead her in peace divine.

I cannot pay my debt
For all the love that she has given;
But Thou, love's Lord, wilt not forget,
Her due reward—Bless her in earth and heaven.

—Henry Van Dyke.

Good Fruit.

This year towards the end of June as I was sitting at my desk preparing my cards for the opening day of school, a young girl came and stood by my desk and waited to speak to me. When I had finished the work in hand, she said, "Amma (madam), I cannot return to school this year. My father died at Christmas time and my mother is only a coolie woman earning about three annas a day. I do not have the money to pay the fees you ask." I looked at her for a time. She was a tall girl, almost too tall to be studying in our fifth standard. but then many of these children have no chance to attend school in the village. The village schools are poor, the attendance is irregular, and the teaching, if it can be called such, does very little to prepare for our school here. Consequently when they come to us later, they are too large for their classes. This girl was such an one. She must have been fourteen or fifteen years of age and the only teaching she had had was what she received since coming to Guntur. She was unprepossessing, large, ungainly, and not overly bright; in fact, she had failed fifth standard last year and would have to repeat that grade if she returned at the opening of this school year. But she was the daughter of a coolie woman with generations of illiteracy back of her. Something about the child touched my heart. Perhaps it was her utter helplessness. At any rate, the least I could do for her, I thought, would be to give her a chance to return to school. She seemed so eager and yet without hope.

"Your village," I asked, "how far is it from here?"

"Sixteen miles," she said, and gave me the name of the village and added, "my mother has come with me. She is outside". I arose and went to the door, and there, sitting by the side of the veranda, was a woman with the saddest face I had ever seen. Suffering, poverty, hardship were written all over her body. She arose when she saw me and waited for me to speak.

"Your daughter," I said, "will she not return to school this year?"

"What can I do? My husband is dead and I must support my family."

"How many children have you?" I asked.

"Three," she said, "two boys and this girl."

"And your boys! How old are they?"

"One is five and the other seven," she replied.

She was a coolie woman without doubt. She spoke the corrupt, vulgar Telugu of the village, and wore the clothes of a menial laborer. She wore no jewels, which bespoke her extreme poverty, for jewels—bracelets, anklets, earrings, nosepieces, are a woman's crowning glory in this country. If there is any money they have at least one of these to adorn the body. But there was none and so I knew the woman was poor, and a widow, which is worse, for a widow's life is a wretched thing in India. It is a life of sin, degradation, slavery. I was deeply moved and said to her, "I need a gatewoman for my compound. Would you like to live here and do this work for me? I will give you food and clothing for yourself and your children and I will put all three in school". This was big wages, I knew, for ordinarily coolies get only seven or eight rupees ($2.50) a month and that is insufficient for even their food, much less their clothes. She looked at me so stupidly at first that I thought she didn't understand; but I learned later that she had had insufficient food for some time and that she couldn't believe her ears that I would give her food and clothing if she did this work for me. Her face showed no emotion and she merely said, "I will come on the day you say, July 1".

True to her word she came that evening after traveling all day in the hot sun on foot and offered herself for the position of gatekeeper of my compound. I put the three children in school. She does her work very faithfully, in fact, she is the best gatewoman I have ever had. Her two darling little boys are in the kindergarten here and show much promise.

One day as I was walking toward her I found her sitting near a tree singing lustily songs of praise in thanksgiving to God. Her face had lost its tragic look and in its place had come peace and restfulness. The song reechoed in my heart and I turned away breathing a prayer of thankfulness that I had sown seed on good ground and that it had grown and brought forth good fruit.
—Edith Eykamp, Missionary in India.

Cyrus Goes To Meet Mother.

Mr. Westover, the manager of the Motor Transportation Company, wheeled about abruptly in his chair as a boy came in and stood by his side.

"Well, Cyrus," he said not unkindly, "what is it?" Cyrus twirled his cap. He was a lad with clear eyes and a frank, boyish smile; yet, young as he was, he was one of the company's best men.

"It's this way, Mr. Westover," he said slowly. "You see mother, she's been away on a visit for three months, and this morning she's coming home, and I wondered if you'd let me off for just an hour. I'd like to meet that train." He paused. "It's been pretty lonesome with her away so long," he went on. "My sister Mabel kept house; but say, Mr. Westover, if you've got a mother, you know just how it feels to go home and not find her there. And then, the meals. My sister cooks well enough; but oh! I'd rather just eat plain bread and butter that mother put on the table than a meal anybody else could get. And so I wondered if you'd let me off long enough to meet that train."

The manager of the Motor Transportation Company was looking at the boy but was not seeing him. He was reviewing memory pictures of that time long ago when he was a boy, and in these pictures he was seeing his mother with her sweet smile and brown hair and soft blue eyes, and he was saying, as he flung his cap aside: "Is dinner ready, mother? I'm as hungry as a bear."

And she had smiled as she patted the rough hand. "Yes, it's ready, and I've a surprise for you, son. No, I'm not going to tell you. Run and wash your hands and you'll soon know."

And how good the surprise had tasted that had turned out to be a cherry pie! And how she had smiled at him as she passed him a piece in one of those blue-and-gold china plates! And on Saturday, how he used to enjoy the doughnuts she had made him! Mother! How patient she had been with his rough noisy ways! How tenderly she had tucked him in at night! How happy she had made those early boyhood days! Mother—ah, the sweetness of that name!

"Cyrus," he said, somewhat gruffly to hide his emotion, "take my new electric to the station, and drive your mother home in it. Take all the time you want. I had a good mother myself!"—Selected.

The Best-Mannered Girl.

Hazel Ward raised troubled eyes from the letter she had been reading.

"I hope you haven't bad news, dear," her grandmother remarked solicitously.

"No, Granny," and Hazel tried to smile. "Not bad news at all. In fact, some girls whom I know would give a great deal to have such a letter."

"Then why such a woeful face, childie?"

"I'll tell you," Hazel answered, coming to sit in her favorite low chair beside Granny's big rocker. "Last summer the Fosters cousin, Marjorie Winton, came to visit them. You know, I'm always with the Fosters, and I grew to know Marjorie well, and liked her immensely. We've corresponded ever since she went home to New York, and she has spoken several times of having Rose Foster and me down there for a visit. Now that she knows I am so near the city, she has written insisting that I come to her for a little while before I go back to Maine."

"I should think," Grandmother Ward said briskly, "that would be an excellent arrangement."

"Ye—es," Hazel acknowledged. "It would be, of course, but you see, Granny, Marjorie's father is a millionaire, and she lives in a very fashionable way."

"What difference does that make?" and Grandmother clicked her knitting-needles briskly.

"Well, you know," Hazel explained, flushing. "I'm just a little country girl. I'm afraid I shouldn't make a good appearance among such people."

Mrs. Ward stopped knitting and looked over her glasses at her granddaughter.

"I'm sure your clothes are very pretty and suitable, dear," she said. "That blue taffeta you have on is tasteful and becoming and your suit is in good style."

"It isn't clothes," Hazel sighed. "It's manners."

"I hope my granddaughter's manners are as good as anybody's," and Mrs. Ward straightened herself proudly.

"Perhaps I shouldn't have put it that way," Hazel hastened to appease her. "It's knowledge of the little social usages I lack—which fork to use for fish, how to talk to strangers, and that sort of thing. I know I'd make a perfect goose of myself in such a house. I just can't go, that's all."

"But you like Marjorie Winton?" "She's one of the sweetest girls I've ever known, and really, Granny, down on the farm she seemed just like common folks."

"H'm!" Mrs. Ward said thoughtfully. "I shouldn't wonder if you found her just the same in New York. I should certainly accept her invitation, Hazel."

"And appear like a—a greenie!" Hazel protested. "Oh, Grandmother."

"You will appear well if you follow a suggestion I shall give you," Grandmother stated tersely. "Just hand me my Bible, please, dear."

Hazel brought the Bible and Mrs. Ward turned the pages rapidly. At the thirteenth chapter of 1 Corinthians she paused.

" 'Love suffereth long, and is kind,' " she read aloud. "Love envieth not, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly.' There my dear! You see, I have Bible authority behind me when I tell you that if you carry a loving heart with you to New York you will not behave improperly."

"I never thought of that verse in that way," Hazel meditated.

Mrs. Ward picked up from the table at her elbow a second volume.

"Here is something Henry Drummond says on the same subject," she went on. "Love cannot behave itself unseemly. You can put the most untutored persons in the highest society, and if they have a reservoir of love in the heart, they simply cannot behave themselves unseemly. They simply cannot do it."

Hazel sat for a while in deep thought.

"I suppose you and the Bible and Drummond are right, Granny," she said at last. "I'll write Marjorie today and tell her expect me next week."

The Winton's home was even more elegant than Hazel had expected, one of the most splendid in the great rich city in fact, and of course quite different from the farm-house where the little Maine girl had grown up, different even from Grandmother Ward's dignified old house in the Massachusetts college town.

The furnishings were luxurious, fine pictures and beautifully bound books were everywhere, and soft-footed servants relieved Hazel of her wraps, unpacked and put away her belongings and anticipated her every want.

Marjorie enjoyed her guest's delight in the dainty pink and silver room assigned to her.

"I remembered you like pink," she said. "And I'm right next door, dear, so you will not be lonely."

"Granny was right," Hazel decided, as she turned about to allow a becapped maid to button her white voile frock. "Marjorie is exactly the same darling girl who visited in Maine last summer."

But once at the stately dinner table, lighted by shaded candles and decked with pink roses, her misgivings returned.

"I know I'll use the wrong fork," she groaned secretly, looking with anxious eyes at the array of silver on either side of her plate.

She was seated between Marjorie's father and a tiny, pink-cheeked old lady whom everybody called "Aunt Peace".

"I wish I might have been next Marjorie," she sighed.

And then, suddenly, she forgot the shining forks and spoons. Marjorie and her mother were talking gayly together, and little Aunt Peace was watching them with a wistfulness which was pathetic.

"I'm very deaf," she explained, turning to Hazel and displaying a small telephone which lay on her lap. "I know Marjorie's telling an amusing story, but I can't hear a word of it. I can't hear any of the table talk. I feel," and her lip quivered a little, "rather lonely sometimes."

Hazel smiled at her and took up the little telephone.

"I'd love to talk to you," she murmured into it.

"But, my dear, it's a great deal of troubles, even with the instrument," the little lady protested.

"It won't seem a trouble to me," Hazel assured her. "You see, you remind me of my dear little Granny."

Hazel never knew exactly how the rest of the dinner passed off. She tried to use the same spoons and forks which Aunt Peace selected, but she was so busy enjoying the interesting conversation of the assembled Wintons and trying to pass a part of it on to her small neighbor, that she did not have time to worry much over them.

There was a hard moment a little later in the library when Marjorie asked her to sing for the family. She knew her voice was clear and sweet, but it was untrained, and she feared the simple songs which pleased her Maine friends might not appeal to a city audience. For a second she hesitated.

"But Marjorie really wants you to sing," she told herself. "She wouldn't ask you if she didn't. Do it for her sake."

And, without further protest, she went to the piano.

When the little program of sweet old ballads, gay college songs, and grand old hymns was over, Mr. Winton came to Hazel's side.

"I've not heard some of those things for thirty years, my dear," he said. "They've made me feel young again. You'll sing for me often while you're here, I hope."

"I knew Daddy would love your music," Marjorie exulted.

The happy days, filled with concerts, shopping tours and impressive church services, sped by and Hazel's fortnight was over far too soon. As she stood looking about the pink and silver room for the last time Marjorie came in, dressed to accompany her to the station.

"I've had a glorious two weeks, dear," Hazel declared happily.

"And so have I," Marjorie asserted, throwing her arms about her friend, "and so have all the Wintons. I knew they'd love you, but honestly, Hazel, I wasn't quite prepared to hear Aunt Peace say what she did just now."

"I hope it wasn't anything very bad," Hazel remarked, dimpling.

"She said," Marjorie smiled, "Hazel Ward is the best bred girl who ever visited in this house."

"Oh!" breathed Hazel, wide-eyed.

"I thought so myself," Marjorie went on, "but Aunt Peace is very fussy. I never can satisfy her, however hard I try, and I was surprised to hear her praise any one like that. 'How,' I asked, do you suppose Hazel managers to be so charming?' 'She has a loving heart,' Aunt Peace said softly. Oh, Hazel, darling! That's the secret. I understand now."

As the Boston Express bore Hazel swiftly away from New York the verse from Corinthians rang constantly in her ears.

"Love doth not behave itself unseemly," she repeated. "Of course it doesn't. Drummond is right. It can't."

GOD'S WAY.

I'm glad God made the sky so blue.
He might have used some other shade
And made it green or pink or red.
But I'm glad He made it blue;
For blue means true,
Like God's dear love to me and you.

I'm glad God made the flowers so fair.
He might have found some other way
For saving seeds than blossoms gay.
But I am glad He made them fair,
For bright and fair
Is like God's kind and tender care!

My mother says that she is glad
God made the little children, too,
The boys and girls like me and you.
She says it would be very sad
And very bad
Without the children gay and glad.

So let's be glad along the way
About our Father's tender care
And power to make things bright and fair.
Let's try in all we do and say
To make each day
A happy day, for that's God's way!

THE KINGDOM OF YOUTH.

When Tony Came to America.

The Calcatina family was a large one. Besides Father and Mother Calcatina there were six boys and girls. Tony was the eldest, then came Angelina, then Dominick, then Francesca, then Lisa, and last of all Paulina, the dear little brown-eyed baby sister.

In the part of Italy where they lived, there seemed to be no room for large families. There was very little food, and very little money, too. The Calcatinas were very, very poor.

The father had been ill and had lost his work. Now that he was well again, he could find no work to do. The Tony worked, too, while Francesca and Dominick helped by taking care of Lisa and baby Paulina.

One day Father Calcatina came home with a letter. "Come, listen to the news," he said. Then he read the letter, which was from his brother Logiano in America.

In the letter Uncle Logiano said that he had more work than he could do, so if his brother would come to America, he would find work for him. Then he could earn enough money in a year to bring his family over to America. Uncle Logiano would lend him money for his ticket.

Tony and his brothers and sisters were so excited that they could scarcely eat their dinner of spaghetti. They all talked at once and asked many questions. "Oh, when shall we go, Father?" "Will the ship be a great big one?" "What is America like?" "Can't I go now?"

"You must all stay and help your mother," said their father. "She will need you more than ever when I am in America."

That night when the children were asleep their father answered Uncle Logiano's letter, and said that he would sail for America just as soon as he received the money for his ticket.

When Uncle Logiano's next letter came, with the money for the ticket, the children said good-bye to their father and promised to help their mother all they could until he sent for them.

"But send soon," they all begged.

It was a long, hard year for the Calcatinas, and hardest of all for the mother. But Tony and his brothers and sisters were good and helpful, and at last came their father's letter saying that they were to take the next steamer for America.

"America is a good place," the letter said in Italian, "but this American language—it is so strange, not nearly so beautiful as our Italian, and the people talk so fast that I cannot understand. The men who have children learn more quickly, for their children go to school. Tony, you must learn, and help me. Then I shall be proud."

Tony was troubled when he read that part of the letter. How was he to learn the American language? Had not his father said that the Americans talked so very fast? What should he do? The people in the village only looked puzzled when he asked them to teach him. Even the priest shook his head gravely and said that the only American words he had heard were "New York". Tony already knew these words—they stood for the place in which his father lived—so he was no better off than before.

When the day of sailing came, the Calcatinas said good-bye to all their friends, and then, carrying great bundles of clothing on their heads, they climbed into the big ship and started for America.

Tony thought that it took a very long time to get to America. All the days were just alike, and there were so many of them that it seemed as if the ship would keep on forever and never reach the land at all.

The day before the ship reached America, Tony was feeling just a little homesick when he heard strange sounds beside him. Two boys were talking. Their speech was very odd and he could not understand them. Yet they were Italian boys, he thought, and a moment later he was sure, for they began to talk in his own language. That was queer. Tony just had to find out about it, so he asked them what they had been saying.

"Oh, that?" said one in Italian. "That was the American language. We learned it when we were in America before. Now we are going back."

Here was Tony's chance. "Oh, please teach me!" he begged.

The boys were very glad to show how much they knew. There was not much time left, so Tony asked his new friends to begin at once with some words which he could use in greeting his father. He learned two whole sentences, and he kept repeating them over and over, so as not to forget.

The next day, when the ship at last drew near the wharf, Tony's eyes were kept so busy that he could have used a dozen pairs instead of one pair. Of course he must keep his eyes fixed on the wharf for the first glimpse of father—it seemed so long since he had seen him—and yet how could he look away from those queer, towering stone houses? He had never before seen any buildings so high and so thin.

But when they got off the boat Tony forgot to look at the high buildings, for there were Father Calcatina and good Aunt Maria, and Uncle Logiano, and such a happy time they had greeting each other!

Suddenly Tony stopped short. He had forgotten to speak the words of the new tongue that he had learned. But it was not too late. Could he remember them now? Then he began, stiffly, but very clearly:

"My—father, I have—happiness to see you, and—I like—your America."

"Why, Tony, what—where did you learn that? It is the American tongue!" exclaimed his father.

"Oh, that was easy," replied Tony, glad to get back to his own Italian again. "If I had more time, I could have learned more words. Soon I shall known all the American words, and I shall help you—and then you will be proud."—Genevieve Scherer, in Nine Home Mission Stories.

The Girl Who Did It.

Once upon a time there was a young girl who was always going to put something special across. Her ideas were bright and sparkling. Any one who listened to her and saw her eyes sparkle, the rose-leaf shades come and go in her cheeks, and the dimples appear and disappear, would believe that she meant what she said.

She thought she did herself. But in reality she was charmed with her own creative genius for planning things, for she never actually got things more than well started before another brilliant plan would present itself to her fertile and agile mind. Then she would drop the first idea like a hot potato and grab the new idea and start gaily off with it.

One day she was telling her father, who was a lawyer, what she was about to tackle next. He was a cruel creature, for he looked at her darkly and said:

"I don't believe it, for you belong to the clan of folks who never get things done. You start them and it takes all your enthusiasm to whistle that the boat is leaving. Then you float downstream always, and run ashore."

The young girl in the case was very angry. Her eyes snapped. "I tell you, I am going to do this thing."

Her father merely shrugged his shoulders and retorted annoyingly:

"You will have to show me!"

Whereupon she hied herself to a convenient spot of retirement and thought it all out. She was an honest girl, and she acknowledged that her father was right. She did not think it necessary, however, to tell him of the decision she had arrived at, but she made up her mind that henceforth she would get things done. She did, too!

This is how she did it:

First, she stopped sticking a finger in every pie that came along. She discovered that she couldn't do everything, and so she had better start some things and finish them, and do them well.

Second, she was careful not to announce what she was going to do, but to wait for that happy time when she could say, "I have done it".

Third, before she began a new undertaking she would think it through and map out her plan of action.

Fourth, having started something, she held herself firmly to seeing it through.

Fifth, this made her more careful in what she undertook, but it also gave her the pleasure which comes of a job well done. And it gave her the courage to tackle something bigger.

It wasn't long before she earned the title of "the girl who gets things done". —Christian Guardian.

What They Planted On Arbor Day.

Said the first little boy as he planted his tree,
"I am planting a ship to sail over the sea".

Said the next little boy, "My elm tree so tall
Some day will give shelter and shade to us all".

Said the third little boy, "A birch canoe
Some day I will make from my tree for you".

"By and by, from my tree," said the fourth little lad, Shining red apples will make us all glad."

Said the fifth little boy as he planted his tree,
"This will build a house for you and me".

Said the sixth little boy, "A ladder to climb
When this tree grows up I'll make of mine".

Said the seventh little lad, "For the squirrel and mouse,
And the birds sometimes, this will be a house".

Said the eighth little boy, "This tree we'll take,
Chairs and tables and wagons to make".

Said the ninth little boy, "I'll use my tree
To the cook the dinners for Mother and me".

Said the last little boy, "On buck-wheat cakes
We'll eat the syrup this nice tree makes".

The Gingerbread Man.

The gingerbread man had raisin eyes,
He came today as a grand surprise
From grandmother's house. She was baking cake
And decided a gingerbread man she'd make.
And when he was made, it was plain to see,
She soon decided to give him to me.

I took him straight to my big playroom,
Where he met the bride and the handsome groom
And the Teddy bear and the pussy-cat
And the jumping-jack with his queer old hat.
Then all these dolls sat down with me
To have a cup of play-like tea.

I filled their cups with water clear
And said to Teddy, "Sit still, dear".
I drank their tea and my tea, too—
It is a thing that you have to do
When you play with dolls. I passed a plate
Of play-like cake and we ate and ate.

Then I got a wiff of gingerbread
And wanted some real food instead,
So I pinched off the ginger-man's ginger feet,
Oh, yes, they were very good to eat!
At that tea-party the nicest guest
Was the gingerbread man; he tasted the best.

RESOLUTION

by the Piedmont Convocation meeting in St. James Church, Leesburg, Va., May 1st and 2nd, 1928.

Whereas, we the members of the Piedmont Convocation have heard with much interest and pleasure the statement made by the Dean of the Theological Seminary in Virginia, setting forth some facts indicating the splendid work and unusual missionary enthusiasm of the students of the Seminary, and the ever increasing field of service of the Seminary itself, as testified to by Bishops of the Church,

Be it resolved, that we render thanks to God for this evidence of the guidance of His Holy Spirit, and pray that He will continue to give to the Seminary his richest blessings and protection.

MISS MAGGIE BOULWARE.

There passed away recently in Richmond one of God's faithful servants, whose life was one of love and service to many. MISS "MAGGIE" was the daughter of Andrew Moore Boulware, of King and Queen County, and of Martha Ellen Todd. She was born at Tudor Hall where she lived in the early years of her life and later at St. Julien, near Fredericksburg. For the last thirty years she made her home in Richmond with her sister-in-law, Mrs. A. L. Boulware.

The world and the Church miss greatly sweet, gentle serving, loyal souls like Miss Maggie. A woman of faith, who loved her Church; and one of works, whose life was spent in loyal service for others in the strength of her Master.

She passed to her rest, but will live long in the hearts of many.

"Peace, perfect peace, with loved ones far away?
In Jesus' keeping we are safe, and they."

RT. REV. CHARLES M. BECKWITH, D. D.

On April 18, from his home in Montgomery, Ala., the RT. REV. CHARLES MINNEGERODE BECKWITH, D. D., S. T. D., Bishop of Alabama, passed into life eternal. Others have made grateful mention and acknowledgment of his many and varied services to the Church to which he gave a deep and lifelong devotion; it is the desire of the present writer to pay tribute to another side of his life and character — the husband, father and brother. It was in the relaxation and intimacy of the family circle that the character and the heart of this man of God shed its best and brightest light. He was the last of five brothers, being survived by his widow, Mrs. Mary C. Beckwith, of Montgomery, Ala., one son, Edmund R. Beckwith, a lawyer of New York City, whose mother, Lucy Cocke, was daughter of William I. and Mary R. Cleveland Cocke, of Texas; and by four sisters, Mrs. John R. Cary, of Richmond, Va., the Misses M. S., M. E., and Kate D. Beckwith, of Petersburg, Va.

It was in the freedom of this devoted family circle that one best learned the love, the tenderness, the consideration and the charm of his nature. The family ties were deep-rooted in his heart, and in them he found that joy and strength which was reflected in his energetic and cheerful attitude toward the world and the great work he did in it. His going from the body to the higher life of Paradise makes a sad break in this family circle, which, however, gratitude to God for his life and work does much to alleviate. May God's blessing be ever upon him, and may he go from strength to strength in the service of His heavenly kingdom.

delegates, man or woman, from each parish and mission in the diocese. We are asking you as the rector to appoint these delegates and send me the names at your earliest convenience.

St. Paul's Church, Selma, is making extensive preparations for the entertainment and comfort of all who come.

Some have asked why we are having the Rural Conference this year in a city parish rather than in one of the rural fields. There are several reasons for this; we will not have a Conference in 1929, as we are planning to cooperate with the Regional Rural Conference to be held in Vicksburg, Miss.; because of this we want to have a large attendance in Selma this year of the city and rural clergy and their delegates; this would be impossible in a small community because of the entertainment; and then we wanted to reach the city church with our message. . . . .

The Conference begins on Tuesday evening and closes after lunch on Thursday. Make your plans to come on Tuesday afternoon and remain for the full time. Let the Rev. E. W. Gamble know when to expect you and also drop me a line.

Awaiting your early reply and looking forward with much pleasure to seeing you in Selma, I am,

Affectionately yours,

Archdeaconry.

On Monday, April 16, the spring meeting of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg was held at the Yeates School, Lancaster, Archdeacon Paul S. Atkins presiding. The day opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion at which the Archdeacon was celebrant. The principal speakers of the day were Bishop Darlington and the Rev. B. Talbot Rogers, D. D., of Sunbury, who stressed the vital importance to the Church and the country for a Christianized education, secular education having proven to be woefully inadequate. A resolution was adopted endorsing a campaign for $10,000 for necessary repairs to the school buildings and for the purpose of purchasing additional equipment. This summer, Yeates will have a summer session, credits earned at same will be accepted at Yeates and all other standard preparatory schools. Although Yeates has always been noted for the high academic standards, the future bids fair that it will even surpass its former high traditions.

Admission One Dollar!

The Laymen's Missionary Movement in Harrisburg, Pa., had an attendance of over eight hundred men each evening in one church, and over seven hundred women in another. Each speaker spoke briefly to each congregation, being taken from one to the other in motor cars. The service was opened on the first night by Bishop Darlington, and closed on the last night by Bishop Cook, of Delaware. The charge for admission was one dollar, which was used for missionary work. The fact that nearly 2,000 people assembled for three week nights, April 18, 19 and 20, showed great missionary interest.

WESTERN NEBRASKA.

Rt. Rev. Geo. A. Beecher, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convocation.

The Thirty-eighth Annual Convocation of the Missionary District of Western Nebraska was held in St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral April 24-26, inclusive. A conference of the clergy occupied the first day. Holy Communion was celebrated each morning of the convocation. Special guests were the Rev. W. J. Loring Clarke, D. D., who represented the Field Department of the National Council, and the Rev. James M. Magruder, D. D., of Annapolis, Md.

Clerical and lay delegates were present from practically every parish and mission in the District. It was one of the most enthusiastic gatherings ever held in Western Nebraska and the splendid addresses were listened to with evident satisfaction on the part of delegates and visitors. An unusually large group was present at seven o'clock on Wednesday morning at the Corporate Communion. The celebrant was the Rt. Rev. George Allen Beecher, D. D., assisted by the Very Rev. Francis R. Lee, Dean of St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral.

After breakfast on Wednesday morning the same large and enthusiastic group reassembled in the church for the Bishop's annual address. Evangelism, Religious Education and the Church's Responsibility to the Japanese were among the central themes of the Bishop's address.

Here in Western Nebraska is a large colony of the Japanese and the majority of them are farmers who reside in the North Platte and Scottsbluff Valleys. Through the consecrated leadership of Bishop Beecher, the Church has been able to minister to these people with almost phenomenal success.

Mr. Hiram Kano, of distinguished Japanese ancestry, is the lay worker among these citizens of foreign birth and parentage.

On Wednesday afternoon the Convocation and Church Service League were addressed on Religious Education. This part of the program was conducted by the Educational Secretary, Miss Elizabeth Knox Beecher. Both Miss Beecher and Dr. Loring Clarke were illuminating in their presentation of this vital subject. The Rev. James M. Magruder was the Convocation preacher.

The Rev. H. H. Peck, of North Platte, introduced the subject of Theological Education and his resolution asking for the establishment of a Theological School in Western Nebraska was accepted by the Convocation. The Bishop appointed the Examining Chaplains as members of the faculty.

The delicious buffet luncheon served to the delegates at the Bishop's House was one of the delightful features of the annual gathering.

The Very Rev. Francis R. Lee was elected as Clerical Deputy to the General Convention, while James G. Lowe was elected as lay delegate. The Alternates were the Rev. J. J. Crawford, of Sidney and Mr. John Fredericks of Calloway. The delegates to the Triennial of the Woman's Auxiliary were Mrs. Charles Wahlquist, Mrs. A. J. Ford, Mrs. Charles Davis, Miss Elizabeth Beecher and Deaconess Clara Le Hew.

The Annual Convocation was an occasion of rejoicing because the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mark's is nearing completion. Mr. Ralph Cramm, of Boston, is the architect and the stone was quarried from the granite beds of Missouri. It is a veritable shrine of beauty and a worthy symbol of our faith. Most of the windows will serve as memorials. The completion of this Cathedral Church will mean the beginning of a new era of life and progress in the work for God and His Church in Western Nebraska.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Coadjutor

The Lenten Offering of the Church Schools from all the Diocese of Maryland was presented at a great service at Memorial Church, Baltimore, on Sunday afternoon, April 29. Bishop Murray presided, being assisted by the Church School Commission of the Diocese; and the congregation, which filled the Church, consisted of chosen delegates from the various schools. The offering totaled $17,440.82, and will be devoted specifically to the work among the Indians of the Wind River Reservation and to Japanese kindergartens. Since the year 1916, when the offering was less than $5,000, it has grown consistently until this year. It is felt that the drop this year is only natural in view of the present financial situation of the country. It affords a striking economic comment upon unemployment. The churches are among the first to feel the pressure.

The Service of Presentation included a pageant-procession in which the Light of Christ was taken to the various Mission Fields. While the choir sang, "O Sion, Haste Thy Mission High Fulfilling", the Presiding Bishop, led by the Cross and a lighted candle from the altar, proceeded down the aisle of the Church, where models representing the various Mission Fields had been built in the Church windows. These models were very beautifully constructed by the Church Schools and included Alaska, the Philippines, Liberia, the Mountaineers, Japan, and the Arapahoe Indians. Before each one the procession halted while the candle was lighted and the Bishop offered a prayer.

The Church of the Epiphany, Govans, the Rev. Robert Kell, rector, was consecrated by Bishop Murray on Sunday, April 29. The Church was built in 1906 under the rectorship of the Rev. Carroll E. Harding, and is now free from debt.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., Coadjutor

Northwestern Convocation: The Northwestern Convocation met in Trinity Church, Parkersbury, the Rev. John Ridout, rector, February 14, 15, 16. The meetings were featured by addresses by Bishop-Coadjutor R. E. L. Strider, D. D., on Personal Religion, Personal Evangelism and Sin, by a sermon and a conference by the Rev. Harold Holt, Assistant Executive Secretary, Department of Christian Social Service of the National Council on Social Service and by a Report on the Student Volunteer Convention held in Detroit, December 28-31. This report was given by the Rev. W. G. Gehri, Morgantown, who attended the Convention. Mr. Gehri also presided as Dean of the Convocation. The next meeting of the Convocation will be held in Christ Church, Fairmont, November 8.

Two New Societies have been organized at Trinity Church, Moundsville, the Frances Twig composed of the younger women of the parish and the Girl Friendly Candidate Class, composed of the younger girls. Both of these are doing excellent work. The Sunday School has increased materially in membership, showing a better attendance record due largely to the efforts of the visiting officer, Mrs. A. L. Weidebusch.

Christ Church, Fairmont: Large quantities of green sod removed from the Country Club and laid on the grounds around the new parish house have taken root and seem to be growing satisfactorily, giving the ground a lovely appearance. Further landscaping is to be done as soon as the weather permits. A big parish dinner was given in the parish house Wednesday evening, February 1, when the Rev. J. E. Van Etten, D. D., rector of Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, delivered an address on Mexico. Dr. Van Etten was the first minister in the United States to deliver a sermon over the radio. The rector of Christ Church, Fairmont, the Rev. R. S. Lambert, was formerly associated with Dr. Van Etten in Calvary Church, Pittsburgh.

Trinity Church, Morgantown: There are about one hundred and thirty Episcopal students enrolled at the University of West Virginia, Morgantown. Effort is made to establish contact with them through the Church services, the rector's office always open to them for any friendly help, through six or seven open houses or informal parties given each semester and through an occasional, special religious emphasis, such as the Corporate Communion. The Episcopal Church is a member in the Religious Work Council, a cooperating organization of various denominations, which semi-annually undertakes some concerted program. The recently organized Business Men's Club of Trinity Church, of some twenty-five members promises to be an effective agency in the progress of the Church. The rector of Trinity Church is the Rev. W. G. Gehri.

Rectory Dedicated: The new rectory of St. Paul's Church, Elm Grove was recently dedicated by Bishop Strider, a goodly number of friends gathered together in the evening and made an inspection of the home, after which the Bishop read the dedicatory service and then several short addresses were made by the Rev. J. M. A. Bomberger, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, the members of the building committee and some of the vestry. The Rev. Lyman Wheaton, D. D., is the rector of St. Paul's, Elm Grove, whose efforts largely inspired the building of the new rectory.

A Varied Work: The Grace Church Guild, Elkins, deserves much praise for the many directions in which they have expended their efforts. The Guild assisted financially the Church budget, altar work, flowers each week to the sick, young people's work, Mississippi flood sufferers, Salvation Army and mission work in the nation.

A Good Record: At St. Mark's Church, St. Alban's, the church subscriptions by envelope and offerings have doubled in two years and the amounts paid to the G. and B. and the E. and C. Fund mounted from nothing in 1924 to $332.14 in 1927, besides sums paid for repairs and improvements. The Sunday School has grown from nothing in 1924 to forty-six in 1927. This is encouraging.

Kanawha Convocation: The spring meeting of the Kanawha Convocation was held in St. Luke's Church, Charleston, on February 14-16. Convocation opened on Tuesday evening with Evening Prayer by the rector, the Rev. Horace M. Brown, and Bishop Gravatt. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Cosby Bell, of the Virginia Theological Seminary. On Wednesday morning Bishop Gravatt conducted a quiet hour and was the celebrant at the Holy Communion. The Convocation was called to order by the Dean, H. M. Brown, and it was voted to accept the invitation of Montgomery for the Convocation to meet there November 13-15, 1928. Statements were made by Bishop Gravatt and by Mr. S. G. Cargill as to the financial condition of the diocese. The evening service was a missionary meeting at which addresses were made by the Rev. R. W. Hibbert, Grace Church, Eckman, and the Rev. W. P. Chrisman, St. Stephen's, Beckley, as to different phases of diocesan missionary work.

Holding the Fort: Much praise is due to Archdeacon William Meade for his prolonged visitation and excellent constructive work at Christ Church, Point Pleasant, in preparing this parish for the coming of its new rector, the Rev. F. C. Cady, Tyronne, Pa., early in May.

The New Parish House, St. Paul's, Cleveland.

In the very near future, the first unit of the new "St. Paul's on the Heights" will be opened formally for regular worship, the Rev. W. R. Breed, D. D., rector, officiating. The new church is an amalgamation of the old St. Paul's on East Fortieth Street and Euclid Avenue and St. Martin's Church on Cleveland Heights. The completed unit consists of the Parish House, Choir Rehearsal Room, Parish Offices, Clergy Sacristy, and Sexton's Headquarters. The auditorium in which service will be held pending completion of the church proper, will seat six hundred.

The benediction of the Parish House will take place when the Rt. Rev. W. A. Leonard, Bishop of Ohio, will perform the ceremonies. After a dinner, there will be an inspection of the parts of the building nearing completion, chief among which is the Monumental Tower. The Parish House will lie between the Church and the Rectory. The new St. Paul's is of modified Gothic, and will be built of Indiana limestone. It will cost circum $1,200,000. Walker and Weeks are the architects.

Church School Lenten Offerings.

The Easter season seemed beautifully crowned on the afternoon of April 22, when the diocesan presentation of the Church School Lenten Offerings was held at the Cathedral, Bishop Woodcock and other clergy in the chancel, Canon F. W. Hardy presiding. Despite inclement weather, the Cathedral was crowded to the doors, and seats reserved for adults proved insufficient for the large attendance. Whereas the Schools of Louisville were mainly those present, reports from all the interior parishes were in hand. An impressive pageant, composed jointly by Misses Barbara Hewsett and Jane Tilford, with a world-wide message, was beautifully presented, closing with the in-gathering of offerings as brought by a chosen member of each school. The full harvest amounted to the sum total of $3,890.87, the largest in the history of the diocese, save that of last year with its exceptional Jubilee gift, which, however exceeded the present by only some fifty dollars. The School reporting the largest offering per capita, always indicative of the greater individual effort, was St. Andrew's, Louisville, the Rev. John S. Douglas, rector.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Walter G. Harter, St. Augustine's Church, St. Louis, has accepted a call to Calvary Church, Sedalia, Mo. Address, after July 1, Calvary Rectory, Sedalia.

ORDINATIONS.

On Tuesday, April 17, 1928, in the Cathedral of the Incarnation at Garden City, Long Island, the following were ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. Ernest M. Stires, Bishop of Long Island:

Richard S. Martin, of Long Island.
Charles Pittman, of Long Island.
Frank H. Hutchins, for the Bishop of Chicago.
Morton E. Nelson, for the Bishop of Kansas.

In St. Paul's Church, Augusta, Ga., on February 29, 1928, Robert Howe Daniell was ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop of Georgia. He was presented by the Rev. J. A. Schaad. The Rev. Mercer P. Logan preached the sermon.

Mr. Daniell returned to the Du Bose School, Monteagle, Tenn., to complete his studies for advancement to the priesthood.

On the morning of Tuesday, May 1, 1928, Bishop Jett ordained to the diaconate Mr. J. Jaquelin Ambler, who will graduate from the Virginia Seminary at the close of this session.

The service was held in Ascension Church, Amherst, Va., Mr. Ambler's home church, of which the Rev. Dr. Thos. D. Lewis is rector. In the chancel, in addition to the Bishop, were the Rev. Dr. Edwin Royall Carter of Petersburg, uncle of Bluefield, Va.; Thos. M. Browne, of St. John's at Lynchburg, Va., and Alfred R. Berkeley, of St. John's at Roanoke, Va.

Just prior to the ordination service one person was confirmed by the Bishop.

Dr. Carter preached the sermon.

Dr. Lewis presented the candidate for ordination. The Litany was said by the Rev. Mr. Young. The Rev. Mr. Berkeley read the Epistle and this was followed by the ordination, after which Dr. Lewis placed the deacon's stole. Mr. Ambler then read the Gospel and Mr. Browne said the Creed.

Bishop Jett then celebrated the Holy Communion, being assisted by the Rev. Dr. Lewis.

The Bishop has not yet definitely decided at what point he will ask Mr. Ambler to serve his diaconate.

DEATHS.

The Reverend Hugo Lacy, D. D., passed to life eternal May 2 at his home 420 West Main Street, Richmond, Virginia. Dr. Lacy had been in failing health for over a year and had been very ill for the past ten days.

The funeral services were held at St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, on Friday. The interment was made at Wytheville, Virginia, on Saturday.

Dr. Lacy was born at "Ellsworth", New Kent county, Virginia, June 29, 1848. Dr. Lacy was a pioneer minister in the diocese of West Virginia. For thirty years he was rector of Tilletson parish, Buckingham, Virginia.

Dr. Lacy is survived by four daughters, Miss Mary Goodwin Lacy, of Washington, D. C.; Miss Ellen Lane Lacy and Miss Frances Eppes Lacy, of Richmond, and Miss Ethel Archer Lewis Lacy, of Detroit, Mich. He was a brother of the late Judge Benjamin W. Lacy, of the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals.

LIGHT

MANY readers will have no difficulty in recalling the days when evening church services were possibly only by the aid of oily, smoky lamps hung either at the side of the church, or swung on pulleys and chains from the ceiling. Shadows seemed to take odd slants that turned the attention away from many an inspiring sermon. Still others may remember cases where night services were impossible. Even now in some far distant rural sections of our broad country where electricity isn't accessible and generator sets are unknown, there are devout souls worshipping at night services in a dimness that has its effect on all present. These are becoming fewer and fewer. Thinking and earnest church leaders are now considering how to produce the best effects in lighting.

Educators, through repeated experiments and tests in all sorts of conditions, have found that light plays an important part in a person's receptiveness and attitude. Thus colleges have given attention to this important subject. Business men have found that light affects the happiness and productivity of their organizations, and offices and factories have been relighted.

Last, but with no less eagerness to take advantage of these simple facts, the churches (in an increasing number of cases) have removed fixtures that made for under-lighting, over-lighting, or uneven lighting, replacing them with a modern system that makes for a restful atmosphere where strain or dullness is absent. Squinting eyes rob many a beautiful message of its full significance

Our modern lighting systems have made possible a visual Christian education that has added breadth to Bible lessons. Stereopticons and motion picture projectors are being used by more and more churches, and more and more by the churches that have them. Even the outdoor bulletin boards are now made valuable at night. How truly we should be thankful that increased understanding of God's gifts is helping us in our study of His Word and His work.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Most of our "cannots" are "will nots".

Praying for a man will soon take all envy out of the heart.

To do our best, we must of necessity call in another—no less a person than Christ Himself.

It is a greater thing to help make another strong than to carry his load.

"It is a law of the spiritual life that every act of trust makes the next act less difficult until, if persisted in, trusting becomes like breathing the unconscious action of the redeemed soul."

Underneath all our causes for gratitude is this fundamental one. We have a God to whom we pray and He hears our prayers. As our years increase and our experience of this fact extends it makes us glad of life. It makes us abound in hope.—Rev. K. McMillan.

"It takes more grace to make a saint out of a Pharisee than it does to make one out of a Publican."

You can tell a lot about a man's piety when you know what the children think about him.

He who guides a child is preparing to rule a nation.

"I had some real fun yesterday," said Bishop Phillips Brooks to his congregation one Sunday morning. The fun he referred to was his visit to the slums, where he attracted the little children to himself very much as did his Lord and Master. It was a sight to find him walking through the streets with a multitude of the outcast urchins clinging to him and not willing to let him go.

Teach us, great Teacher of mankind
The sacrifice that brings thy balm:
The love, the work that bless and bind:
Teach us thy majesty, thy calm.

Teach thou, and we shall know indeed
The truth divine that maketh free;
And knowing, we may sow the seed
That blossoms thro' eternity.
—Richard Watson Gilder.

Paul's humility increased as he progressed to the end of his ministry. He was first "called to be an apostle", he then "labored more abundantly than they all", next he was "least of the Apostles" and gradually became "least of all saints" and finally remembered that he had been the "chief of sinners".

VIRGINIA PRINCIPLES

By LYON G. TYLER, L.L. D.

This historical and illuminating address by Dr. Tyler, published serially in recent issues of SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN, has met with a most generous reception and approval by students of Virginia history and departments of research in all parts of the country. It is a fearless exposition of the fundamental principles upon which the Commonwealth of Virginia was founded, by which it grew, for which its people fought and to which we still adhere.

The complete address is now being put in pamphlet form and will be supplied at the price of 50 Cents a copy, postpaid.

FOUNDATIONS

Probably petitions will be presented at the coming Triennial Convention asking that a day in each year be assigned for special services and other observances in Episcopal Churches as memorial to the signing of Magna Charta by "Tyrant John at Runnymeade". June 15 will be the seven hundred and thirteenth anniversary of the completion of the document, which is the foundation of the religious and civil liberties of English-speaking people and of principles of government now accepted in all civilized countries —"given by our hand in the Meadow which is called Runing-Meade, between Windsor and Staines, this 15th day of June in the 17th year of our reign". John, describing himself, "by the Grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Normandy and Acquitaine and Earl of Anjou", signed because a stern anrray of archbishops and bishops, earls and barons, was present to see that he did sign and by signing concede that the Church should be free of his domination and that all citizens of all degrees had rights which the king must respect and to which he must defer.

Nearly everybody knows of Magna Charta in a vague, general way, but very few understand its meaning and importance. The Church would do excellent practical service to the public in these times of political vagaries, lunacies and heresies by familiarizing people with the event, the conditions preceding it and the long results that followed, continuing to this day.

The story is especially interesting for Virginians. The two great leaders in organizing the movement for the great charter and making that movement so formidable that the blustering bully of a king quailed before it, were Stephen, Archbishop of Canterbury, and William Mareschal, Earl of embroke. Among the other nobles and liegemen, named as present at the signing and giving "counsel" that it be signed, were Basset, Fitz-Hugh, Fitz-Gerald, Alen de Galloway, constable of Scotland, names familiar here in modernized form. It is one of the most remarkable coincidences in history that "John Mareschal" attended and advised at the making of Magna Charta and exactly six hundred years later his direct descendant and namesake, John Marshall, of Virginia, expounded and gave life and meaning to the Constitution of the United States, based on the general ideals of Magna Charta. John Mareschal was nephew of the Earl of Pembroke and manager of his Irish estate and caused extension of the terms of the charter to Ireland. Probably Chief Justice Marshall was not interested in his descent from the statesman and warrior of 1215. The chief justice lived in a busy time when genealogies abroad were inaccessible. Later research, however, proves that the John Marshall who commanded a troop in the King's army at the disastrous fight of Edgehill, 1642, was the descendant of John Mareschal, who was at Runnymede, and, like so many other Royalists and Church of England men, came to Virginia in 1650, after the overthrow of the Stuarts, settling near Dumfries and founding the Virginia and Kentucky families of his name.

Eight years ago, Mr. Gore, the blind Senator from Oklahoma, discovered that the library of the Senate contained no copy of Magna Charta, "the foundation of English liberty and jurisprudence and cornerstone of American liberty and jurisprudence", he said. Article Thirty-nine, he declared to be "the finest fruit of sixty centuries of human struggle and evolution". This article is brief:

"No free man shall be seized, or imprisoned, or dispossessed, or in any way outlawed or destroyed; nor will we condemn him, nor will we commit him to prison excepting by the legal judgment of his peers or by the laws of the land."

That is the root of habeas corpus and trial by jury.

The charter is drawn with skill and marked by common sense, lucidity, conservatism, foresight, and depth and breadth of thought which are astonishing when we consider the limited knowledge, education and training of the thirteenth century. It would fill seven or eight columns of the average daily newspaper and includes sixty-three articles, the first of which is "that the English Church shall be free and shall have her whole rights and her liberties inviolable". The sixty-first article established the principle of a parliament, of twenty-hve barons, given the right "to distress and harass the king, saving harmless our person and the person of our Queen and children", if it be decided that he has broken his pledges.

"From this era new soul was inspired into the people of England," says Hallam's History of the Middle Ages, continuing, "Her liberties, long held in abeyance, became a tangible possession, and indefinite aspirations for the laws of Edward the Confessor were changed to steady regard for the Great Charter." At the instance of Senator Gore, the charter, with explanatory notes by an able and careful English historian, was printed as a public document by our government. An active organization, with membership in this country and England and of which Mr. J. W. Hamilton, of Minnesota, is one of the chief driving powers, labors to arouse and keep alive interest in and knowledge of the vast achievement. This organization and many other citizens throughout the country propose to ask the constituted authorities of the Church to cooperate in the work.

A MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

The mother of John Quincy Adams said, in a letter to him, written when he was only twelve years old:

"I would rather see you laid in your grave than grow up a profane and graceless boy."

Not long before the death of Mr. Adams a gentleman said to him: "I have found out who made you."

"What do you mean?" asked Mr. Adams.

The gentleman replied: "I have been reading the published letters of your mother."

"If," this gentleman relates, "I had spoken that dear name to some little boy who had been for weeks away from his mother, his eyes could not have flashed more brightly, nor his face glowed more quickly, than did the eyes and face of that venerable old man when I pronounced the name of his mother. He stood up in his peculiar manner and said:

"Yes, sir, all that is good in me I owe to my mother."

A FELLOWSHIP OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE

Dr. Nelson Page Dame

IN a preceding article I attempted to show how, in any small community, Christians of different Churches could unite in a Fellowship of the Christian Life, and help each other keep our Lord's great commandment: "That ye love one another," and fulfil His great High Priestly prayer: that His people "may all be one in us". And this may be done without the sacrifice of any Church preference or prejudice, or of that dearly-bought religious liberty for which Protestantism stands, and without interferring in the slightest degree with the loyalty of its members to their respective Churches.

We were then speaking of the Church or Fellowship as a necessary aid to Christian living, and the development of the Christian character. The result of such cooperation between Christians in any community, would be the gathering there from time to time as they might decide of a small company of earnest Christians, united in love and loyalty to their common Lord and Master, and to each other for His sake and for His service.

But there are three or four other fields of activity, besides the Christian Life, where such a united body is absolutely necessary to the full success of our Lord's work for the salvation of men in that community.

1. Witnessing for Christ.

The Church or Fellowship is meant to be a witness for Christ to the community in which it is set as "a light shining in a dark place": an organized, united body of witnesses. "Ye are the light of the world."

The world's ignorance of the truth about God, His character, His purposes, His method, or plan of salvation for mankind, is the cause of a large part of the world's woes. "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life," is our Lord's cry of divine despair at man's strange attitude towards God his Friend. "Satan hath blinded the minds of men." He has filled the world with lies, and half-lies about God, and the Churches are about as full of this falsehood as the world is.

Now these falsehoods will have to be contradicted and the truth told to men, before they can ever be induced to return to God. And this can be done only by an organized, united body of witnesses for God. The world pays small heed to single, isolated witnesses. It generally sets them down as cranks. And it is generally correct in its judgment of them. But a united body of intelligent men and women, who are patiently living the Christian life, would be another thing. "Ye are my witnesses," said God: "My witnesses," collectively, as well as individually. And without such a body of witnesses, "having one mind": the mind of Christ, and able to proclaim, "with one mouth", with no uncertain sound, the truth as it is in Jesus, in every community, God's work for the salvation of men cannot be effectively done. There is no greater need of the Church today than that of such a united, organized body of witnesses, for Christ in every community of men.

2. Intercessory Prayer.

Our Lord came into the world armed with all "the wisdom of God and the power of God", for the salvation of mankind. We can see that wisdom and power displayed in His service of men during His earthly life. When He ascended into heaven He did not intend that His work should cease. He proposed that it should continue upon a world-wide scale. To this end He laid aside His natural human body, and clothed Himself in another body, His Church, which, like a great vine, could cover the earth, until there was at least a little branch of it in every community. And wherever His body is, "where two or three are assembled in His name", as His body, for His use, there would He be in the midst of them, with all the wisdom and power of God, to deliver and bless men.

He Himself now "sits on the right hand of the Father" in heaven, in the place of authority and power. He is there as our great High Priest. "He ever liveth to make intercession" for men. And He has provided for an organized, united body of His people in every community who will hold up His hands, as Aaron and Hur held up Moses' hands in the mountain, in intercessory prayer for victory upon the banner of His soldiers, fighting the battle of His people, in the plain below. "If two of you," He promises, "shall agree on earth as touching anything that ye shall ask, it shall be done for you of my Father which is in heaven." He will take their petition, and, in His office as our great High Priest, present it before God, and it shall be done for them "of my Father". Here is a means by which today superhuman wisdom and power, real miracle-working power, can be brought into operation in the service of needy men.

But we must furnish Him with a united body of surrendered, consecrated men and women in each community, who, on the one hand believe implicitly in His power and good will to bless, and who, on the other, are full of tender sympathy with those for whom the blessing is sought. With such a body of intercessors on earth, to cooperate with Him in the Heaven, there is nothing that men can ask or need that God cannot, and will not, do for them.

3. Demonstrating the Life.

In our Lord's plan for saving the world, it is necessary to induce men to turn away from sin. For God Himself cannot permanently save one hair of the head of a man who keeps on still in his wickedness. "Turn ye, turn ye, for why will ye die." So He sends out His Church to call men to "repentance", to awaken, convince and convert men, to "turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God".

Now preaching, proclamation of the "truth as it is in Jesus", has a large part to play in turning men from sin to righteousness. But it is not the only thing on which God relies. He is persuaded that if men could actually see the way of righteousness demonstrated before their eyes, by living men and women like themselves, they would turn from sin to righteousness. So He has arranged to have a demonstration of the way of righteous living in every community. No amount of mere preaching, or telling men that this way is possible, practicable, and profitable, will do. They must see it in actual operation. The world "walks by sight".

So our Lord calls upon His friends to organize a company in each community, and show the world how God wants all men to live: in their homes, in society, in business, as husbands and wives, as parents and children, as masters and servants, as employers and employees, as public officials and ordinary citizens, as buyers and sellers, as rich and poor, as educated and ignorant: in all the relation of life as they actually exist among men. "Let your light so shine that men may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

Of course, the Christian has never seen that life lived by men and women like himself. He has seen and heard His Lord, it is true. But the life of Jesus could not cover the whole area of human experience. But the Christian is persuaded that the principles of Jesus are applicable to every relation of life, and in cooperation with his Christian brethren, he proposes to show, by actual demonstration, that that life, the righteous life, is a practical, profitable and beautiful way to live in the world as we have it now. Of course, the Christian has to "walk by faith" in his Lord's Word. But when the world sees the life demonstrated by the Christian, it will be convinced and turn from its futile way of sin, into the paths of righteousness: the paths of peace and prosperity, of health and happiness.

"I, if I be lifted up" in the lives of His people, collectively and individually, "will draw all men unto me."

4. Soldiers of Christ.

Every Christian is pledged to "fight manfully under" the banner of Christ, and to "continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end". The New Testament is full of references to this side of the Christ's life and service. Christians are described as "good soldiers of Jesus Christ". They are exhorted to "put on the whole armor of God". They are urged to "fight the good fight of faith". "Think not that I am come to send peace upon the earth. I came not to send peace, but a sword, For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." Of course, there are two kinds of warfare, as there are two kinds of soldiers: the soldiers of the State and the soldiers of Christ. They are both called on to endure hardness, to face danger, and wounds and death. They both wear armor, and use weapons. But their objectives are different and consequently their weapons. The objective of the soldiers of the State is to kill their opponents. The objective of the soldiers of Christ is to kill the falsehood, the error of which their opponents are the victims. So the Christian's weapons are not guns, and bayonets, and high explosive shells. Such things would be powerless against falsehood and error. But the Christian's weapons are the "sword of the Spirit", the "Word of God", the "truth as it is in Jesus", the "tongue of fire", the "Cross", the "readiness to suffer" persecution, villification, jeering and derision, even death itself "for the truth's sake". Men and women, by hundreds, have suffered and died in this warfare; on the cross, on the scaffold, on the rack, at the stake. But they have won all that has been won for Christ so far.

Soldiers fight in companies, not singly. And small companies of the soldiers of Christ, organized and acting together under His orders and using His weapons, could put down today any evil in their community: profanity, dirty talk, lawlesness, evil speaking, discreditable gossip, ill manners, or anything else that Christ condemns, and "turn the kingdoms of this world into the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ", almost in a day. "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force," says our Lord. "Consecrate yourselves this day unto the Lord, every man against his brother, and every man against his son."

"Stand up, stand up for Jesus,. .
Ye soldiers of the Cross."

Of course, not all, perhaps not one-tenth, of those gathered into the Churches are Christians in any full sense of the term. The competition between the Churches is so great, the belief in numbers is so intense, the need of contribution, to enable the Churches to carry on as they are now organized and run, is so pressing, and the conviction that membership in the Church is absolutely necessary to salvation from hell, is so general, that they have long since utterly disregarded the quality of those whom they urge to "join the Church". Few of those who are thus gathered in have any idea as to what the Christian Religion stands for, and fewer still have the slightest intention of obeying Christ, or of living His life, or of taking a hand in His work of saving the world. And, of course, these half-hearted, purely nominal, Christians, are not going to join in any real effort to live the Christian life, or render Christian service.

But there are some, thank God, in every congregation of every Church, who would welcome any opportunity to unite and cooperate with their Christian brethren of every name in serving the Lord, whom they love, and of bringing His blessing and help to the needy one of the community in which they live. This is that "strait and narrow way" of which our Lord has said that "few there be that find it". But it is the way that "leadeth unto life", to "glory and honor and immortality".

THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES

By the Right Reverend John Charles Ryle, D. D.

(2) Let us mark, in the next place, as we read the Articles, their studied moderation about things non-essential to salvation, and things about which good Christian men may differ.

About sin after baptism—about predestination and election, about the definition of the Church, about the ministry—about the ceremonies and rights of every particular or national Church—about all these points it is most striking to observe the calm, gentle, tender, conciliatory tone which runs throughout the Articles; a tone the more remarkable when contrasted with the firm and decided language on essential points, to which I have just been referring.

It is clear as daylight to my mind, that the authors of the Articles intended to admit the possibility of difference on the points which I have just been enumerating. They saw the possibility of men differing about predestination and election, as Fletcher and Toplady did. How cautious are their statements, and how carefully guarded and fenced! They believed that there might be Churches differently organized to our own, that there might be many good Christian ministers who were not Episcopalians, and many useful rights and ceremonies of worship unlike those of the Church of England. They take care to say nothing which could possibly give offence. They scrupulously avoid condemning and denouncing other Churches and other Christians. In short, their maxim seems to have been, "in necessariis unitas, in non-necessariis libertas, in omnibus caritas".

I greatly admire this moderation in non-essentials. I heartily wish that the spirit of it had been more acted upon in days gone by, by the rulers of the Church of England. To the blind intolerance and fanaticism of days gone by, to the insane and senseless wish to cram Episcopacy and Liturgy down the throats of every man by force, and excommunicate him if he would not swallow them—to this we owe an immense proportion of our English Dissent. And the root of all this has been the departure from the spirit of the Thirty-nine Articles.

I frankly own that I belong to a school in the Church of England, which is incorrectly and unfairly called "low". And why are we called so? Simply because we will not condemn every Church which is not governed by Bishops; simply because we will not denounce every one as greatly in error who worship without a surplice and a Prayer Book! But I venture to tell our accusers that their charges fall very lightly on us. When they can prove that our standard is not the standard of the Thirty-nine Articles—when they can show that we take lower ground than our own Church takes in her authorized Confession of Faith—then we will allow there is something in what they say against us. But till they can do that, and they have not done it yet, I tell them that we shall remain unmoved. We may be called "low" Churchmen, but we are "true".

(3) Let us mark, in the next place, as we read the Articles, their wise, discreet, and well-balanced statements about the Sacraments. They declare plainly the divine authority of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. They use high and reverent language about them both, as means of grace, "by which God doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but strengthen and confirm our faith in Him".

But after saying all this, it is most instructive to observe how carefully the Articles repudiate the Romish doctrine of grace being imparted by the Sacraments "ex opere operato". "The Sacraments," says the Twenty-fifth Article, "were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried out, but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same, they have a wholesome effect or operation.

Now, if there is any one thing that is laid to the charge of us Evangelical clergy, it is this—that we deny sacramental grace. "Excellent, worthy, hard-working men," we are sometimes called; "but unhappily they do not hold right Church views about the Sacraments." Men who talk in this manner are talking rashly, and saying what they cannot prove. Evangelical clergymen yield to none in willingness to give rightful honor to Baptism and the Lord's Supper. All we say is, that grace is not tied to the Sacraments, and that a man may receive them, and be none the better for it. And what is all this but the doctrine of the Thirty-nine Articles?

(4) Let us mark, in the fourth place, as we read the Articles, the thoroughly Protestant spirit which runs throughout them, and the boldness of their language about Romish error.

What says the Nineteenth Article? "The Church of Rome hath erred, not only in living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith."

What says the Twenty-second Article? "The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons, worshipping and adoration, as well of images as of reliques, and also of invocation of saints, is a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God."

What says the Twenty-fourth Article? It forbids the Romish custom of having public prayers and ministering the Sacraments in Latin. What says the Twenty-fifth Article? It declares that the five Romish sacraments of confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, are not to be accounted sacraments of the Gospel.

What says the Twenty-eighth Article? It declares that "transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacraments, and hath given occasion to many superstitions". It also declares that "the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up or worshipped".

What says the Thirtieth Article? "The cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay-people."

What saith the Thirty-first Article? "The sacrifices of masses, in which it was commonly said the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain and guilt, were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceit."

What says the Thirty-second Article? "Bishops,priests, and deacons are not commanded by God's law to vow the estate of single life, or to abstain from marriage.

What says the Thirty-seventh Article? "The Bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction in this realm of England."

Now, what shall we say to all this? Nine times over the Thirty-nine Articles condemn, in plain and unmistakable language, the leading doctrines of the Church of Rome, and declare in favor of what must be called Protestant views. And yet men dare to tell us that we Evangelical clergymen have no right to denounce Popery—that it is very wrong and very uncharitable to be so hot in favor of Protestantism—that Romanism is a pretty good sort of thing, and that by making such a piece of work about Popery, and Protestantism, and Ritualism, and semi-Popery, we are only troubling the country and doing more harm than good. Well! I am content to point to the Thirty-nine Articles. There is my apology! There is my defence! I will take up no other ground at present. I will not say, as I might do, that Popery is an unscriptural system, which every free nation ought to dread, and every Bible-reading Christian of any nation ought to oppose. I simply point to the Thirty-nine Articles. I ask any one to explain how any English clergyman can be acting consistently, if he does not oppose, denounce, expose, and resist Popery in every shape, either within the Church or without. Other Christians may do as they please, and countenance Popery if they like. But so long as the Articles stand unrepealed and unaltered, it is the bounden duty of every clergyman of the Church of England to oppose Popery.

THE CHURCH OF RECONCILIATION

By M. N. Brown

OH, Holy Catholic Church!" "The Church of Reconciliation!" This is thy birthright. It is the birthright that Christ gave thee in that Upper Room in Jerusalem when He filled thee with His Holy Spirit and brought to thy remembrance His promise, "If I be lifted up I will draw all men unto Me". Ah! What a birthright, what a privilege! To keep Christ's teachings (which are so simple a child can understand them and yet so poignant with truth and living philosophy that they are as applicable today as they were two thousand years ago), pure and untarnished by the superstitions of transubstantiation, indulgences, mariology, papal authority, and all the other errors of thy great Roman Sister on the one side; and free from the Puritanical denominationalism of the extreme wing of thy great Protestant Sister on the other side. Ever lifting Him up so that in His appointed time He will remove the veil from the eyes of mankind that they may see the pettiness of all their differences and wash them away. Then it will be thy privilege through thy birthright, "Oh, Church of Reconciliation"! to join hands with thy great Protestant Sister on the one side and thy great Roman Sister on th eother and the three become the one living vine lifting Him higher and higher until men all over the world may see and be drawn to Christ. Oh, "Holy Catholic Church!" will thou sell this noble birthright for a mess of papal pottage, and be swallowed up by thy powerful Roman Sister, forever losing the privilege of bringing Christian Unity into the world? There will be no chnace (humanly speaking) for Christian Unity if thou should take this short-sighted step and discard thy "Articles of Religion", for thy great Protestant Sister will stand alone on the one extreme and thy Roman Sister on the other, forever irreconcilable with no Mediator left through whom Christ may work His eternal purposes of Christian Unity.

Thou hast been so wise that thou couldest minister to thy "Low Church" Children and thy "High Church" Children and maintain perfect unity. Why wilt thou suddenly become so foolishly unwise, as to discard thy "Articles of Religion", thereby forcing thy "Low Church" wing into another Protestant body and crucify thy Lord and Master afresh by dividing His Church against itself? Surely thou didst learn a bitter lesson in the narrow-minded way in which thou handled the Wesley issue. Wilt thou repeat this bitter bit of history? Christ preserved thee through the severe trial of the Revolutionary War and also the Civil War. This preservation must have been for the purpose of fulfilling, in His appointed time, thy birthright of being the "Church of Reconciliation". How can thy leaders be so traitorously disloyal to their vows, and to thee and thy Christ given cause.

Some shallow thinkers say, "It is no issue, the Thirty-nine Articles are obsolete, it will not matter whether they are taken out or left in". Ah! be not so deceived, simple thinker. The whole world is seeking a living and livable religion, it is the psychological moment to present the pure untarnished Christ. "The field is white with the harvest and the laborers are few."

With these real things crying for admission at the doors of the General Convention, do you think the leaders of this great Church would waste one moment of the precious hours of the General Convention quibbling about a non-essential like obsolete verbiage. The laity, and most of the clergy, have read into the obsolete verbiage of the Prayer Book a love, respect, beauty and richness of meaning that modern words could never express. Do we discard the Bible because its verbiage is largely obsolete? Words are of no value save to express thoughts. The thoughts expressed in the "Articles of Religion" are certainly not obsolete. From the beginning it was necessary for the Church to build bulwarks to protect the teachings of Christ and keep them pure from the weeds of heresy. The Apostles themselves said a small creed then, the greater Nicean Creed was written to protect the teachings of Christ against Arius and last the "Articles of Religion" were written as an additional protection against the Roman error.

As St. Paul says: "Why beat the air?" Let us face this, the greatest issue in the life of the Episcopal Church since the Reformation.

May Christ bless and preserve thee, "O Holy Catholic" Church! and bring to the remembrance of thy leaders His promise, "If I be lifted up, I will draw all men unto Me".

VIRGINIA PRINCIPLES

Address of Dr. Lyon Gardiner Tyler, before the Waynesboro (Virginia) Historical Society, October 11, 1927.

My rather lengthy remarks on the subject of Virginia political principles, which by no means exhausts the number, make my reference to her religious and social principles necessarily brief. Virginia was perhaps not far behind the New England Colonies in narrowness and bigotry during the Colonial period, and was exceeded in liberality of view by other colonies like Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and South Carolina, but this was largely due to the intimate connection of the State with the ruling orders of England. When by the Revolution the people assumed control, she was the first and most pronounced in the assertion of freedom of religion. Witness George Mason's Declaration of Rights, whose article XVI says: "That religion or the duty we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction; not by force or violence, and therefore all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience, and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love and charity towards each other." Witness the great act of Thomas Jefferson of 1785—"an act for establishing religious freedom"—which declares that faith is free and that "all attempts to influence the mind by temporal punishments, or burdens or by civil incapacitations tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness."

None of the acts of the other American States can come up to these splendid declarations, and for a long time after the American Revolution the authority of the New England clergy continued, really, unrestricted. It is even erroneous to ascribe to Rhode Island any great merit in religious matters, for she was too small to exert much influence, and her laws, in spite of Roger Williams' original professions of freedom, were, from an early date directed against Catholics and were not changed till after the American Revolution.

In his message, December 23, 1821, Governor Thomas Mann Randolph, of Virginia, dwelt upon the narrow spirit manifested in some parts of the Union, even in his time, in opposition to religious freedom, and said: "It is the glorious distinction of Virginia to have first fully removed the main cause of that frightful disorder of the public imagination which has appeared in all ages in other countries, and even in some of these States, during the short period of our history, which confounds piety with cruelty and makes religion give sanction to the most atrocious outrages against humanity."

The present "Ku-Klux-Klan" and the brotherhood of the "Junior Order of United American Mechanics" opposed to Catholics and foreigners in general, are totally averse, in their conduct and objects, to the principles of Old Virginia. Many young Virginians have joined these societies, without considering what they mean and in total ignorance of what Virginia stands for! But it is not believed that the South as a whole, despite some extreme talkers in Congress, and out of it, has abandoned its former liberal religious views. If it has, the New South is to blame.

Without dwelling longer on this interesting subject, I hurry to the last of my three Gallic divisions—social principles, or, as they may be more correctly styled, rules of social procedure, as perhaps they are not quite of the same high character as the political and religious principles noticed.

Who has not heard of Virginia hospitality? What the Rev. Hugh Jones said in his Present State of Virginia about 1722 is true to the whole period down to 1861. "No people can entertain their friends with better cheer and welcome, and strangers are here treated in the most splendid and hospitable manner, so that few inns or ordinaries are necessary." This hospitality took its rise in the early days of settlement, when the arrival of hundreds of persons from England, needing help and refreshment, appealed strongly to human sympathy. It was no doubt carried to excess, and family bankruptcies have been attributed to it. But it contrasted strongly with the modern economic ideas, which too often narrow the heart and banish the joy and glee of home life.

What next? Prominent in the catalogue of Virginia social virtues were unfailing courtesy and politeness—a courtesy and a politeness that were shown even to the Negroes on the plantations. Judge St. George Tucker has been quoted on the subject of democracy, he is no less an important witness regarding the affability that so distinguished society in Virginia from the time anterior to the American Revolution. In the same letter to William Wirt he took occasion utterly to repudiate the description of Virginia Society which the latter presented in his proposed Life of Patrick Henry. "The picture of Society," said he, "given on the same page does not appear to me to be just. The rich rode in coaches or chariots, but they never failed to take off their hats to a poor man whom they met, and generally appeared to me to shake hands with every man in the courtyard or churchyard." Like hospitality, this abundance of courtesy was sometimes overdone, giving rise to many stories which make some old Virginia gentlemen rather absurd and amusing.

I remember General Taliaferro, who was chairman a good many years of the Board of William and Mary College, when I was there as President, telling of two old Gentlemen of the old regime who stayed up all night talking, because neither was willing to make the first move to bed, for fear it might be construed into an act savoring of abruptness or rudeness. And then there is the story told to me by Colonel Benjamin S. Ewell, who preceded me as President, regarding dear old Hugh Blair Grigsby, Chancellor of the College, the facts of which are as follows: It was not long after the War for Southern Independence. The Board of Visitors of William and Mary College had gathered in Williamsburg, on the night of the fourth of July, but there was no money and very few students.

And under these conditions that veteran statesman, General Wise, of whom I have already spoken, offered, as one of the members of the Board, a motion to plow up the college lawn, and, as a source of revenue in the then straightened condition of the finances, to put the same in cow-peas. This led the General, who knew a great deal of every subject on earth and was a pretty long talker, to take up the whole history of peas from the cow-pea down to the patridge-pea. The length of his dissertation, the lateness of the hour and the heat of the night had a soporific effect on President Ewell, who was present in attendance on the Board, and in spite of himself, he went fast to sleep. About one o'clock the next morning he woke up, and found General Wise still on his feet, discussing the value of the pea as a fertilizer of poor land. President Ewell looked about him and observed all the rest of the members occupying recumbent positions and fast asleep—all except the Chancellor, Hugh Blair Grigsby, who sat alert, intently watching General Wise, and holding his hand to his ear.

The amazing part of the situation was that Mr. Grigsby was as deaf as a post and with difficulty heard anything that General Wise said, but he felt the dignity of his position as Chancellor and resolutely repelled the blandishments of Morpheus, to which all the rest of the Board had succumbed.

Quite as prominent among the social principles of Virginia as the two I have mentioned, was the social principle of honor. I do not by any means attribute perfection to the society of Virginia and the South, but it succeeded in inspiring what other countries have not always done—a high and scrupulous sense of honor in the conduct of man to man, and the Southern man, however faulty in himself, demanded perfection in his heroes. And so no other State or Nation of either the old or the new world ever produced such a host of ideal men as the Old South.

How has it been with the North? The simple truth has been that the North in laying stress upon commercial values has not been able in any age to produce that ideality of which we speak—which is a combination of supreme patriotism, complete disinterestedness and perfect purity of speech and conduct. We recognize plenty of intellectuality in the North, but no great ideal men to whom the generations may safely point for inspiration—no one like Washington or Lee—no one like Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, Joseph E. Johnston, John C. Calhoun, Nathaniel Macon, Jefferson Davis, John Tyler, or Stonewall Jackson. Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, John Adams, John Quincy Adams, and Daniel Webster were Northern men of great ability and power, but each had some dreadful personal defect which makes it impossible justly to make a hero of him. Franklin and Hamilton were notorious for their immoralities, John Adams was childish in his vanity, John Quincy Adams was terribly malignant, a master of tirade and abuse, and Webster, great in speech and generous in temperament, must have been sadly lacking in high moral perception to have consented, while Senator, to be the pensioner of a group of manufacturers in Boston. Abraham Lincoln cannot be mentioned in the same breath with these able men, and even if he could his habit of filthy talking would deprive him of any just claims to ideality.

The sense of honor, which is the principal feature of true heroism, found expression in a marked degree in Southern colleges. William and Mary College, as early as 1779, set the example of substituting candid appeals to the better feelings of the student and frank reliance on the individual conscience for the espionage and restraints that formerly prevailed. She was followed by the University of Virginia and other Southern colleges, till the rule became quite general, even in the inferior schools. Under this system the institutions of the South became veritable "Schools of Honor", which had really very little in common with modern "Student Self-government", of which we hear so much nowadays. Under the old idea the student was an independent integer, but under the new he is a mere cog in a machine.

Even Abraham Lincoln himself was compelled to pay tribute to this sense of honor in Southern people. Before he changed his policy of peace and provoked war by sending an armed squadron to Fort Sumter he remarked of Judge Summers and the other members of the Virginia Convention that he had "great confidence" in them, and that "though they might differ from him regarding secession he believed they were men who could be depended on in any matter in which their honor was pledged".

Many other social principles might be cited as characteristic of Virginia, but I will content myself with mentioning one more only—conviction. The Old Virginian, as I knew him as a boy, was a man of convictions. He considered it better to have some views, however erroneous, rather than have none at all. A molly-coddle was his abhorrence. Thus he had firm ideas on politics, religion and society, and did not have to be taught them. Sometimes he carried his convictions like his hospitality and politeness a little too far, perhaps, and there were some Virginia gentlemen who thought that theirs was the best of everytihng—their land, their Negroes, their horses, their wives and children without equal. But excess is better than too little, and exaggeration may be discounted without any vital trouble. I fear that under the new order of things skepticism and indifference have become prevalent. Indeed, no greater calamity can come to any civilized people than subjection to a conqueror of alien ideals, and I fear that with the present Virginia, reconstructed according to Northern views, on political and moral lines, policy and loss of pride have largely taken the place of that noble conviction which was always more right than wrong.

In the eager desire to attract Northern capital, some Southerners have been disposed to put present interest ahead of historic values. Indeed, toadyism, as an increasing factor, was perhaps a necessary consequence of the loss of 120,000 of the flower of Southern manhood, during the war of the Sixties. The Old South aspired to furnish men for the ages; the New South cares more to rival the North in producing millionaires.

But, right or wrong, such were the Virginia principles. I may have bragged some in this discussion, but I have seen it written that the law of brag is like the law of slander. There are two valid defenses to be made. First, that the words were not uttered, and second, that the words were true. I can't, and would not, avail myself of the first defence.

(The End.)

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES

Prepared by J. T. Bougher. Reading Terminal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

LESSON—No. 35.
TOPIC—Christ, and the Coming Anti-Christ.
(Read 1 John 2:18-29.)

The Holy Scripture is very clear in its teaching that before our Lord returns in great power to set up His Kingdom, there will be a great "falling away" as described by our Lord Himself in Matt. 24, and which apostasy and lawlessness will finally "head up" under a real Anti-Christ, and of which the present "many anti-Christs" are a solemn foreshadowing (2 John 2:18, 22). As this coming false Messiah or "Man or Sin" will not be revealed until the Holy Spirit withdraws from the world (2 Thess. 2:3-8), it is apparent that "the Church" will be spared the awful experience of the "tribulation" period, and shall have been lifted to Heavenly scenes (1 Thess. 4:17; Luke 17:34-36; 1 Cor. 15:51, 52; Rev. 4:1. (See Lessons 7 and 8.)

Satan is a great imitator, and as the Word of the Lord describes with minute detail the characteristics of this "fearful Being" who will be Satan incarnate here on earth for a time, we shall find the following contrast between Christ and the Anti-Christ, of profound interest.

| CHRIST. | THE ANTI-CHRIST. |

| 1. The Son of God.—John 20:31. | 1. The Son of Perdition.—2 Thess. 2:3. |

| 15. Opposed to Satan.—Matt. 4:1. | 15. Will be aided by Satan.—Rev. 13:2. |
| 16. Will have an earthly capital.—Matt. 5:35. | 16. Will have an earthly capital.—Rev. 18:1-18. |

| 18. A mighty Creator and Redeemer.—Heb. 1:1-3. | 18. A mighty destroyer.—Isaiah 14:16-17. |
| 19. Was meek and lowly.—Matt. 11:28-30. | 19. Will be proud and selfish.—Isaiah 14:12-17. |

| 21. Will keep his covenant.—Heb. 8:16-13. | 21. Will break his covenant.—Dan. 11:22, 23. |
| 22. Introduced era of Grace.—John 1:17. | 22. Will introduce the Tribulation.—Matt. 24:15-22. |
| 23. Will occupy the Father's throne.—Rev. 3:21. | 23. Will occupy Satan's throne.—Rev. 13:2. |
| 24. Will come on a white horse followed by the armies of Heaven, to end the great Tribulation.—Rev. 19:11-19. | 24. Will come on a white horse to begin the great Tribulation and demand worship.—Rev. 6:2; Rev. 13:1-18. |
| 25. Will be seen coming in glory.—Matt. 24:30. | 25. Will be seen cast into Hell.—Isaiah 14:15. |

The date and hour of the manifestation of the "man of sin" is unknown, but from the rising tide of "apostasy and lawlessness" now flooding the world, it would seem probable that millions now living will bow to this false Messiah, and be allowed to neither "buy or sell" without the mark of the Beast-King (Rev. 13:8-17; 1 John 2:18).

In the meantime the sure way to escape such awful experience and eternal doom, is to enter into covenant with the Eternal King of Glory before it is everlastingly too late (Heb. 12:24-29).

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart" (Psalm 119:11).

This week the following verse was submitted by E. H. Mellichamp, of Charleston, S. C.:

> "Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." (Psalms 37:3).

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

Book Reviews

THE WRESTLE OF RELIGION WITH TRUTH: By Henry Nelson Wieman, Ph. D. Cloth. Pp. 253. The Macmillan Company, New York City. Price, $2.50.

Religion is inclusive of all the intelligence that human nature can display. This is the thesis of Dr. Wieman's scholarly book, which endeavors to portray a remedy for the apparent cleavage between religion and truth.

The author's purpose is accomplished after a careful examination of the philosophy of religion in which he describes the method and essential concepts of religion. With these two things distinguished and defined Dr. Wieman puts religion in such a light as to reconcile it with truth. A clear impression is given the reader that the author is a true follower of the Master.

The book is intended, evidently, for the use of ministers and scholars, as it is not easy to read. To some lay minds it might appear that Dr. Wieman, a member of the faculty of a leading theological school, has troubled himself with a subject principally of academic interest. He has built up in an elaborate, convincing way, a rationalization of that which is generally accepted, namely: religion is inclusive of all the intelligence that human nature can display.

PROOF OF ROME'S POLITICAL MEDDLING IN AMERICA. Published by The Fellowship Forum, Washington, D. C. Pp. 153. Cloth. Price, $1.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND THE CITIZEN: By the Rev. John R. Ryan, in a series of Catholic Religious Books, edited by Hilaire Belloc. Pp. 95. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York City. Price, $1.

These two books coming at the present time may be regarded as pertinent to the wide-spread agitation over the possibility of a Roman Catholic President. Small in compass, they are dynamic in suggestion. Proof devotes one hundred and twenty-five pages to the bare recording of reports of the National Catholic Welfare Council, which speak more eloquently of Roman aims than any Protestant propaganda can. The limited space taken by the Fellowship Forum is startlingly punctuated by maps and diagrams that tell their own story. The delineation of the National Catholic Welfare Council is clearly outlined in the sketch which shows that organization to be equipped with six departments having a ramification of seventy-one divisions, all heading up in the Italian Apostolic Delegate in Washington. This organization through its Executive Department, and according to its own words, "Keeps in direct personal touch with the officials of the government from the President and Cabinet members to members of Congress". Any disclaimer of interference with the political life of the nation is at once set at rest by the statement on page fifty-seven, "The position of the Catholic Church in this country is one of great honor and of high prestige and even of reverence on the part of some non-Catholics. We are regarded by thinking men as the only salvation of the country—and this in a matter-of-fact, practical way. We have the Divine Truth that in turn safeguards our interpretation; of economics; of social questions. We believe that the intelligent, patient, kind presentation and expression of that Truth will prevail". One sickens at heart to have such an outpouring of mock humility. Who does not know that wherever that Church has had the power, it has coerced humanity by the very exquisite tortures of malignant sadism? Our radio programs announce lectures by eminent Romanists on "Tolerance". What a travesty!

Father Ryan's book is ably written. It had to be. But he is defensive all along the line. He knows that in Protestant America, the utmost diplomacy must be regarded. He seemingly covers the whole discussion in the affirmative, "No Pope has expressed the wish for a change in the present relation between Church and State in America; nor is any Pope likely to do so within any period of time that is of practical interest to this generation. The fundamental reason lies in the fact that a formal union is desirable and could be effective only in Catholic states. Only there does the Catholic doctrine on the union of Church and State find specific application". Quoting Father Pohle he adds: "When several religions have formally established themselves and taken root in the same territory, nothing else remains for the state than either to exercise tolerance towards them all, or, as conditions exist today, to make complete religious liberty for individuals and religious bodies a principle of government." This is all very plausible, because it has to be. The sinuosity of that vast ecclesiastical system is so discreetly adaptive that we never know when we touch the velvet glove if perchance the sharpened nails of inveterate hatred lie ready for use at command.

Many sentimental Christians will vote for Al. Smith on the ground of a broad charity. And so far as the man is concerned, his winning personality entitles him to such consideration. But it's the crowd behind him that we fear. The inch that would be won by this victory, would speedily lengthen into the ell of conquest. We do not forget the treatment accorded Mayor Mitchell and Comptroller Prendegast, both loyal sons of the Church, who, under a reform administration, dared to expose the tactics of the Catholic Protectory and the House of the Good Shepherd in New York City. Both were up for reelection; but they were so completely snowed under (it was the first election under woman suffrage) that John F. Hylan, an obscure lawyer of Brooklyn, stepped into the mayoralty with no conspicuous qualifications for that high office. But the Church got even with her recreant boys, and Ex-Mayor Mitchell's tragic death, not long after, seemed to sound a knell of judgment. There is no secret in the fact that at one time, every judicial appointment in New York City had to obtain the approval of Cardinal Farley. It may be so now.

But then, let us be sure that any aggregation of humans obtaining power over their fellows will rule with a high hand. The methods of the Anti-Saloon League are not above reproach. The Methodist Church has established headquarters in Washington for the purpose of lobbying, no doubt primarily in defence against Roman encroachments. And the Mormons control eleven States in the West, with a heavy hand on two others. And they are just as religiously moved to covet this land for their empire as the Romanists are to win it for the Pope. The Ku-Klux-Klan may be in a state of quietus at the present, but the spirit of nationalism in that and kindred bodies is keen for expression. So there we are, not ground between two mill-stones, but a number. Surely, we need Isaiah's promise, "They that erred in spirit shall come to understanding, and they that murmured shall learn doctrine". Only our good Lord is able to meet our desperate need.

LAY INFLUENCE AN OUTGROWTH OF THE PROTESTANT REFORMATION.

Mr. Editor:

The attempt that is being made to Romanize our beloved Church by destroying the Thirty-nine Articles presents, in one aspect, a very serious question of especial interest to laymen. I refer to the peril which lies in the belittling of the influence of the laity in the Church. I have seen little or no mention of this subject anywhere.

It is one of the glories of the Protestant Reformation that it wrested Church government out of that exclusive control that was exercised by clergymen during medieval times, and once more made the laity an influence and a power. The opening pages of our Prayer Book bear witness to this lay influence, for they recite that the book has been ratified by "the Bishops, the Clergy, and the Laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America". We also know of it in other ways Laymen sit in our diocesan conventions; our vestries are filled with business men; and the General Convention itself has a lower House, evenly divided as to numbers between clerical and lay representatives. Our Sunday-school teachers are nearly all laymen; laymen are found on our Standing Committees of the diocese and in the National Council. All this is contrary to the teacning and conception of the old Church before the Reformation —not the apostolic Church, where laymen seem to have had large influence—but that Church of the middle ages, which adopted the elaborate system of pope, cardinal, and archbishop, as superior to the ancient orders of bishop, priest and deacon.

Lay influence has been of incalculable benefit to all the Protestant Communions, and to the Protestant world generally. While we gladly and earnestly acknowledge and emphasize the magnificent work of untold thousands of the clergy—both famous bishops and evangelists, like Meade, Randolph, Brooks, Williams, Dix, Lyddon, Heber, Rowe, and others, as well as of quiet, useful hard-working but glorious rectors and assistants in obscure spots—we are not blind to the virtues and accomplishments of the laity. Laymen form a very healthy and moderating influence upon the clergy, as they usually have much less of that intense and overweening spirit of partisanship and ecclesiasticism which has so often been a blemish to both the priesthood and the episcopate. Moreover, laymen are generally much more skilled in matters of business than are clergymen, more practical, more abhorrent of unsound financial methods, and far more inclined to moderation and balance of judgment.

In spite of these advantages, lay influence has, generally speaking, been detested and distrusted by clergymen of the extreme Anglo-Catholic type. They are prone to hold high and extravagant views respecting the authority of bishops and priests. Many an Anglo-Catholic rector barely tolerates his vestry as a necessary evil, imposed upon the Church by the corporation law of the state. He treats vestrymen as an impertinence and an intrusion, and endeavors to reduce their influence to the smallest dimensions compatible with law. He is distrustful of lay teaching in the Sunday School. In the same way, he views his body of parishioners as chiefly useful for two things: (1) To form a congregation on Sundays, and (2) To raise money and keep the parish treasury full. Criticism and free inquiry from those in the pews are the last things in the world that he desires.

It calls for no argument to show that this is not the spirit that is likely to commend itself to the mass of the American people, accustomed to the working of free institutions and to large popular discussion. Our people look with deep distrust and suspicion upon a ruling class that arrogates to itself exclusive control, and that resents criticism. Since the days of Sir Edmund Andros, and indeed long before his time, arbitrary and autocratic rule has been unpopular in America; and an Episcopal parish priest who tries to rule his congregation in the spirit of an oriental despot is more than likely to preside over a very select and limited body of the faithful, where strong and active laymen are conspicuous by their absence. One of the odious results of extreme Anglo-Catholicism is the driving out from the church of many of the strongest, most intelligent, and most virile specimens of American manhood.

On the other hand, the loss of lay influence would have a blighting effect on the clergy themselves. Intelligent and vigorous criticism, couched in respectful though forcible terms, is one of the best antidotes against religious and spiritual pride and autocracy. One of the unpleasant sides of the priestly life is that it has ever been prone to fall into an attitude of haughtiness and arrogance. St. Peter, writing in his First Epistle, exhorts the elders of his day not to act as "being lords over God's heritage", showing that at that early date the leaven of wickedness had begun to work among the clergy. Malachi, some four hundred years or more earlier, had found it necessary to deliver a magnificent philippic against the worldliness and unspirntuality of the priesthood of the temple. The reading of his indignant message, even after the lapse of more than twenty centuries, does not fail to send a thrill through one's whole being. The "chief priests" were among our Lord's bitterest enemies, and their activities contributed heavily to Pilate's miserable yielding to the demands of the mob.

In Old Testament days, much though by no means all, of the finest and most spiritual prophecies, and most vigorous protests against idolatry and immorality came, not from the priesthood, but from laymen, who were filled with the spirit of prophecy as the Holy Ghost gave them utterance—Elijah, Ilisha, Isaiah, Amos, Haggai, and probably Micah, Zephaniah and many others. Anything that would tend in the slightest degree to the extravagant exaltation of the priesthood, and to the diminishing of lay influence would be nothing short of a stunning disaster to the Church and the cause of true religion.

The casting away of our splendid confession of faith as embodied in the Thirty-nine Articles would conduce strongly to just such a result. Those Articles and the truths for which they speak form a wall across the path of that party within our Church that is persistently and consistently at war with the great Reformation of the Sixteenth Century that sounded the death knell of exclusive priestly rule, and "that asserted the supreme dignity of the human soul in its communion with God, without the intervention of priest or confessional".

STATISTICS.

Mr. Editor:

For fully a third of a century our Conference of Church Workers Among Colored People has persistently maintained the contention that a more efficient method should be employed in Church extension among our group. The Conference has not only voiced the contention, but it has intimated the correct and most efficient method. But it has not been accepted. With the close of the Episcopate of Bishop Delany, in North Carolina, it is opportune that a brief review of the endeavor of the Church be made in that particular field. The Diocese of North Carolina is the centre of our oldest, and greatest, educational work. Therein we have St. Augustine's College, The Bishop Tuttle Training School, and St. Agnes Hospital. In addition, for the past ten years, that particular diocese has enjoyed the services of a Negro Suffragan Bishop, and its colored parishes have sustained union with the regular diocesan convention. It is not necessary for me to indulge in any comment, only I desire to give some statistics, from official sources, which carry their own comment.

For the year 1900, twenty-eight years ago, the following statistics were reported: Colored clergy, 7; communicants, 549; Sunday-school scholars, 911; contributions, $2.-130.65.

For the year 1928: Colored clergy, 9; communicants, 855; Sunday-school scholars, 1,050; contributions, $7,548.52.

With the well-known affectionate and sympathetic interest Bishop Cheshire has ever taken in this particular work, these statistics eloquently proclaim the need of a more efficient plan of administration. Few, if any, of the Southern States, in recent years, have out-distanced the State of North Carolina, in the material and educational progress of its colored population. Why should not the Church more largely share in this progress?

"PREACH THE WORD OF GOD."

Mr. Editor:

I am one of the so-called underpaid clergymen. When I first came to this work my salary was $450 per year, the second year it was $500. It is now $2,500, from which I pay all of my home expenses. Out of this salary I bought the home, maintain an automobile, buy all my papers, except one, and keep up three organization dues. It keeps one tied pretty close to finance. I also have to raise through my own and the efforts of the congregation $1,700 of the salary. You can see by this I have my own anxieties. But, there is one thing to bear in mind that no class of people in any line of effort can ever expect to escape life's toil, expecting full compensation for value given. When you begin to compare salaries of all classes taking each individual separately you will find that with very few exceptions most of the people have to go without. Then the very best development in life comes from a struggle. Adversity is man's opportunity to bring out the best that is within him. The life of Jesus did not inspire man with the idea that the ministry would be rich in this world's goods.

If the Church expects to save souls there must be suffering. A wealthy Church does not mean a soul-saving Church. Wherever a church has a large endowment, unless its charities demand all its income, and no demand is made upon the congregation for support, it decays. The church is not made up of lands, buildings and wealth; it is made up of souls. It is true that many men of ability are in a wrong position, but that is also found in all walks of life. We must all remember that positions are not made for man. Man makes the position. There is a great amount of injustice, but that is not only found among the clergy.

We do not all have the same opportunity or characteristics for success and never will. I, for one, have been, wth God's blessing and with the assistance of a good, consecrated lady, trying to make my little corner for nearly twenty-nine years in the church a success, so far as helping others to see the Light in Jesus Christ. I have tried to draw souls to Christ and have found life's burdens lightened and many phases made smooth. I think if some of the clergy would try to make more practical efforts in the saving of souls, comforting the sick and suffering and healing the wounded, they would find that the living will take care of itself. God will provide where earnest, honest efforts are made to preach the Word of God.

THE LORD TURNED AND LOOKED UPON PETER.

In evil long I took delight,
Unawed by shame or fear.
Till a new object struck my sight
And stopped my wild career.

I saw one hanging on a tree,
In agonies and blood,
Who fixed his languid eyes on me,
As near His cross I stood.

Sure, never to my latest breath,
Can I forget that look;
It seemed to charge me with His death,
Though not a word He spoke.

A second look He gave, which said,
"I freely all forgive;
This blood is for thy ransom paid;
I die that thou mayst live".

Thus, while His death my sin displays
In all its balkest hue,
Such is the mystery of grace,
It seals my pardon, too.

—John Newton.

Church Intelligence

Remarkable Assembly of Colonial Church Views.

Some few years ago, Mr. Francis Marion Wigmore of Washington, D. C., bought an old Virginia estate on the Potomac not far from Accotink in Fairfax County. Making this estate his residence during the summer months, Mr. Wigmore began attending services in Old Pohick Church in Truro Parish. He was soon made a vestryman, and took an active part in the extensive restoration work which had been so effectively accomplished along the Georgian lines planned by General George Washington, who was its architect in 1769.

Through this contact with Pohick, Mr. Wigmore became deeply interested in the subject of Virginia Colonial Churches in general, and this interest has developed into fond hopes that many of them may be eventually restored to their original simple and dignified designs, and again become centers of usefulness in the propagation of the Gospel.

As an initial step towards the accomplishment of these hopes, Mr. Wigmore, some months ago, employed a government photographer (while on vacation) and with a like minded friend, Mr. Robert S. Jones of Alexandria, made a tour of Eastern Virginia with the photographer, visiting practically all of the Colonial Churches in the two dioceses. Extensive photographic equipment was carried in cases strapped to a rack covering the top of his automobile.

At each church some half a dozen or more pictures were taken. In many cases, excellent interior views were obtained. A remarkable instance of this is the case of Christ ("King Carter") Church, Lancaster County, whose interior has never been changed from the time of its erection.

Many photographs of Colonial communion silver were secured, and also detail views, of door ways, and inscriptions on tablets and monuments.

Mr. Wigmore is having colored lantern slides made from the negatives, and so at each place he made careful notes as to the color of the bricks, and as to the kinds of trees and shrubs shown in the photographs.

He is also having large sized picture postcards made, and at the base of each card is placed a brief historical "legend". For example, under a view of the Eastern Shore Chapel in Princess Anne County, appears the following:

> "In October, 1753, Mr. Joseph Mitchell, of Norfolk, contracted to build the Chapel and undertook to finish it by Christmas, 1754, for 324 pounds 10 shillings, sterling. It was actually finished and received by the Vestry, March 12, 1755."

As the legend on each view differs from every other legend, one can gain an insight as to the great extent of the research into local history which has been made in each case. This research is still going on, so the work is as yet far from being finished.

Judge B. D. White is preparing notes for Mr. Wigmore, so that proper "legends" may be composed for the several views of Old Donation in Lynnhaven Parish.

A handsome album, inscribed in gold leaf letters, "To the Bishop of Southern Virginia", has been prepared and presented. One just like it has been sent to the Bishop of Virginia. In these albums have been mounted copies of these cards so far as they have been finished. Blank spaces have been left for further cards, which will be sent to the Bishops when completed.

Mr. Wigmore makes the generous offer that he will permit the use of his negatives by any Colonial Church whose vestry may desire to have cards made to sell to visitors, for the purpose of obtaining a revenue for church repair and restoration.

It is in the mind of Mr. Wigmore to start (through revenue to be derived from lantern slide lectures) a Central Fund for the restoration of these historic landmarks.

He deserves the thanks and cooperation of all of the vestries of Colonial churches, in respect to this work to which he has devoted so much time and labor, and for which he has gone to such great expense.

Letters addressed as follows will reach him: Mr. Francis Marion Wigmore, 2029 Connecticut Ave., Washington, D. C.

Mr. Wigmore has a brother who is the author of certain law books, widely known and used by the legal profession.

Figures of Church Membership.

Census reports of the United States government show, in Continental United States, 1,858,966 members of the Protestant Episcopal Church thirteen years old and over in 1926, compared with 1,092,821 in 1916, an apparent gain of 766,145 in the ten years, or nearly seventy-one per cent. The figures are fallacious, however, as those for 1926 include all baptized person over thirteen years old on the church rolls, while those for 1916 included only the confirmed. The census report says that even after making this allowance, there evidently has been a considerable increase in the membership of this Church. Probably it has about kept pace with the increase of population, which in the ten years was from 100,000,000 to 117,000,000, or about seventeen per cent.

A discouraging revelation of the figures is the decrease in number of Sunday-school scholars, from 489,036 in 1916 to 479,430 in 1926, although the number of officers and teachers of Sunday schools had increased from 55,918 to 58,374. Of the 7,299 churches in 1926 Sunday Schools were connected with 5,607. The number of Episcopal Churches showed a decrease of forty-six in the ten years, probably caused by the combination of parishes, facilitated by the automobile, in rural sections and forced by encroachments of business on residential neighborhoods in the larger cities. Of all Episcopal churches in the country 3,793 were urban, in communities of more than 2,500 population. Total expenditures for 1926 by and for Episcopal churches were $44,790,000, almost exactly twice those of 1916 and of the total amount in 1926 the cost of current expenses and improvements was $35,793,000, while the remainder went for benevolences and missions.

The Presbyterian Church, in its various branches, in the United States gained 282,779 members, increasing membership from 1,611,251 in 1916 to 1,894,030. It, too, lost heavily in number of churches, the decrease being 692, from the total of 8,947 in 1916. Of these churches 3,289 were urban, a somewhat smaller proportion than that of the Episcopalians, Presbyterian Sunday Schools showed increase from 1,381,682 scholars and 140,752 teachers and officers to 1,407,298 and 141,333, respectively. Practically all Presbyterian Churches reported Sunday Schools attached. Total expenditures in this denomination in 1926 were $63,230,000, including over $47,000,000 for current expenses and improvements. The Southern group of this Church reported for 1926 a total of 3,469 churches and 451,043 members, compared with 3,365 churches and 357,769 members in 1916, showing that this denomination is gaining faster, in proportion, in the South than elsewhere in the country. The Sunday Schools of the Presbyterians also gained rapidly in the ten years in the South, increasing from 32,312 officers and teachers and 313,165 scholars to 37,496 and 367,735. Expenditures in the Southern churches were $15,612,398 in 1926, compared with $5,809,909 in 1916. The expenditure in 1926 included $10,824,000 for current expenses and improvements. Of the total membership in the South 270,188 were in urban and 180,885 in rural churches and the number of urban churches was 920.

A simple sum in long division shows the average membership of Episcopal churches in the country at 254; average Sunday-school membership, scholars, 65.

Are Quotas a Mystery?

It has been stated more than once that the quotas allotted by General Convention for the General Church Budget were determined by a method impossible of comprehension, by the average person. This method is one recommended by the Board of Missions and the National Council and adopted by three successive General Conventions. In order that the leaders of the Church might know all of the details of the method, a statement was sent early this year to each Bishop and to other diocesan officials showing exactly how the quota for the General Church Budget is figured for that diocese. Copies of this statement can be had upon request to the National Council.

The quota system now in use is as follows:

From each diocese is secured an official statement of the total "Current Expenses" of its parishes and missions for the three preceding years. "Current Expenses" are defined in the "Parochial Report" adopted by General Convention. The yearly average of total "Current Expenses in each diocese is then divided by the number of parishes and missions in that diocese thus giving the average "Current Expenses" of the parishes. This figure is then divided into classes of $1,000 each, all over $4,000 being put into the fifth class. In some few dioceses the average is under $1,000 and that diocese is therefore in the first class only, others reach the first and second only, etc.

The figures for each class thus obtained are multiplied by the number of parishes and missions in the diocese and multiplied again by the determined percentage for that class. The quota is the sum of the results in the several classes. The percentages for the various classes are the same for all dioceses and are established by action of National Council and General Convention. Any other scale of percentages could be adopted.

Miss Emily C. Tillotson.

Miss Emily C. Tillotson died early Saturday morning, May 12, in St. Luke's Hospital, New York, after a lingering illness. Bishop Lloyd had the funeral service Monday morning in Calvary Church, New York.

Miss Tillotson was born in Farmington, Conn. She devoted her entire life to Church work. After a few years in the Diocese of Southern Ohio, she became educational secretary for the National Woman's Auxiliary in 1914, and remained in that office until her death. She conducted conferences and led study classes all over the country, traveling extensively. She was one of the best loved among the Church leaders. A part of her work that interested her particularly was her membership on various educational committees composed of representatives of other communions; but it is by her work with study classes that she has been most widely known. She once said in a modest summary of her own work, "We are glad to feel that through the medium of mission study classes many women hitherto uninterested have received an impetus toward fuller service for the Church."

All of One Mind.

Hon. C. L. Marsilliot,
Exchange Building,
Memphis, Tenn.

Dear Sir:

We are returning herewith petition, signed by almost all of our Church members, which shows beyond all doubt that ST. MATTHIAS' CHURCH is, without exception, very strongly in favor of the retention of the Thirty-Nine Articles in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

We are only a Mission, but every signer herewith is an adult, and repsents the unanimous opinion of the loyal Episcopalians of this community.

We sincerely hope the interest and enthusiasm of every section of the country will be aroused and take this same action, as it will certainly wake us up and put this Good Old Church at the head of the list, where it properly belongs.

We need more things like this to stir us to really do things.

Assuring you that it has been a real pleasure to this small part of the work and hoping the movement meets with general favor and goes over successfully, I beg to remain,

Social Service Conference.

There was from May 2 to 6 the eighth national conference on Social Service of the Episcopal Church held in Memphis, Tenn. Members came from twenty-seven dioceses. Among the twenty or more "Kindred Groups", which dovetail their sessions into those of the National Conference of Social Work, the Episcopal Church Social Service group and the Church Mission of Help continue to be the only Church groups of any communion.

Officers elected were: President, the Rev. Mr. Lathrop; First Vice-President, the Rev. C. B. K. Weed; Second Vice-President, the Very Rev. H. H. Lumpkin; Secretary, the Rev. Hiram R. Bennett.

The aim of Christian Social Service is primarily to awaken and develop Christian consciousness in a community. The purpose of the meeting was to exchange ideas, to learn about methods, for the mutual benefit of the various dioceses and the national department.

Speakers included Mr. Lathrop, who outlined the projects which the Department encourages for their value in developing social consciousness, work for jails and almshouses, work with social agencies; and mentioned the activities carried on by the Department. A new study course, "Building the City of God", is in preparation. A division was established last January, on Industrial Relations, with Mr. Spencer Miller as consultant.

The achievements in the dioceses are classified as follows: Parish committees, discussion groups, conferences, use of literature, use of diocesan paper, reading courses, cooperation with religious bodies, with secular agencies, budget increased, a file of interested individuals, study of institutions, of moving pictures, guild of social workers, social hygiene, jail work.

Their obstacles include: Uninterested clergy ("plenty", answers one diocese), uninformed clergy, faulty social service commission because of preoccupation, remoteness, indifference, etc., inadequate budget, no budget, no secretary, great distances to cover, brief tenures of clergy, reactionaries.

Suggestions were made that next year's conference program should include consideration of the care of the mentally ill, and the question of Church institutions, how to use large endowments for institutions in views of the modern attitude toward institutional life.

At the conference luncheon Wednesday noon, in the absence of Bishop Gailor and Bishop Maxon, Dean Noe of the Cathedral in Memphis, and the Rev. Dr. C. F. Blaisdell, rector of Calvary Church, where the conference's early services were held, welcomed the conference to Memphis. The president of the great National Conference of Social Work, Mr. Sherman C. Kingsley, spoke of the passing of that conception which divides life into "sacred" and "secular", and commended the sacramental idea, in the light of which social work seeks to transform all life, a speech which was the more interesting because the distinguished president is said not to be affiliated with any religious body and frankly discounts the value of the Church in social work.

The Rev. Hiram R. Bennett told of activities in a town where its five parishes are so united that they act as a unit, the keynote of their program being cooperation in every way possible with the social agencies, and with the other religious bodies as far as their cooperation can be secured.

On the second day of the conference there was a luncheon talk by the Rev. James H. George, city missioner in St. Louis, a paper by the Rev. Dr. Percy G. Kammerer, Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, on social service in a downtown parish, and papers by Dr. Frank J. Bruno, of Washington University, St. Louis, and the Rev. Pryor M. Grant, of New York, on the relation of the Church and social work.

Dr. Hastings H. Hart, of the Sage Foundation, has for fifty years been working to improve conditions in jails and to interest the indifferent public in those conditions. He told the conference something of the most flagrant evils, and the worst obstacles to their removal, chief among the latter being the lack of a sense of responsibility on the part of ordinary every-day people toward their own local jail; the subject is conspicuous among the "negligences and ignorances" of many otherwise good citizens

Canon Nelson, of Louisville, told of some experiences, and their underlying principles, in using parish discussion groups on social questions as a means to social action, and to awaken the socially indifferent.

Discussion centered on whether the Christian group should act and speak as a group, or only by means of its individual members. It is frequently said that the Church should not attempt to deal with economic problems, and furthermore that the members even of one parish often cannot agree as to what attitude should be taken toward any given question. A North Carolina official said, "Can we sit by and let industry exploit our people while we make no stronger remonstrance than that of individuals? How can the Church speak? What does Christianity mean to the members of a community that the community is inarticulate in the face of outrageous wrong"?

Something in Dr. Kammerer's paper led to a discussion of publicity methods. Mr. Edward Parker and Dr. Duncan Browne considered a professional, trained newspaper man a necessity.

"The Church and Social Work" is a source of endless discussion, involving the nature and function of the Church, the proper sphere, much debated, of social work, the manifold definitions of social service.

It became apparent at last year's conference that a discussion of the nature of sin, especially in its relation to social work, might clear the air of a number of confusing ideas. The Rev. Norman B. Nash, of the Cambridge Theological School, with a paper on this subject, opened a vigorous discussion.

The Rural Worker was the subject considered on Saturday at the conference luncheon, under the auspices of the Church Mission of Help. With Mr. Walter Pettit, of the New York School of Social Work as chairman, the discussion was led by Miss Mary E. Lucas, Field Secretary of that much initialed body, A. A. O. F. S. W., the American Association for Organized Family Social Work. The occasion was considerably enlivened by the reading of a telegram from President Bell of St. Stephen's College, announcing the awarding of the degree of Doctor of Divinity to Dean Lathrop; also by the arrival of Bishop Green.

Bishop Green told briefly of the adventure he had just had in a rural community in Mississippi, where a community revival had been in progress during the past three or four years. After the Methodists, Baptists, and others had each had charge of the event, this was "Episcopal year", with the Bishop as revivalist. He preached every evening for a week in the Baptist church, and every morning in the courthouse. He improved the occasion to deliver some downright educational material, with results beyond his expectation, and reports his conviction that the Episcopal Church has a boundless opportunity to get below religious controversies and above religious entanglements and provide sound principles of right thinking and right living to which there would be a deep and hearty response on the part of the people.

Bishop Casady, chaplain of the conference, had a service Saturday night and the early celebration on Sunday, and preached at the later service on Sunday, which closed the conference.

The National Conference of Social Work held its sesions in the evenings and the Church Conference sessions were in the afternoons.

The big conference had more than a hundred groups and classes in the twelve great divisions of this, its fifty-fifth annual meeting, with a registration of more than two thousand.

Woman's Auxiliary.

The thirty-eighth annual meeting of the Virginia Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary was held from Tuesday evening, May 1, to Thursday noon, May 3, in beautiful, new, St. Paul's Church, of which the Rev. Noble Powell is rector at University, Va.

A brief opening business session, Tuesday evening, was followed by a missionary mass meeting, when the address of Dr. Grafton Burke, of Hudson Stuck Memorial Hospital, touched the hearts and minds of the large congregation.

Wednesday morning the Rev. Dennis Whittle conducted a devotional half hour, followed immediately by the service of Holy Communion with Bishop H. St. George Tucker as celebrant. A business meeting occupied the remainder of the morning. At noon prayers were said, after which Bishop Tucker gave a helpful address. At one o'clock luncheon was served to every one present with St. Paul's Branch as hostesses.

In the afternoon Dr. Montague, Archdeacon Neve, the Mountain missionaries and Mrs. Edmund Lee addressed the meeting. Another business session and a mass meeting for Juniors were then held. Wednesday evening there was a second missionary mass meeting, the Rev. Takamatsu, D. D., of St. Mary's, Kyoto, Japan, giving an address upon Christianity and other religions in Japan.

The final session convened Thursday morning at half-past nine with Morning Prayer conducted by the Rev. Noble Powell. The concluding business meeting and conferences followed till noon, when the Rev. Mr. Gibson of Christ Church, Charlottesville, conducted intercessions. Reports of committees and announcements of the annual election of diocesan officers, also the election of delegates to the General Convention, with alternates, being acted upon, Miss Davis expressed much regret over the resignation of Mrs. E. L. Woodward, Secretary of the Richmond Convocation. Mrs. Picot was assigned in Mrs. Woodward's place. Happiness prevailed over the election of Mrs. H. St. George Tucker as honorary vice-president of the Virginia Branch. Adjournment followed closing prayers by Bishop Tucker, to meet next year at The Plains.

Before disbanding, however, the entire company were luncheon guests of Christ Church Branch, Charlottesville, in St. Paul's wonderful parish house. This annual meeting was blessed with great inspiration, ideal weather and most gracious hospitality.

Resolution.

Be it resolved, That, With a deep sense of gratitude for the inspiration to Christian thinking and living which has been the unfailing gift of the Theological Seminary in Virginia to the members of the Protestant Episcopal Church throughout the course of the Seminary's life, we, the members of Albemarle Convocation in the Diocese of Virginia in meeting assembled in Grace Church, Bremo Bluff, desire to express our unbounded confidence in the members of the present faculty of the Seminary and to assure them that it is with thanksgiving to God that we have received the recent reports of the remarkable increase both in the enrollment of students in the institution and in the missionary activity both of the student body and the graduates therefrom. Furthermore, we, who in our respective fields of work, are confronted by the actualities in thought and life of the twentieth century world, wish to record our appreciation of the spirit in which the members of the present faculty of the Seminary, with real faith in God, are fearlessly meeting the problems of theological reconstruction which the age demands and through their interpretation of the eternal gospel are giving to those whose privilege it is to be numbered among their pupils, the Living Christ for the Life of Today.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of our Convocation and copies sent the several Church papers with request that it be published.

Jamestown-Williamsburg Pilgrimage.

The seventh annual Jamestown-Williamsburg pilgrimage for Episcopal Churchmen will take place June 9 and 10, under the auspices of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for the purpose of celebrating the Holy Communion at the Robert Hunt Shrine in Jamestown, commemorating the first communion held on American soil. It originated seven years ago, when the Norfolk Assembly of the Brotherhood conducted the first pilgrimage. Richmond and other cities have subsequently joined in the annual affair which has become statewide.

The Rt. Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, Bishop of New York, will conduct the services this year, in conjunction with the Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, D. D., rector of Bruton Parish Church.

Through the courtesy of Dr. J. A. C. Chandler, President of William and Mary College, the pilgrims will be accommodated in the college dormitories. Meals will be served at the college dining hall.

While the pilgrimage is conducted by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, it is open to all Churchmen, whether or not members of the Brotherhood or of the Episcopal Church.

The trip will be made in automobiles furnished by the pilgrims. Each church is requested to arrange for transportation of its members and other Churchmen accompanying them. Men taking cars who will have any extra seats are requested to notify the local chairman so that other men who may not have transportation may be accommodated.

The cost for Richmond pilgrims will be $3.75, which includes lodging and meals at the college and the incidental expenses of the pilgrimage. The registration fee should be paid to Mr. Everard Meade, Jr., on Saturday afternoon before leaving Richmond.

Registrations must be made on or before June 1. Prompt registration is necessary in order that proper arrangements may be made at the college for the reception of the pilgrims.

The General Pilgrimage Chairman is Richard P. Winston. The Richmond Assembly Committee consists of D. Mc. Thornton, Jr., Chairman; C. Braxton Valentine, Everard Meade, Jr., Frank C. Wood, Robert L. Brown, Claude M. Henley.

Local church chairmen are as follows: All Saints, D. Mc. Thornton, Jr.; Ascension, Rev. P. A. Arthur; Christ Church, Rev. Pembroke Reed; Emmanuel, T. Crawford Redd; Epiphany, Thos. Armstrong; Good Shepherd, P. F. Shelton; Grace and Holy Trinity, Everard Meade, Jr.; Holy Comforter, Herbert Mercer; Meade Memorial, L. H. O God the King of Glory, Who hast exalted Thine only Son, Jesus Christ, with great triumph unto Thy kingdom in heaven; We beseech Thee, leave us not comfortless, but send to us Thine Holy Ghost to comfort us: and exalt us unto the same place whither our Saviour Christ is gone before. ### A NEW EARTH.

"God grant us wisdom in these coming days,
And eyes unsealed, that we clear visions see
Of that new world that He would have us build,
To life's ennoblement and His high ministry.

"God give us sense—God-sense of life's new needs,
And souls aflame with new-born chivalries
To cope with those black growths that foul the ways.
To cleanse our poisoned founts with God-born energies.

"To pledge our souls to nobler, loftier life,
To win the world to His fair sanctities,
To bind the nations in a pact of peace,
And free the soul of life for finer loyalties.

"Not since Christ died upon His lonely cross
Has time such prospect held of life's new birth;
Not since the world of chaos first was born
Has man so clearly visaged hope of a new earth.

"Not of our own might can we hope to rise
Above the ruts and soilures of the past,
But, with His help who did the first earth build,
With hearts courageous we may fairer build this last."

—John Oxenham.

What Is Truth?

This question is not as simple as it may seem and in fact it is one of the deepest problems of philosophy. However, truth enters so vitally into all our thoughts and actions that it may be worth while to do a little close thinking about it. In a general way it may be said that truth is a state of mind in which our ideas correspond with their objects, our thoughts with things. Truth is right realtions with reality. Truth is concord with the universe. Truth is harmony with God.

These statements, however, call for further examination and closer analysis and understanding. When we say that truth is the correspondence of our ideas with their objects, or of our perceptions with things, we are not to suppose that there is anything like a literal copy or image of the object in our mind. We may see what appears to be an oblong red disk, but clearly there is nothing oblong in shape or red in color in our consciousness. On looking again we may see that the object is not oblong but round and not red but green. We are now seeing it from a different point of view and in a different light. Even when we first see it the object is a state of mind or experience: we have constructed and interpreted it, we have formed a judgment of what it is, and every piece of knowledge is an act of judgment. On further examination we are forced to reconstruct and reinterpret the object so as to bring it into harmony with our larger experience; and so we may keep on remodeling and reinterpreting it until we get an idea of it that will fit in with all our experience and work under all circumstances. We now see that truth is such a construction and interpretation of our experience of an object as holds good under all our growing light and life. This view replaces ideas as literal copies of objects with a deeper view.

The psychologists work this view out for us. Many unreflecting minds still hold to the "copy" idea of truth. "They fancy," says Professor Munsterberg, "that truth is only a kind of photograph copy of outer reality. They are not aware that every so-called truth is a remodeling of life impressions, a reconstruction of experience, a free creation of the intellect, which can never be severed from the purposes of the creating mind". There is thus a large subjective element in the construction of truth, and we see things not only as they are but also as we are. We shape and color our perceptions and interpretations of reality with the contents and moods of our own minds. There is no escaping this subjective process, but we need to watch and guide and guard it that it does not misrepresent and distort the objective reality.

Our ideas of reality are thus our interpretations of it and they are true in proportion to the degree in which they work and enable us to use it. When they will not fit into our experience and will not work we say they are not true; and we say they are true when they do fit and work. If we interpret a white powder as being common salt it will work one way with us, and if we interpret it as being arsenic it will work another way, and on a correct interpretation of it may depend life or death. This view of truth as subjective interpretation does not in the least deny the existence of the objective reality and does not release us from honestly endeavoring to perceive and construct and interpret it according to its real nature, but it does give us a closer view of truth as such a subjective construction and interpretation of reality as will enable us to use it under all conditions.

This view of truth enables us to see the relation of theory to fact. A theory is a tentative explanation or interpretation of a fact and therefore enters into the very nature and constitution of the fact itself. It is sometimes said that we may hold to a fact as a fact and that our theory of it is relatively independent of it and therefore unimportant. The fact of the atonement, for example, is said to be the vital thing, and our theory of it makes little or no difference. But a theory is a part of the fact and may easily be the most important aspect of it. "Fancy with fact," as Browning says, "is just one fact the more." In theory sight passes into insight. Our theory as to whether the death of a man is due, to disease, or accident, or suicide, or murder, makes all the difference in the world as to the nature of the fact. Our theory about the Great War determines the very root and cause of it as we see it. Theory and fact cannot be separated, but are constituent elements of the reality in question. The bare fact of a printed sentence is simply a series of curiously-shaped black marks on a white page, but the meaning of these marks is immensely the most important part of the fact and is its very soul. Fact and theory, outer form and inner meaning, must go together and both form and meaning in their union constitute the entire fact. In any given case of fact there may be a bony skeleton or hard core of reality that does not change but remains fixed through all theories about it, and on this ultimate deposit of reality all theorists may agree. In the case of the dead man the fact that he is dead stands the same whether his death was caused by disease, or accident, or suicide, or murder. All readers of a sentence may agree as to the form of the words, but disagree widely as to their meaning; that is, they differ as to what the real fact is. Though we may isolate the skeleton of a fact, yet the fact in all its relations cannot be isolated, but shoots our roots and branches and filaments, causes and consequences, that impinge on the frontiers of the universe and wrap themselves around the center and core of ultimate reality. One truth thus involves all truth, and we are beginning to catch a glimpse of the complexity and infinitude of truth and see how in its shoreless maze and mystery and unplumbed depths each one can take in only one little angle or segment of it and others may see other aspects of it. The little circle of the individual eye cannot embrace and comprehend the great circle of the universe and of God. This is the truth expressed in Tennyson's "Flower in the crannied wall',' which if we could "understand root and all and all in all", we "should know what God and man is".

We also see at this point the relation of truth and experience. These two are sometimes put in opposition to each other and it is said that we may have knowledge of a subject without experience of it, as we may have knowledge of a foreign country without experience of it through personal visitation. Such a distinction may be loosely held for practical purposes, but it does not strictly hold. Our knowledge of a subject is itself experience of that subject as far as it goes. The truth in the distinction is that we may hold a truth only as an intellectual experience without carrying it into fuller experience by practicing it. Experience is philosophically defined by Webster as "the sum total of the conscious events which compose an individual life", and Webster quotes James Ward as saying, "All that we know and feel and do, all our facts and theories, all our emotions and ideals and ends, may be included in this one term—experience". Any knowledge of a fact or faith in a creed is so much experience, but it may need to be deepened and enriched by the further experience of practice.

Truth as interpretation is a process of gradual and repeated construction of our experience by the method of trial and error. Each new view works until it falls out of relation to wider experience and then it is reconstructed into closer harmony with other truth. The Copernican theory of astronomy illustrates this on a grand scale, and any current scientific theory is passing through the same process. Such interpretation is also a social process in which many minds must engage and cooperate and often through long periods of time. It took a hundred years to settle the heliocentric theory of the solar system on a solid basis, and an eminent authority has said that it will take two hundred years to work the Einstein theory of relativity out into its ultimate form and general agreement. No one thinker can settle a great truth, but many other thinkers must work it through and confirm it. A great truth, like a great cathedral, may be the work of generations in rising from its foundation to its finished tower. Truth is a social process and product.

This view also enables us to see why men so generally and widely differ in their beliefs of what is true, for they differ endlessly in the width and depth and richness of their total experience and this enters into and in a degree determines their views of truth and turns the world into "a dust of systems and of creeds". This necessary diversity should lead us to try to see truth from other men's points of view and to exercise great patience and sympathy and charity towards those who differ from us.—Presbyterian Banner.

ATTAINMENT.

Rebecca Turner Johnston.

Not the words that are spoken,
But the words that are left unsaid:
Not the perfection of feathered grace,
But the flash of wings o'er head.
No carefully worded thesis
Ever held us with half such thrall
As some fragment of truth, age-hallowed,
From impassioned lips let fall.

The completed song is never so sweet
As some line at random heard.
Or some distant strain of melody,
That faintly the echoes stirred.
Our best is ever our briefest,
Unfinished our richest lays;
Imperfect our fairest creations,
A cloud on our sunniest days.

Perhaps in the mighty For Ever,
The bird in its beauty we'll see,
Hear the whole of the song that thrilled us,
Learn the lilt of the melody;
Our best grow better and better
Sweeter and richer our days
Mayhap we may e'en reach perfection,
One of these cloudless days.

Immanence.

"Where is thy God? they ask of me,
As if it were their thought that He,
Like mortal, should be found to be
In some one spot.

"Ah, that their eyes thus sightless are!
Do they not see the world afar,
The mountain height, the sparkling star,
The lowly cot,

"The babbling brook, the flowers fair,
The sun, the sea, the living air—
Ah, could they tell me anywhere
That God is not?"

PRAY—GIVE—GO.

Three things the Master hath to do,
And we who serve Him here below,
And long to see His Kingdom come,
May pray, or give, or go.

He needs them all—the open hand,
The willing feet, the asking heart—
To work together and to weave
The threefold cord that shall not part.

Nor shall the giver count his gift
As greater than the worker's deed,
Nor he in turn his service boast
Above the prayers that voice the need.

Not all can go, not all can give
To earn the others for the fray;
But young or old, or rich or poor
Or strong or weak—we all can pray.

Pray that the full hands open wide
To speed the message on its way;
That those who hear the call may go,
And—pray that other hearts may pray.

What the Clock Knew.

"Paul, dear, will you take this hot soup to old Mrs. Barnes, please? She is ill again, you know, and has no one to make the things she ought to have."

"Oh, pshaw!" Paul stamped his feet. "I'm always carrying things over to that old lady. I want to build a house for my turtle. Why can't you take it this time?"

Paul's mother said nothing, but the smile left her eyes as she put on her coat and hat and went out with the soup.

After she had gone, Paul started to make the house for his turtle. Nothing went right, and somehow he didn't seem to care as much about building it as he had. After several attempts, he curled up in the big chair before the old-fashioned stove in the kitchen, and felt very unhappy indeed.

The shining tea-kettle was singing merrily. Paul could see himself reflected in its fat sides. It was not a pleasant picture at all. The Paul in the tea-kettle was broader than he was long, and looked like a dwarf—an ugly one, too, with a frowning face. Suddenly the tea-kettle began to sing:

Did 'ja ev-er see
Such a n-augh-ty boy?
He's papa's pride, and
He's ma-ma's joy.
But he wouldn't take
A pail of soup
To the poor old lady
Who has the croup!
S-h-a-m-e, S-h-a-m-e, S-h-a-m-e,
Sh—Sh—Sh.

Paul felt very uncomfortable and looked guiltily around to see if any one else had heard the tea-kettle's disgraceful song. Apparently the sink had, for one of the faucets replied:

Y-o-u-said it, y-o-u-said it.
Drip, drip. drip.

And the old clock on the wall added soberly:

Too-bad, so sad,
Tick, tick, tick.

Paul felt his face and ears growing red. He did wish the kitchen would attend to its own affairs, or talk about some one else for a change. But the tea-kettle continued:

Shouldn't you think
He'd like to go
On errands for those
Who love him so?
He's a sad-ly sel-fish lit-tle boy!
S-h-a-m-e, S-h-a-m-e, S-h-a-m-e.

The reflection of Paul in the kettle's fat sides scowled and looked very angry, but the hot-water faucet, not a bit frightened, piped up:

I've heard it said,
When he's a-bed
The fam-ly breathes
Quite freely.

The cold-water faucet answered:

Indeed-my dear,
It's-very queer,
What makes-them-keep him—really.

Paul, who was most unhappy, looked up at the old clock, hoping that it would say something to help him. It began:

'Tis love-you-know,—

Paul, who was most unhappy, looked up to say, because just then some one kissed him lightly on the forehead:

"Why, Paul, you were sound asleep," said his mother.

"Oh, mother," he cried, jumping up, "I'm so sorry about that soup! Please forgive me."

"All right, dearier. You may set the table for dinner, just to show how sorry you are, if you like."

Paul did "like", and he made several trips to the stove while he was doing it, to look at the reflection in the old tea-kettle's fat, sleek sides. The boy he saw there was smiling happily, and the hot-water faucet winkd at the cold-water faucet, and whispered:

The clock—he knew
What love—can do,
Drip, drip, drip.

Grandma Kate's May-Basket.

The boys of Glenville always called Miss Kate "grandma". That was because she was aged, white-haired, and always treated them to cookies, candies and cakes just as did their truly grandmas. If any one had asked them whom they liked best outside their own crowd, they would have unhesitatingly answered, "Grandma Kate".

They had adopted her in a way. They ran her errands, and now that she was too old to go to church, they told her about Mr. Jason's sermons and about their Sunday School.

The last of April, while on the ball lot, Vincent proposed that they try hanging May baskets as usual on the first of May.

"Pshaw," Bruce objected, "we're too big this year."

"Hanging flowers is all very well for girls; let them do it!" Raymond decided, while the whole crowd agreed with him.

"But Grandma Kate! We can't leave her out," Vincent protested.

"No, we can't do that," the boys agreed, convinced that they must remember their kindly friend on the first of May, perhaps with a ladylike basket of flowers, as of yore.

About this time Raymond noticed Vincent.

"You've got an idea, Vinnie. What's it? Quick!"

Vincent, who had become rather noted among them for new plans, didn't answer out loud, but whispered first to one; then another; and then another. Soon the whole six boys were quietly but excitedly planning something which would make Grandma Kate sit up and listen!

The plan would be somewhat expensive; would cost more than anything that they had yet done. However, they had the whole of the day, Saturday, in which to work it out. And work it out they did.

Vincent got a job digging up Mrs. Claxton's garden; Raymond cleaned out his mother's cellar; John cleaned up Judge Gale's back yard; Willard delivered groceries; while James and Donald ran errands for neighbors.

It was after six when the boys met by agreement at the radio shop owned by Vincent's father. Mr. Sebert, who had been let into the secret, was waiting for them. Before long they had selected a somber box-like something which Mr. Sebert assured them was the biggest distance getter for the money they had earned that day.

"Do you think Grandma Kate will be pleased?" James queried.

"I'd like to find out. If it doesn't prove acceptable, bring it back," was Mr. Sebert's smiling answer.

In secret conference the group of boys decided to hide it in Raymond's clean cellar overnight; then meet in time to give it to Grandma Kate before going to Sunday School the next morning. Vincent had installed several just like it ,and could do the work in a minute, since he had a spring aerial.

"Just a minute," Vincent begged when grandma had answered them next morning; "may we use your sitting room for a little while?"

"Of course," the old lady smiled pleasantly, while she finished her morning's work in the kitchen.

However, she presently had occasion to enter the room. Instead of finding them in conference and discussion as usual, she noticed that Vincent was looking queerly at a square, dark box which he had put on the sewing-machine.

"Grandma," he asked, with a wink at the other boys, "will you do something for us? We haven't time to take this home before Sunday School even if we wanted to, which we don't. We'd like to leave it here. And when eleven o'clock arrives, as a special favor, please put on this head-piece. We think you'll hear something. We'll come back after church and find out if you do."

Solemnly he showed her how to put on the head-piece and cautioned her not to touch anything about the box.

Grandma Kate was flustered. "Such queer ideas as you boys do have sometimes," she told them with a wry smile; "but I'll try to please you."

"Gee!" Willard chortled while they were walking rapidly to Sunday School. "I guess she thinks we've gone crazy. But she's due to a miracle—a miracle of speech shortly. I'd like to watch her wonder!"

During Sunday School and all through the church service the boys were wriggly and fidgety, and almost spoiled their good record for gentlemanly behavior. They tried hard to listen to Mr. Jason's sermon.

A half hour later, as they grouped themselves again about the sewing machine in Grandma Kate's sitting room, they found her jubilant.

"Boys, I've been to church, right here at home! And heard all the hymns and the anthem with Mary Bates singing the soprano part." Her hands were trembling with joyous excitement.

"Well! Righto!" the boys shouted. "Good for you!"

"Is this one of those radios that people are going so wild about these days?" she asked.

And when she was told that it was a sure-enough crystal-set radio she was delighted.

"I never thought to see one," she said.

"Why, you're its owner," the boys told her. "It's a new style May basket, only we hung it to your radiator instead of the door."

"Here's the radio program for the week," James smiled happily as he handed it over.

"Boys, this is the nicest surprise May basket I ever heard tell of. How I thank you!" She smiled; but back of the smile was a tear which let the boys know that she would love it.

"I'll bet that'll make Grandma Kate sit up and listen, like we planned," Vincent declared.

"Huh, if she sits up and listens as much as you do, she'll be some radio fan," James retorted.

At which the others chuckled appreciatively; for most of them were doing the same thing.—Junior World.

Foolish Mr. Pig Who Learned a Lesson.

Josephine S. Parker.

It was a beautiful day in October. For several nights there had been a slight frost and there was evidence on every side that nature had taken up her brush again.

The birch and the maple, the beech and the sumach were gorgeous in color. Even the air had a delicious snap to it that gave new life to Mr. Sleepy Pig who lazily stretched himself in his mud bath and said: "It is a fine morning for a stroll", and truly he was right.

There had been a heavy windstorm the night before. Fences were laid low and gates broken from their hinges, and as Mr. Pig got on his feet and glanced around he added: "It will be a fine morning to look around, too."

He was in such a hurry he never stopped to wash in the clear running stream where the cows drank or to brush the mud off his dark leather coat with its white ermine collar, but went right on. The gate of Farmer Peter's henyard was down and he walked in. Even Wolfe, the big black dog which always chased him away from everything he wanted was not in sight. He spied the open henhouse and found there a feast that would make any pig's mouth water. Corn and oats were plentifully sprinkled on the corn stalk carpet of the hennery, but Mr. Pig had hardly stepped inside when a flutter of white wings fell upon him from every corner. If he thought at all, he must have thought that Heaven was opening and angels coming down, only there was such a cackle and angels sang, they did not cackle.

"I can't make out this funny noise," "Huh. if she sits up and listens as owls, birds and frogs all singing at once. I'm afraid to eat for fear those white things get me, and that terrible dog will hear all this noise soon. I wonder if I could scare those wings by showing my two big upper and lower teeth."

Mr. Pig waddled this way and that trying to find a place where he could eat and feel safe, but the uproar went on. Wolfe heard the noise and came in, jumping and barking furiously chasing even the white wings to their roost. When Wolfe saw Mr. Pig standing in the corner, he was so surprised and angry that he barked louder than before. He jumped right behind him and made him run as fast as his small legs and heavy weight would let him.

"Such luck!" said Mr. Pig; "how I wanted that corn and oats. I would have eaten it all, every bit myself."

Farmer Peter's family was away. They had left a large pan of milk near the wood shed for their favorite Tommy Traddles, a beautiful cat with fur like summer ermine.

As Mr. Pig went up the lane he thought he would take a look at the vegetable garden just behind the woodshed. He gruntled his pleasure as he spied the pan of rich yellow milk, and even his long pointed ears trembled with joy.

"I'll get my fill now," he cried.

But here again he was disappointed, for Tom Slack, the hired man, coming up the lane caught him in the act of robbing the cat's milk. He pummeled him with stones until one leg was nearly broken and he grunted with pain.

"Oh, what'll I do, what'll I do?" he cried. "I'll go to the nut tree. It doesn't belong to any one in particular, I hope."

As Mr. Pig went down the road he saw a beautiful sight. All along were yellow and scarlet leaved trees. The sumach vines glowed like fire upon the grey rocks and the brown trunks of oaks. Beside the road there were blue berries hanging from the shrubs, but Mr. Pig thought they might be poisonous and hurried on. When he came to the nut tree, he found many nuts upon the ground. Fearful lest some one should take them before he had finished his meal, he greedily began to eat. He had scarcely taken two mouthsful when he heard a faint rustling in the leaves. Turning, he saw Mr. Red Squirrel trim and neat. Even his bushy tail was glossy and curved. Though filled with nuts, his little pockets in each cheek were never heavy and often his work seemed more like play, scampering up tree-tops and hiding in hollow stumps at every strange sound. He was happy and gay and enjoyed his work.

"What are you doing about so early?" Mr. Squirrel asked.

"Trying to find a morning meal," replied Mr. Pig. "But every place I go I'm treated like a thief and chased away."

"That's sad," said Mr. Squirrel. "There's plenty in this world for everybody, but one has to work and earn a living, not take from others. I warn you, we're to have a hard, cold winter. The snow will cover the fence rails. There will be weeks when we cannot get to market. I don't intend to be caught napping," said Mr. Squirrel. "I've double-lined my house with leaves. I've worked night and day carrying food to last through the cold spell. You'd better get busy," called back Mr. Squirrel as he hurried away.

That afternoon as Mr. Pig went through the lengthening shadows of the lane, he said to himself.

"It has been a hard, terrible day. Hereafter I follow Mr. Squirrel's advice and work for my living."

TO THE LAITY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

There is in circulation among the laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church a petition, prepared by one of our Bishops, to the General Convention which will assemble in Washington next October, asking that body to refuse its assent to the proposal to eliminate the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion from the Book of Common Prayer, which would mean their abrogation.

"WHEREAS, the last General Convention adopted tentatively a resolution to revise the Book of Common Prayer by omitting the publication in connection therewith of the Articles of Religion; and

"WHEREAS, there is no provision for publishing elsewhere or for recognizing in any other way the Articles of Religion except in connection with the Book of Common Prayer; and

"WHEREAS, the Constitution of this Church has ever since 1801 recognized in this way the Articles of Religion; and

"WHEREAS, the Articles of Religion define the Church and state clearly the historic doc trinal differences between the Anglican Communion and the Roman Catholic Church;

"THEREFORE, we the undersigned adult communicants of the Protestant Episcopal Church do most earnestly memorialize our Right Reverend Fathers-in-God, our Reverend Clerical Deputies and Honorable Lay Deputies, in General Convention assembled in their respective Houses, to vote against the resolution to omit the Articles of Religion from publication in connection with the Book of Common Prayer and to vote against any proposed amendment to the Constitution that would omit reference to the Articles of Religion.

"AND we do further memorialize our Fathers-in-God, the Bishops, to send us a message of assurance that the name, the doctrine, the ceremonies and nomenclature of our Church and her missionary purpose and her fraternal love for all Christian people are and should be as expressed in the Book of Common Prayer.

"So we believe you will bring comfort and peace to the hearts of many, give confidence to those within our Communion and make clear to all men the true Catholic nature and Protestant heritage of our dear Church and revive zeal for the salvation of souls through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen."

We believe that a great majority of the communicants of the Church are opposed to the elimination of these Articles of Religion, established by the Church in 1801, and are likewise opposed to the introduction into the Church of the Mass, Reservation and Adoration of the Sacrament Prayers to the Virgin Mary, Invocation of Saints, Worship of Images and Relics, Auricular Confession, Penance, use of the Rosary, Holy Water and other doctrines and ceremonies peculiar to the Church of Rome.

We therefore heartily endorse this petition and express the hope that all Protestant Episcopalians will signify their approval of it by their signatures and by aiding in the widest possible circulation of it.

Copies of this petition may be procured without cost from Latsch & Arnold, 97 N. Second Street, Memphis, Tenn.

Fifteen appointments were made for him in advance, and all were wonderfully successful. Three parlor meetings were held with Presbyterian, Baptist and Methodist friends. Much interest was shown in the work, and there was a large attendance everywhere. Among many gifts was one of $500.00. This will build a cottage to house twenty lepers.

Last summer Mr. Coulter visited ten thousand lepers in China, Japan, Korea, and spent a week at Culion Hospital, Philippine Islands.

Among his varied experiences was a visit to a pirate's village in China, where he and Rev John Lake were hospitably entertained.

He spoke at Hampton Institute after leaving Richmond, and in Norfolk, from which we hope for good results for the cause.

Resolutions.

Forasmuch as it has pleased God to take from our midst our brother, the REV. GEORGE H. YOUNG, Priest, late in charge of St. Peter's, Washington; therefore be it

Resolved, that we record on behalf of his brother Clergy our sense of deep personal loss and how much we miss the presence of his genial, loving and joyful nature, with thankful remembrance of his long and faithful service in the ministry of Christ's Church; and be it further

Resolved, that a copy of this resolution be sent to his family and caused to be published in the Church Press

PAUL O. PLENCKNER,

W. O. LESLIE, JR.,
Committee.

RESOLUTIONS

adopted by the Vestry of St. Peters Protestant Episcopal Church, Altavista, Virginia, on April 29, 1928, in loving memory of William Covington Rierson:

With hearts made sad by a realization of an irreparable loss, the members of the Vestry of St. Peters Church, desire to place upon record a heartfelt expression of sorrow, occasioned by the untimely death of our faithful and beloved fellow-Vestryman, WILLIAM COVINGTON RIERSON.

Indeed, it will be hard to "carry on" in the absence of one upon whom we have grown to lean so heavily in handling the affairs of the Church. As Secretary and Treasurer of the Vestry he threw himself whole-heartedly into the work and gave, unreservedly, of his time and means, towards the uplift of the Church and the promotion of its ideals.

As a member of the Diocesan Executive Board he rendered faithful and valuable service and held an affectionate place in the hearts of the Bishop and his co-workers.

Outside of the Church, he was also beloved by all who appreciate those attributes that go to make an upright Christian gentleman. Possessing, in an unusual degree, a charm of manner and courteous bearing, with a spirit of absolute unselfishness, he endeared himself to both old and young, in every walk of life.

All in all, "Billy" Rierson has left an impression on our hearts that will stand as an everlasting memorial to his unsullied character.

We direct that a copy of this Memorial be spread upon the Minutes of the Vestry; a copy be sent to his beloved wife, and copies be sent to the Southern Churchman and to the Southwestern Episcopalian for publication.

H. W. ADAMS,
WALTER FAUNTLEROY,
RANDOLPH THOMPSON,
Committee.

ular for Churchmen other than Brotherhood men. If such luncheons can become a fixed custom with the attendant good which will inevitably result, the Brotherhood Convention Committee will have made a valuable contribution to the fellowship and good-will among men in the Diocese of Washington. This committee is already well organized and working with enthusiasm, under the leadership of Chairman H. Lawrence Choate.

The third meeting of the committee in preparation for the Convention, was held May 8 at Diocesan House, when eighteen parishes were represented, and pledges were made for the accomplishment of one thousand registrations of men and boys, before the beginning of the Convention, October 5.

Mr. Leon C. Palmer made a stirring address and other members of the committee were heard concerning different phases of the work. The coming Convention will be the forty-second National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew and will be in conjunction with the National Conference on Evangelism. Local organizations cooperating with the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the entertainment of this convention, are: The Churchman's League, Laymen's Service Association, St. Stephen's Men's Club, Toc H, and the Diocesan Young People's Society.

Convention.

The address before the annual diocesan convention, meeting May 22-24, will be delivered Tuesday night, May 22, in Epiphany Church, but the remaining services of the convention will be held at St. Philip's Church, Laurel, Md.

Cornerstone for College of Preachers.

Invitations to the annual meeting of the National Cathedral Association and the laying of the cornerstone of the College of Preachers to be held on Mt. St. Alban on Ascension Day, have been sent out by the Bishop of Washington and the Dean and Chapter of Washington Cathedral. This is regarded as an important occasion in the history of the Cathedral and Diocese of Washington, and a large attendance, including men and women from many cities throughout the country, is expected.

Tea.

Students attending the summer conferences and schools in the vicinity of the Diocese of Washington, and any other people interested, were invited to a tea given in the parish hall of St. John's Church on the afternoon of May 16. Brief addresses, telling the advantages of the summer schools were made by some of those who have been students at the schools. The Blue Mountain Conference at Hood College, Md., the school at Ocean City, Md., and the ten-day course at Sweet Briar College, Va., are the three usually attended by Church workers in Washington.

A Special Confirmation Service will be held at the Cathedral on May 18 by the Bishop of Washington, when candidates from the several parishes and throughout the diocese, who have been unable to be confirmed on account of sickness or other causes, will be given the opportunity of confirmation.

The Cathedral Open-Air Services at the Peace Cross will begin Sunday, May 20, at 4 P. M., weather permitting, and will continue until September 30.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

Diamond Jubilee.

This week the Church of the Redeemer, Brooklyn (the Rev. Thos. J. Lacey, Ph. D., rector), celebrated its Diamond Jubilee. Seventy-five years ago, on the first Sunday in May, 1853, the Rev. David T. Sanford gathered a congregation for the first time in a room over a butcher-store on Fulton Street near Elm Place. Not long after, property was acquired in an undeveloped neighborhood at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Pacific Street, and in 1866 the stone church, still in use, was erected there. It was then known as the "Church in the Cornfield". Now it is at the meeting point of three metropolitan subway lines, an elevated railroad, and a number of surface car lines, beside being just opposite the Brooklyn terminal of the Long Island Railroad.

Sidney Catlin Partridge, who attended Sunday School there when the church was new, was back in the same church in bishop's robes last Sunday morning to preach the seventy-fifth anniversary sermon, being now the head of the Diocese of West Missouri. His theme was the Church's essential sameness yet versatile adaptability. His account of conditions in that locality in his boyhood in the sixties, as contrasted with present conditions, was most interesting.

The service culminated in the placing of a stone of commemoration, sent from the mother church of Anglicanism, Christ Church Cathedral, Canterbury, the gift of the Dean and Chapter. The stone was set in place in St. Thomas' Chapel, near the entrance to the church, whose patron saint is Thomas of Canterbury.

The celebration of the anniversary continues through this week, and is terminated next Sunday morning when Bishop Stires makes his visitation to the parish.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, D. D., Bishop.

Consecration of St. Peter's Church, Talladega.

A legacy from the estate of the late Mrs. Hal. Johnson made possible the erection of the new St. Peter's Church, Talladega, Ala., at a cost of above forty thousand dollars; one half of this amount being raised by the local congregation. The Rev. Joseph Harvey, rector, has done much to further the construction of this attractive church. With him on the building committee were Mr. John A. Bingham, Chairman, and Miss Maud Chambers.

The design was prepared by Mr. Frank Lockwood, Architect, of Montgomery. The builder was Mr. C. F. Duke. The church is built of Indiana limestone, and has a capacity of about three hundred.

St. Peter's was consecrated Wednesday, May 2, by the Rt. Rev. Wm. G. McDowell, D. D., Bishop of Alabama. The Rev. J. M. Stoney, Executive Secretary of the Diocese, preached the sermon. The Rev. H. F. Schroeter was the epistoler and the gospel was read by the rector. The Rev. H. S. Lovingston, Ph. D., was master of ceremonies. Several Protestant ministers of the town were present in the chancel, and marched in the procession.

The rector also presented a class for confirmation.

DEPEW, 93, CHIDES EDISON, BOY OF 80, ON FAITH, DECLARING HIS OWN RELIANCE ON GOD OF BIBLE

SPECIAL TO THE NEW YORK TIMES

Savannah, Ga., Feb. 12.—The venerable former Senator Chauncey M. Depew, of New York, gave to that youngster of 80, Thomas A. Edison, a gentle rebuke to-day because Mr. Edison has ventured to assert that the word of God had no meaning for him.

Speaking in his private car, in which he is en route to St. Augustine, Fla., Mr. Depew said:

"Regardless of what Mr. Edison, a mere boy of 80, may say, I state that from my experience of ninety-three years I am more firmly anchored to the Bible than ever before, and believe implicitly in its teachings and the God it portrays."

Mr. Depew said that all of his life he had been surrounded by people who were anchored on the Bible, and had found a great deal of joy and happiness in their belief. Declaring that such expressions as that of Mr. Edison are the exception, he said:

"Ninety-five per cent of the people generally are on good terms with the Lord, and that percentage of any body of people can always be relied upon as being right.

"I have always felt a real dependence upon God. My idea of God is personal, rather than force, not a personality such as we are, of course, but a glorified, divine and inifnite heart, brain and spirit, all-comprehending, all-powerful, never-failing.

"I think of God as being interested in mortals and mortal affairs. Christ was His earthly manifestation, Christ who understood, lived, toiled and suffered upon earth as men and women do; Christ, who died, as we must die before we live again. Christ is God's pledge of love and understanding.

"I don't believe in chance. You have to make things come your way and they will come your way if you will follow the rules of moderation, of not worrying, of diversifying your interests, of trusting God and loving your fellow-beings.

"When I look back seventy-five years to the time when I first started out and consider the conditions then and now, I can see only a wonderful advancement along all lines. People are better now than then. They are healthier, happier and get more out of life. They understand the word of God more and live closer to Him generally."

Two Distinctive New Books

THE BIBLE UNDER FIRE

By John L. Campbell, D. D.

For those who are "perplexed and bewildered" by the modern attacks on the Bible, here is a firm and convincing answer. Dr. Campbell, who has the Chair of Bible, Carson and Newman College, Jefferson City, Tennessee, vindicates the historical accuracy of the Bible, asserts the trustworthiness of the great saving doctrines of Christianity, and exposes the unscientific character of the evolutionary theory of the universe. Dr. Robert Dick Wilson of Princeton Theological Seminary has contributed an introduction.

Bound in full cloth, 285 pp., $2.50.

THE SCANDAL OF THE CROSS

By Edwin McNeill Poteat, D. D., LLL. D.

An answer to those who would deny the efficacy of the cross of Christ. With scholarly exactness and utter simplicity of statement, Dr. Poteat shows the significance of Christ's death in terms of a moral universe, through the forgiveness of sin. He answers the arguments of those who have express aversion to the Christian estimate of the cross, such as those of Tolstoy, showing at last "the loneliness and bitterness of a heart that can never forget its refusal of the infinite love."

Bound in full cloth, 189 pp., $2.00.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

For the man who knows how to profit by the lesson, to have been vanquished is oftentimes a source of strength.—Wagner.

Chilo, having had the question put to him, What is difficulty? said, "To be silent about secrets; to make good use of one's leisure, and to be able to submit to injustice".

"Here among the halt and blind,
The weak and helpless of mankind,
In deeds we do, in things we say,
Life of our life, he lives today."

Only cultivate that dogged pertinacity which has no thought of ultimate defeat, but rallies cheerfully and resolutely after every discomfiture.—Dods.

I change, He changes not,
The Christ can never die;
His love, not mine, the resting-place,
His truth, not mine, the tie.
—Horatius Bonar.

It seems to me that there is no maxim for a noble life like this: Count always your highest moments your truest moments. Believe that in the time when you were the greatest and most spiritual man, then you were your truest self.—Phillips Brooks.

God's purpose can be attained only by the use of methods which God can approve.—Selected.

Christ never sends any one on a mission of duty or love, but He says, "I am with you; I go with you even to the end."—Cuyler.

What a dashing, thrilling record of invincible energy, sweeping with irresistible force, and with flash and flame until cities were in an uproar and turned upside down—places shaken by prayer, and a stir made in the commercial and political world as the banner of the cross triumphantly was carried from the upper room across tumultuous seas and through angry mobs and in spite of prison doors until it conquered Rome.—Rev. P. Reed.

In Stanley Jones' new book, "Christ at the Round Table", he tells how men interested in religions were gathered together and asked to speak on just one subject, "what have you found of God"? He says, "This conclusion is forced upon us, where men have come into contact with Christ and God consciousness becomes real and living. Men find God through Christ—not merely hope to find Him but actually find Him".

This historical and illuminating address by Dr. Tyler, published serially in recent issues of SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN, has met with a most generous reception and approval by students of Virginia history and departments of research in all parts of the country. It is a fearless exposition of the fundamental principles upon which the Commonwealth of Virginia was founded, by which it grew, for which its people fought and to which we still adhere.

The complete address is now being put in pamphlet form and will be supplied at the price of

JUDGED RIGHT ABOUT BISHOP DARLINGTON

In an article published in The Southern Churchman of April 14, I expressed hope that a publication purporting to quote argument on the attractions of the clerical profession by Bishop Darlington, of the Diocese of Harrisburg, presented in The North American Review, did not represent accurately the Bishop's view and feeling on that subject. By the thoughtful kindness of Richmond Pearson Hobson, I have now the full text of the discussion and the statements made regarding the sentiments and conditions of the Christian clergy in this country, especially those of the Protestant Episcopal Church. To my inexpressible gratification and pleasure, I find my expressed hope fully justified. The quotation from Bishop Darlington gave but an incidental fragment of what he wrote and that fragment somewhat absurdly garbled. He touched on the dollars and cents question in connection with the ministry very lightly and only so far as was necessary to answer a dyspeptic complaint of hardship and wrong supposed to be suffered by the clergy, also published in The North American Review. What was called to my attention made the monetary consideration foremost.

The general direction and quality of Bishop Darlington's communication may be judged by the fact that he began with a verse from "Onward Christian Soldiers", and concluded with lines written by himself, years ago:

"Onward, Christian Soldiers,
Marching as to war,
With the Cross of Jesus
Going on before."

Bishop Darlington entered the ministry in the fullness of his manhood at the age of twenty-six. His verse tells his matured conviction after forty-six years in the ministry, beginning as assistant rector of a Brooklyn church, and he is happy in having three sons in the ministry who agree with him that "the great joy of the ministry, however, has nothing to do with its financial compensation", and think they have chosen the "happiest life on earth". The Bishop's plain, straightforward, simple, statement in refinement, dignity and nobility of thought and ideals makes lovely contrast to the distinctly sordid, coarse and querulous communication to which he was invited to reply.

The discussion, however, should be considered very earnestly by us of the laity, men and women. It should put us to solemn, serious, self-searching whether we make ourselves helps or hindrances in the holy and beautiful work to which our pastors have consecrated themselves, to which many of them have sacrificed cheerfully talent and capabilities which might have won for them abundant affluence and high place in other callings. Are we doing all we should do to free them from worries and fears for their own temporal future and the safety and welfare of their families? Do we hold up their hands as did Aaron and Hur for Moses while the battle against heathenism and sin is waged, or do we restrain the soaring of their souls and the development of their powers by petty parish quarrels, small criticisms of small faults, withholding of thanks and praise and encouragement and assurance of support and cooperation? Do we men leave the parochial work, the helping of the pastor, too much to the women, while we, with the strength and contacts and control of the money, busy ourselves entirely with worldly things, business, politics, amusements?

Bishop Darlington tells us we are doing much. The complaining clergyman he answers tells us we wrong, neglect and obstruct the clergy. It is a present, urgent duty for us everywhere who sit, more or less frequently, in the pews, to question ourselves whether we are doing for our spiritual pastors and masters all we ought to do, giving them the tranquility and peace and freedom from earthly cares they deserve, the cordial, constant, loving help and affectionate sympathy and support they all crave and need.

"AMBASSADOR OF CHRIST."

"When a youth is seeking counsel to make best use of his life,
And also asking God's direction on his bended knees,
For a life that's noble, rather than career of selfish ease,
And would rather die in battle than, ignoble, flee from strife,
Prizing praise of conscience more than wealth of future child or wife;
There's only one great calling which will then his soul appease;
To serve Christ as a clergyman, will give him all of these,
To hold and teach a loving faith, though unbelief is rife.
As Christ was Prophet, Priest and King, so is His loyal priest.
Ambassador of God's own Son, there's naught can Him appal,
In pulpit preaching, giving alms, or at altars' sacred feast.
When, listening, praying people to their Heavenly Maker call,
He represents the King of Kings, himself least of the least;
Higher than proud earthly rulers, he's more honored than them all."

"Book of ages! I love thy pages!
Bathed with the tears of those who sorrow,
Bleached with the sweat of those who labour,
Scorched by the fires of persecution,
Worn by the fingers of meditation,
Cut and cursed by those who abhor thee,
Kissed and caressed by those who adore thee,
Book of ages! I love thy pages!"

THE ADVENT OF THE SPIRIT

By Kenneth Mackenzie

THERE is a legend, that on the last day of the feast of Tabernacles, the high priest, heading a pompous procession, left the temple precincts, bearing in his hand a golden pitcher. Approaching the pool of Siloam, he ceremoniously dipped the pitcher and drew from the pool a quantity of water which was borne back, upheld in sight of all beholders, to the brazen altar, where at the corner was a silver funnel into which the water was poured. The moment was tense; and the great congregation, with bated breath, observed the act with reverent retrospection; for it typified the providential supply of water which marked the forty year journeyings of the Israelites.

As St. Paul implies our Lord's participation in that miraculous provision (1 Cor. 10:4), we may assume that it was at this auspicious instant, He lifted up His voice and cried, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink; he that believeth on me, from within him shall flow rivers of living waters" (John 7:37, 38). The evangelist then proceeds to explain that this latter promise referred to the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive. "For the Holy Ghost was not yet; because that Jesus was not yet glorified" (John 7:39).

Evidently, the intent of this teaching is to impress the truth that the Holy Spirit had an advent, timed and approved, as distinctly as any historical occasion could be. The Holy Spirit was not revealed, even in our Lord's earth days, as He was to be when the conditions indicated in the text should be completely met. True, there were sporadic workings of the Spirit in the Old Testament history. For the Spirit of God brooded over the ruin in which the world was found in Genesis 1:2. He also strove with the ante-diluvians (Gen. 6:3). A due measure of spiritual enlightenment was bestowed upon the wise-hearted who were to make the garments for the high priest, as well to Bazaleel and Aholiab ,(Ex. 28:3; 31:3; 35:31). The Spirit was given to the elders of Israel (Num. 11:17, 25, 26, 29). Balaam confessed that God's Spirit endued him for prophesying (Num. 24:2). Upon Joshua came the Spirit likewise (Num. 27:18). The power of the Spirit was expressed by the Judges in turn (Jud. 3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 13:25; 14:6, 19). The Book of Job gives testimony to His personality and office (Job 26:13; 32:8; 33:40). The Psalmists admit the operations of the Spirit (Ps. 104:30; 139:7; 143:10); while David especially implores the Lord not to take His Holy Spirit from him (Ps. 104:30; 139:7; 143:10). In the prophets a large measure of importance is ascribed to Him (2 Sam. 32:2; Isa. 4:4; 11:2; Micah 3:8; Zech. 4:4; Mal. 2:15; 1 Peter 1:11).

Yet, we behold the fitness of the contention of the evangelist, that at the time of our Lord's attendance at the feast of Tabernacles "the Spirit was not yet". And for the specified reason that the advent of the Spirit could not be consummated until our Lord had wrought redemption on the Cross, had won the approval of the Father and been declared to be the Son of God with power through the resurrection (Ps. 2:7; Matt. 28:18; Rom. 1:4), and finally had ascended up on high to send back, according to His promise (Acts 1:8), the Holy Spirit with His official imprimatur.

He had predicted that the Spirit, the Paraclete (the Comforter), must take His place for the larger work which they were to do in His leaving them. All that they were to declare regarding His life and teachings should be given to them by the Spirit's reminder (John 14:26; 15:26). As they should proclaim the Gospel, it should be He who would convict the hearers of sin, of righteousness and of judgment to come (John 16:7-14). We are deeply impressed as we discern this phase of the divine purpose, with the transfiguration effected in these, the weakest of men, judged by human standards. Unlearned and ignorant, densely impotent in mental activities, they became flaming messengers of the Gospel, dynamic, all-conquering in ministry, consumingly enamored of their glorified Lord. Like St. Paul, who received the same baptism of power, they no longer knew Jesus after the flesh (2 Cor. 5:16). The triumphant Man in the Glory is the object of their worship, the source of their potentiality.

We mark then, that the sole agent for dealing with penitent men, through the declaration of the Word of God by His dedicated servants, is the Holy Spirit, whose office is to arouse and quicken the dormant faculties of sincere seekers for truth. And He can be efficient in any and all spiritual needs only when His sovereignty is recognized. So long as men approach the great problem by the avenues of cold intellectual inquiry, analyses and determination, the quest will go unrewarded. For "the psychical man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14). That which pertains to character and destiny lies buried in the mind of the unfathomable God; and He has decreed that He will unlock the treasures of that mystery through the Holy Spirit alone; for "the Spirit searches all things, yea the deep things of God" (1 Cor. 2:10).

Certainly it must have been this marvelous process which moved our Lord to ecstasy, when in an outburst of praise to His Father He said, "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight. All things are delivered unto me of my Father; and no man knoweth the Son but the Father, neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son and he to whom the Son will reveal him" (Matt. 11:25-27).

Could there have been a more definite and satisfying revelation of the mind of God than this? Far from being an invention, which was utterly beyond the writers of the Gospels to have imagined, it comes back to us in this day and generation as a challenge to thought and reverent acceptance. Transcendingly above the realm of the pride of learning and the intolerance of so-called scholarship, it insists upon humble acknowledgment, or decrees humiliating rejection. For, who were they who became partakers of the Holy Ghost in that age of the planting of the Church? The simple-minded, the untutored in the sophistries of profound thinking, innocent of all guile in the whole-souled acceptance of what was delivered. Are we not facing again that supreme test? Is not Corinthian philosophy at our doors, arrogantly overmastering in assumptions of supremacy in exalted, disputatious, self-generated idealities? Let us hear once again, the plaint of the Apostle, "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputor of this world? For after that in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe" (1 Cor. 1:18-21).

We behold then, the plan of God. The true knowledge of our Lord Jesus, lies not in any comprehension of His earth-life and through human wisdom. There is a revelation of Him which the Father longs to disclose. He in turn, being the Son of God, glorified and at His Father's right hand (Mark 16:19; Acts 2:33; 7:56; Eph. 1:18-23; Heb. 1:1-3; 1 Peter 1:22; Rev. 1:17, 18), imparts to us the true knowledge of God, as He Himself experiences it. No assumed scientific processes may invade this realm. That the door is absolutely closed; and closed forever, we may affirm. The willingness to receive the illumination of the Holy Spirit is the sole test. The Cross and its correlated sequences are registered above, from whence, fulfilling His pledge to His own, He has sent forth "that Holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. 1:13), to be the divinely-appointed, only recognized, vicegerent of our Lord Jesus, to interpret heavenly things to the willing hearted, to take the sovereignty over the world in the absence of the Son of God, to regenerate and energize, to reveal to grateful hearts the glory of our adorable Lord, and to knit us to His Father and ours in an indissoluble bond.

So we affirm that His advent was as distinctly definite as was that of our Lord in Bethlehem's manger. It stands lustrous with the light of the ages past. It pleads with us to renew our faith in its reality. As we acknowledge this sublime truth, bow before His delegated Lordship over the Church, His intimate relation to every dedicated heart, let us sing our praises to Him in the familiar verse:

"To Thee, by Jesus Christ sent down,
Of all His gifts the sum and crown,
Sing we Allelulia."

Oh, give me strength to suffer, Lord,
And willingness to serve!
So hold me by Thy mighty Word
That naught can make me swerve!

Thus girded for my daily cross,
And faith's most fiery test:
Thus counting all things else but loss
That I may have Thy Best!

Thy best in service, song and prayer:
In quiet—or in strife:
Thy best in fellowship most rare

THE BIBLE TRUE.

By Arthur I. Brown, M. D. C. M., F. R. C. S. E.

The believer in the Biblical account of Creation occupies an impregnable and happy position. The Bible is scornfully indifferent to hatred, ridicule and bitter assault. Its age-long statements are never compelled to change because they are Infallible Truth. Every discovery in every realm of sceintific investigation, substantiates, down to the minutest detail, the Scriptural Record.

The most potent and effective weapon which is being used by Satan in his present furious attack on the Bible, is evolution. He seems to have reserved this implement of war, for the closing days of this dispensation, soon to usher in the Millennial age when Satan will be overthrown and Truth will be triumphant, under the leadership of the coming King.

In this third decade of the twentieth century, no one need make any apology for accepting the Bible at its face value, and rejecting evolution with all other man-made explanations of the universe, based on false, God-eliminating ideas. The doctrine of evolution is utterly opposed to common-sense, science and Scripture, and has nothing to account for its existence except the purpose of some of its leading exponents to use it to prove the Word of God false and of human origin.

But, a Book written with such sustained dignity and meticulous precision, abounding in lightning-like phrases, arrows shot from the quiver of Infallible Wisdom, exhibiting the supernatural prescience of prophecy, contemptuously indifferent to the flippant insolence of a decadent skepticism, miraculously anticipating by thirty centuries the most stupendous discoveries of modern times, is not a patchwork of grotesque stupidity, incorporating a thousand mangled delusions, a monstrous travesty of Truth.

Such a Book is and must be the sublime embodiment of Omniscience, the supreme Gift to man from the Ruler and Creator of the Universe.

This remarkable Record is supreme in its history, its science, its ethics, and its spiritual concepts, every page revealing the imprint of the finger of God, and the divine illumination of Deity.

Therefore, when Darwin or Keith tells us that evolution is true, and the Bible false, we reply, "No", and reiterate our unshakable faith in the sublime statement of God Himself, "In the beginning, God created".

PSALM 23 AS INTERPRETED BY THE SIGN LANGUAGE OF THE RED INDIANS.

"The Great Father above is a Shepherd Chief. I am His and with Him I want not.

He throws out to me a rope and the name of the rope is Love, and He draws me and He draws me to where the grass is green and the water is not dangerous, and I eat and lie down satisfied.

Sometimes my heart is very weak and falls down, but He lifts it up again ,and draws me into a good road. His Name is Wonderful.

Some time, it may be very soon, it may be longer, it may be a long, long time, He will draw me into a place between mountains. It is dark there, but I will draw back not. I will be afraid not, for it is in there between these mountains that the Shepherd Chief will meet me, and the hunger I have felt in my heart all through this life will be satisfied.

Sometimes He makes the love-rope into a whip, but afterward He gives me a staff to lean on.

He spreads a table before me with all kinds of food. He puts His hands upon my head, and all the 'tired' is gone. My cup He fills till it runs over.

What I tell you is true, I lie not. These roads that are 'away ahead' will stay with me through this life, and afterward I will go to live in the 'big Tepee' and will sit down with the Shepherd Chief forever."—(The Sunday at Home.)

In St. Paul's Church, Rio de Janeiro, which is about ten years old, there have been, in all, 207 confirmations. Its present equipment is a clean but forlorn and leaking building more resembling a garage. A new church is under way, struggling along as funds permit, under the careful direction of a deacon, the Rev. Euclydes Deslandes.

PLAIN BIBLE STUDIES

Prepared by J. T. Bougher. Reading Terminal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Note: In this new series of studies effort will be made to set forth in brief form wondrous things that God would have us know as told in His own eternal words.

LESSON—No. 36.
TOPIC—The Book of Revelation.
(Read a chapter every day.)

We have digressed at this time from our usual topical study to touch briefly upon the last book of the Holy Bible and to urge the importance of a careful study of this wonderful portion of God's Word.

"Revelation" is largely prophetic and spreads before us things through which this world must pass, at the close of this present evil age. As the prophecies of Daniel also cover the "tribulation period" and "end times", these two books are closely associated, and should be studied together, not forgetting Matthew 24.

"Revelation" distinguishes itsself in many ways and we find it the only book assuring a blessing to those who read and pay heed thereto (Rev. 1:3); in fact, there are seven "blesseds" recorded which should be specially noted along with to whom the blessing is promised.

We should also carefully note that the message is from our Lord Himself (Rev. 1:11-19) and concerns things he would have us know. It is, therefore not a riddle, but a "revelation" and should be accepted as it reads; a real message indeed from "him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, . . . to whom be glory and dominion forever and ever". Amen (Rev. 1:5, 6).

We trust the following brief analysis may be helpful to those entering upon a careful reading of this wonderful forecast of "things that shall yet be"; a glorious hope to the "believer", and a solemn warning to the unsaved.

1. From whom, to whom, and how, and when, and where. —Chapter 1.
2. Christ telling what He approves, and disapproves; A message not only to the local churches but also prophetic in His view of the state of the Church over the course of time.—Chapters 2 and 3.
3. The Church (all true believers) gone from the earth.—Chapters 4 and 5. (See Lessons 7 and 8.)
4. That which takes place on earth and in heaven after the Church is lifted, and the present age of Grace ended. —Chapters 6 to 18.
5. The marriage of Christ to His waiting Bride, and the return to earth in conquering power to subdue all evil and establish His earthly Kingdom.—Chapter 19.
6. The great battle of Armageddon. Satan bound, and Christ's millennial reign.—Chapter 20.
7. The new Heaven and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, and the sublime wonders of eternal glory. —Chapters 21 and 22.
8. The last solemn words of the Bible, and final appeal to the unsaved.—Rev. 22:8-21.

With the close of these forecasted events, and the execution of the Judgments which the Patmos vision portrays, we pass from the scenes of time, into the boundless eternity of our God; the everlasting habitation of the "redeemed", where we shall know as we are known, and where "his rest shall be glorious". Dear reader, Is your name written in the Lamb's Book of Life? (Rev. 20:12.)

"My God, is any hour so sweet,
From blush of morn to evening star,
As that which calls me to Thy feet,
The hour of prayer?"

THE SURRENDERED LIFE---IN CHRIST

Conducted by the Reverend Frank Cox

WHITSUNTIDE calls us back to essentials. So many are willing to fritter their time away on the minutae of the Bible that it is a pleasure to be reminded of the really essential themes of the Gospel. How any can be content to spend their time chiefly on the documentary theories of the Word when they have these great themes staring them in the face is a mystery! yet many are satisfied that they have grasped the teachings of the Gospels when they have been studying nothing but theories about the Gospels.

Pentecost provided the dynamic power for the execution of the Church's commission. The disciples were to remain in Jerusalem until they had been endued with power. It was a gigantic task that was before them and the Lord intended to equip them with power adequate for the task.

The power that came upon the disciples was more than an impersonal influence, however lofty. It filled them with more than an earthly enthusiasm. We once heard a prominent speaker lower the Pentecostal experience by referring to it thus: "The disciples were all filled with enthusiasm." Enthusiasm was surely there as a by-product but the account tells us that they were all filled with the Holy Spirit. The influence of the Holy Spirit we need not be reminded is personal. Any explanation that lowers His ministry to equate it with earth-born zeal, leads astray, and does not illuminate.

The Holy Spirit came as a permanent resident with God's people. How else could the Lord have declared that it was expedient that He go away? His departure was better because there was sent in His place One Who could be everywhere present. The Church that does not recognize fully the presidency and guidance of Holy Spirit will surely suffer. In too many places the churches plan and worry, hold committee meetings and campaigns, all in their own strength, without recognizing the presence or leadership of the Holy Spirit in any practical way.

The action of the Holy Spirit alone can cause any great renewal of religious zeal. We are accustomed to hear people bemoan the coldness of some churches. They blame it on the radio, automobile, or anything but the real cause, the lack of the power of the Holy Spirit in the lives of the congregation. Where the power of the Spirit is absent the church will be dead, no matter how beautiful the edifice, or elaborate the appointments. On the other hand a cold church can be awakened only by the Spirit. We know that the Spirit can awaken a cold church because He has done so in the past. Premier Baldwin characterized the power of the Bible accurately when he said that its words were high explosives. The high explosives of the Spirit are still as potent as ever. Men have barely scratched the surface of the potentialities in the Whitsuntide message. The Lord is more anxious to give than we are to ask, and is accustomed to give more than we either desire or deserve.

We know that the dynamic of the Spirit has often changed individual lives, we are less accustomed to realize and to believe that the power of the Spirit is more than ample to endue movements that can move nations. Yet history will speak to us on that point if we will listen. It was a group of individuals that gathered at Herrnhut on Count Zinzendorf's estate, and it was the same small group that was filled with the Spirit in a remarkable way one memorable day, but that day inaugurated a movement that after the passage of generations is still felt. Less than a generation ago three fisher lads in Scotland prayed earnestly to God, and as a result a movement arose there that changed whole towns, closing the saloons and crowding the churches. In Wales a miner prayed for the salvation of his country and crowds came to throng the churches. In Ireland just a few years ago a real revival took place that changed many lives, and assuaged much bitterness. In China even during the worst of the trouble, a movement took place in Shanghai that altered the course of many lives. Why not in the United States?

Two simple conditions intervene between ourselves and blessing. St. Peter's answer to the expectant multitude contained them, repent and believe. If there remain some sin from which you have not repented, or if you doubt the Lord in your heart He cannot bless. Shall we not humble ourselves before Him in repentance mingled with simple faith accept the blessing that the Master waits to pour out on each one of us?

Refining fire, go through my heart,
Illuminate my soul;
Scatter thy life through every part,
And sanctify the whole.

By the Right Reverend John Charles Ryle, D. D.

(5) Let us mark, in the last place, as we read the Articles, the unvarying reverence with which they always speak of Holy Scripture. The inspiration of the Bible, no doubt, is never distinctly asserted. It is evidently taken for granted as a first principle, which need not be proved. But if constant references to Scripture, and constant appeals to the authority of Scripture, as God's Word, are allowed to prove anything, in no document does the Bible receive more honor than in the Articles.

The Sixth Articles declares that "Holy Scripture contains all things necessary to salvation, and that whatsoever is not read, therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite and necessary to salvation.

The Eighth Article says that "the three Creeds ought thoroughly to be believed and received, for they may be proved by most certain warranty of Holy Scripture".

The Twentieth Article says, "It is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written, neither may it so expound one place of Scripture that it be repugnant to another".

The Twenty-first Article says that "things ordained by General Councils as necessary to salvation, have neither strength nor authority, unless it be declared that they be taken from Holy Scripture".

The Twenty-second Article condemns Transubstantiation, "because it cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture".

The Thirty-fourth Article says that "traditions and ceremonies of the Church may be changed, so long as nothing is ordained against God's Word".

Now I see in all this abundant proof that the Bible is the rule of faith in the Church of England, and that no doctrine is "Church Doctrine", which cannot be reconciled with God's Word. I see a complete answer to those who tell us that we make an idol of the Bible, and that we ought to go to the voice of the Church and to the Prayer Book for direction. I see that any sense placed on any part of the Prayer Book which is not reconcilable with Scripture, must be a mistake, and ought not to be received. I see, above all, that all who pour contempt on the Bible, as an uninspired, imperfect, defective Book, which ought not to be believed, if it contradicts "modern thought", are taking up ground which is at variance with the Church's own Confession of faith. They may be clever, liberal, scientific, and confident, but they are contradicting the Articles and they are not sound Churchmen.

Such are the leading features, in my judgment, of the Thirty-Nine Articles. I commend them to the attention of my readers, and ask that they may be carefully weighed. No doubt men may say that the Articles admit of more than one interpretation, and that my interpretation is not the correct one. My reply to all this is short and simple. I ask in what sense the Reformers who drew up the Articles meant them to be interpreted? Let men answer that. It is an acknowledged axiom in interpreting all public documents, such as treaties, covenants, wills, articles of faith, and religious formularies, that in any case of doubt or dispute the true sense is the sense of those who drew them up and imposed them. Waterland and Sanderson have abundantly shown that. Upon this principle I take my stand. I only want the Thirty-Nine Articles to be interpreted in the sense in which the Reformers first imposed them, and I believe it impossible to avoid the conclusion you arrive at. That conclusion is, that the Thirty-Nine Articles are in general tone, temper, spirit, intention, and meaning, eminently Protestant and eminently Evangelical.

I now draw my subject to a conclusion. I have shown the reader, to the best of my ability, what the Articles are —what is the position and authority which they hold in the Church of England—and what are the leading features of their contents. It only remains for me to point out a few practical conclusions, which I venture to think are peculiarly suited to the times.

(1) In the first place, I ask every Churchman who reads this paper to read the Thirty-Nine Articles regularly at least once every year, and to make himself thoroughly familiar with their contents.

It is not a reading age, I fear. Newspapers, and periodicals, and shilling novels absorb the greater part of the time given to reading. I am sorry for it. If I could only reach the ear of all thinking lay Churchmen, I should like to say, "Do read your Articles". As for clergymen, if I had my own way, I would require them to read the Articles publicly in church once every year.

Ignorance, I am compelled to say, is one of the grand dangers of members of the Church of England. The bulk of her people neither know, nor understand, nor seem to care about the inside of any of the great religious questions of the day. Presbyterians know their system. Baptists, Independents, and Methodists know theirs. Papists are all trained controversialists. Churchmen alone, as a body, are generally very ignorant of their own Church, and all its privileges, doctrines, and history. Not one in twenty could tell you why he is a Chuchman.

Let us cast aside this reproach. Let all Churchmen awake and rub their eyes, and begin to read up their own Church and its doctrines. And if any man wants to know where to begin, I advise him to begin with the Thirty-Nine Articles.

(2) In the second place, I ask all who read this paper to teach the Thirty-Nine Articles to all young people who are yet of an age to be taught. It is a burning shame that the Articles are not made an essential part of the system of every school connected with the Church of England, whether for high or low, for rich or poor.

I do not say this without reason. It is a simple fact, that the beginning of any clear doctrinal views I have ever attained myself, was reading up the Articles at Eton, for the Newcastle Scholarship, and attending a lecture, at Christ Church, Oxford, on the Articles, by a college tutor. I shall always thank God for what I learned then. Before that time I really knew nothing systematically of Christianity. I knew not what came first or what last. I had a religion without order in my head. What I found good myself I commend to others. If you love young people's souls, and would ground them, and stablish them, and arm them against error betimes, take care that you teach them not only the Catechism, but also the Articles.

(3) In the third place, I advise all who read this paper to test all Churchmanship by the test of the Articles. Be not carried away by those who talk of "nice Church views", "Catholic ceremonies", "holy, earnest, parish priests", and the like. Try all that is preached and taught by one simple measure—does it or does it not agree with the Articles? You have an undoubted right to do this, and no English clergyman has any right to object to your doing it. Say to him, if he does object ,"You publicly read and subscribed to the Articles when yo uaccepted your cure of souls. Do you or do you not abide by your subscription?"

This is the simple ground we take up in the various societies which, amidst much abuse, obloquy, and opposition, are laboring to maintain the Protestant character of the Church of England. They are not intolerant, whatever some may please to say. They do not want to narrow the limits of our Church. But we do say that any one who holds preferment in the Church of England ought to be bound by the laws of the Church of England, so long as those laws are unrepealed. Repeal the Act of Parliament called the Thirteenth of Elizabeth, and cast out the Thirty-Nine Articles, and we will cease to oppose Ritualism, and will concede that a Churchman may be anything, or everything, in opinion. But so long as things are as they are, we say we have a right to demand that respect should be paid to the Articles.

(4) Finally, let me advise every Churchman who values his soul never to be ashamed of the great leading doctrines which are so nobly set forth in the Articles.

Never mind if people call you extreme, party-spirited, going too far, Puritanical, ultra-Methodist, and the like. Ask them if they have ever read the first nineteen Articles of their own Church. Tell them, so long as you are a Churchman, you will never be ashamed of holding Church doctrine, and that you know what Church doctrine is, if they do not.

Remember, above all, that nothing but clear, distinct views of doctrine, such views as you will find in the Articles, will ever give you peace while you live, and comfort when you die.

"Earnestness" is a fine, vague, high-sounding term, and is very beautiful to look at and talk about, when we are well, and happy, and prosperous. But when the stern realities of life break in upon us, and we are in trouble, when the valley of death looms in sight, and the cold river must be crossed—in seasons like those, we want something better than mere "earnestness" to support our souls. Oh, no! it is cold comfort then, as our feet touch the chill waters, to be told, "Never mind! Be in earnest! Take comfort! Only be in earnest!" It will never, never do! We want them to know if God is our God, if Christ is our Christ, if we have the Spirit within us, if our sins are pardoned, if our souls are justified, if our hearts are changed, if our faith is genuine and real. "Earnestness" will not be enough then. It will prove a mere fine-weather religion. Nothing in short, will do in that solemn hour, but clear, distinct doctrine, embraced by our inward man, and made our own. "Earnestness" then proves nothing but a dream. Doctrines such as those set forth in the Articles are the only doctrines which are life, and health, and strength, and peace. Let us never be ashamed of laying hold of them, maintaining them, and making them our own. Those doctrines are the religion of the Bible and of the Church of England!

(The End.)

TO HONOR MOTHERS' DAY.

There stands on the corner of Charles and Lewis Streets in Fredericksburg, Virginia, an unpretentious cottage. There is no spot in America more sacred. It was the home of Mary, the mother of Washington, Mary Ball, the second wife of Augustine Washington. This was her home from March 1775 until August 1789. For many years the home belonged to various owners, but it is now the property of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, Incorporated. They have cared for it for over thirty years. Now it is sadly in need of restoration and preservation, and, in order to preserve it for America, they are asking Patriotic America if they will not honor Mothers' Day, May 13, by helping to preserve the home of Mary Washington, the Mother of George Washington, the Father of our Country. It is their desire to restore it exactly as it was when she lived there and they hope that every patriot will help in this important work which they feel must be done before the Bi-Centennial of George Washington's birth in 1932. Every dollar spent goes to the restoration of the Mary Washington house, the expenses are all taken care of locally.

In this restoration work Mr. Charles O. Cornelius, Associate Curator of the Metropolitan Museum, is graciously lending his assistance as Advisor. Miss Anna Marshall Braxton is Chairman of the Committee and the National Bank of Fredericksburg, Virginia, is the Treasurer.

The property once occupied the whole square with orchard and garden, kitchen and servants quarters. It was bought by Washington in September, 1772, from Michael and Esther Robinson and was a part of the original Kenmore Estate. The garden was separated from the Kenmore garden by a fence and gate and there was a box walk, a part of which is still standing.

Colonel Washington, with a realization of the danger brewing, tried to induce his mother to move in town from her home on the Rappahannock, opposite Fredericksburg, but it was not until March 1775 that she was persuaded. He was here then for a part of three days and he and Betty (Sister Lewis) moved her and her "things", still protesting, and made her comfortable in her new home. She grew to like living in town very much—to be near her church, her daughter and her neighbors made her very happy.

It was here that she received, the courier sent by General Washington to tell her of the victory at Trenton. It was here Washington came after the Battle of Yorktown with the French and American officers, and she received him with thanksgiving after his absence of nearly seven years. It was here he came in December 1783. Fredericksburg gave the Peace Ball in his honor, and it was at that time that he made his memorable reply to Mayor McWilliams in which he spoke of Fredericksburg as "the place of my growing infancy".

It was here that Marquis de LaFayette came to pay his respects to her who was the mother of the Greatest American. She received him in her garden, met all his fine phrases with dignity and gave him her blessing when he bade her good-bye. He said, "I have seen the only Roman matron of my day".

It was here, March 12, 1789, that Washington came to bid a sad farewell after he had received the notice that he had been elected President of the Nation. With prayers and tears they parted, knowing they would never meet again. She died August 25, 1789. Town and country assembled to do honor at her burial. Her remains lie in a spot she herself selected on the Kenmore Estate and a stately monument "erected by her countrywomen" marks her last resting place.

It was in May, 1890, that an Agent came from Chicago to buy this home, take it down and erect it again to grace the Columbian Exposition. The owner was willing to sell, but demanded a higher price. The Agent said he must write back to Chicago. In the meanwhile, Mrs. R. C. Beale, who occupied part of the house, had overheard the conversation. She thought quickly. The Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities had recently been formed, and Mrs. Joseph Bryan of Richmond was the President and sister-in-law of Mrs. Spottswood Carmichael, living here. She put on her bonnet( they wore bonnets in those days) and betook herself to the Carmichael home. Breathlessly she spoke, "Tucker, there is a man here from Chicago who wants to buy the Mary Washington House and take it to Chicago. It must not be allowed. Telegraph Belle Bryan and ask if she and her new Society can't save it". The telegram was sent. The answer was immediate, "Will give $4,500". The place was saved for Virginia and the Nation.

Immediately a Branch of the Association was formed here and every effort was made to pay back the money which Mrs. Bryan had advanced without interest. The place was rented for ten years until, with the help of the Central Branch in Richmond, the debt was cancelled.

After that, the house was opened to the public with a small fee. It has been furnished simply and cared for through all these years without any appeal to the public at large. Now there are vital repairs necessary. The house as it was when Washington bought it was the "Chamber", dining room and hall with a half story above. It is said that he built the "Great Room" and half story above on the other side of the hall for his mother's comfort.

The women of Fredericksburg and Virginia saved it for the Nation. They feel confident that the people of America will consider it a privilege to help in its restoration. They must have $5,000, they need more.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSES

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested that all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which so appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice eternal treasures, indeed—"Thy word have I hid in my heart" (Psalm 119:11).

This week the following verse was submitted by the Rev. William R. Savage, of Glendale Springs, N. C.:

> "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."—1 John 5:12.

Who will send one from the far-away places, as well as very near us?

Book Reviews

REPORT OF THE ANGLO-CATHOLIC CONGRESS, 1927 (London). Subject: THE HOLY EUCHARIST. Cloth. Pp. 232. Published by The Society of SS. Peter and Paul, Westminster House, London, England. Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wis., U. S. A.

The consideration of the central theme, led the speakers into a wide field of discussion, embracing the background of sacramental belief, the context of the Eucharist, the real Presence and the much-mooted question of the reserved sacrament. Undoubtedly, these addresses were framed with an intention to prepare the English people for the Revised Prayer Book.

One expects much from Father Waggett's "The Christian View of the World". But only one view is offered; and that the particular aspect of our Faith as embraced in this Anglo-Catholic controversy. It seems to lack the heart-hunger of the true saint of God for a lost and unreconciled humanity. However, we gain much from his concession on page three, "Of the differences between Christian thinkers, some are not theological, or even philosophical, but temperamental". On this we may hang our entire treatment of the vast world into which the papers lead us.

We dare not ignore the myriads of believers, who in the long-drawn retrospect, have lived glorious lives and died triumphant deaths, utterly oblivious of the exalted mysticism resident beneath this movement. No doubt many of them would have been impressed and perhaps convicted by the arguments now presented. But they got along without the doctrines and did not miss anything of the abiding faith in the salvation of the Lord Jesus and its accompanying ebbulition of joy. And today, the great mass of those "who profess and call themselves Christians" are living, working, rejoicing and dying in the "faith once for all delivered to the saints", oblivious of the accessories so highly prized and eloquently expounded by the Anglo-Catholic school.

Confessedly, the Church which we maintain holds a more than cold Zwinglianism regarding the Holy Communion. Even Andrew Murray, the astute Dutch Reformed Evangelical, averred, "We may receive as much from the Holy Communion as we have the faith to expect". There is abundance of room for the reception of sacramental grace; yea, for even physical life in the partaking of the symbols of the Body and Blood of our Lord, if anticipating faith counts upon it. And here Father Waggett is our mentor. It is a matter of temperament, plus education and environment. We are in agreement with him, and no doubt all of his compeers, in this allowance. And we have to plead that people be permitted to feel their way along this road to the sacred miracle. Some can never be persuaded that our Lord's sacrifice on the Cross may be constantly re-enacted on the altar by the manipulation of the hands of the priest. They will allow a spiritual presence, but halt indignantly at the threshold of the claim that in a sense more real than in any other spiritual experience, He is resident beneath the consecrated elements. Allowing for the reservation for the sick, growing out of troublous times in the life of the Church, they resent its being an object of worship. So we are brought face to face with the vital issue, "Let every man be persuaded in his own mind". This will afford room for all who love our Lord to "dwell together in unity".

One commendatory word remains to be said. These brethren are true to the ancient Creeds and to the doctrines delivered. In the face of the intellectual arrogance that is sweeping over the Christian world today, it were but just to recognize the part they are playing in holding the truth relative to the Person of Lord and His meritorious Cross and Passion. And there are not wanting in the communions outside of our own, hungry souls, who for compensation from the loss of birthright, through the sale of a modernistic mess of pottage, will welcome in some measure the principles upon which the Anglo-Catholic movement stands in growing strength.

REVEALING SCRIPTURE: By Frank Eakin, Ph. D. Cloth, Pp. 249. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York. Price, $2.25.

Another contribution to the study of comparative religions. It is well presented, exhaustively discussed. A valuable topical index provides added interest. It is illuminative for the common reader, not skilled in the sacred books of the East. Less profound than Dr. Saunders' "The Gospel for Asia", it supplies the ground-work for the larger study which Dr. Saunders' affords.

We are comforted by the author's assurance that while he aims to deal justly with the other religious books, claiming a place with our own Bible, he has a firm preference for the Hebrew-Christian Scriptures. And we may all stand with him in the contention that humanity inveterately has demanded some book as the basis of its faith in God and hope for future living.

But we have the same contention to offer regarding the speculative study of our Bible, as is constantly required in the discussion of the problem. What other book claiming inspiration can meet the challenge which this Book throws out? It insists that it is "The Word of God"; that it is forever established in heaven; that it lives and abides forever; that it is the means of spiritual regeneration; that it feeds the hungry soul; that it effectually works in the lives of those who receive it; that in its indwelling richness, it stimulates to spiritual joy (1 Peter 1:23; Ps. 119:89; Matt. 4:4; 1 Peter 2:2; 1 Thess. 2:13; Col. 3:16, 17). Viewed from the purely intellectual perspective, there is much that other sacred books have in common with it. Once elevate the Book to the plane which it demands, however, and the others sink into insignificance.

Moreover, if we look to the Bibles of the East, we find no such regenerative powers as our own assumes to present. If the horrors of "Mother India" are considered in the light of the hoary age of the Hindoo Scriptures; if we estimate the devastating rivers of blood that have flowed from believers in the Koran, we are compelled to admit that while Christianity is not wholly pure, these foul expressions of inhumanity are not in spite of the religions of their books, but because of them. There is not a crime in Christian America that is not rebuked by the Bible.

Furthermore, These sacred volumes do not deal with the problem of sin. There is no atonement; reconciliation with God is ever the quest; never the accomplished fact as is seen in Calvary's tragedy. And where is the Mohammedan who can say, "Mohammed lives in me"? Edwin Arnold beautifully paints the picture of India, supposedly elevating herself by Buddha "To Gautama has been given the stupendous task of the conquest of Humanity; and—though he discountenanced ritual, and declared himself, even when on the threshold of Nirvana, to be only what other men might become—the love and gratitude of Asia, disobeying his mandate, have given him fervent worship. Forests of flowers are daily laid upon stainless shrines, and countless millions of lips repeat daily the formula, 'I take refuge in Buddha'." When one considers the ecstacy of Christian joy in the possession of the resurrected Lord, what a shallow thing is Arnold's picture! And lastly, these books entirely lack the prophetical element, which makes up a large portion of the Hebrew Scriptures.

While we thank Dr. Eakin for his painstaking effort and prize his contribution for the value it possesses in the delineation of Oriental bibliography, we venture the hope that he will take from his Christian Bible the life-giving and hope-inspiring qualities with which it is forever equipped.

FIVE UNASSAILABLE DECLARATIONS.

"God says it.—I believe it.—That settles it." This is the Christian's attitude toward all the divine statements of the Bible.

"Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven". How is it with you?

"No one on his dying bed ever regretted having become a Christian." There's a reason!

"The natural (he that has not been transformed by the power of Christ) man hates God, tolerates his fellow man, and loves things"; the greatest among these latter being the thing called Self.

"They who are born only once will die twice, while they who are born twice, will die only once." This is no riddle. The explanation is easy. The former are those who have had only nature's physical birth, and who, not having been born again through faith in Christ's sacrifice will not only die, physically, but will also be separated from God forever, which constitutes the second death. The second class are those who have been born again, as the Saviour taught Nicodemus (John 3:1-21), and so become possessed at once of eternal life. Over such the second death has no power (Rev. 20:6).

REPLY TO VIRGINIA SEMINARY FACULTY.

Mr. Editor:

The Virginia Seminary's open letter to its Alumni, published in the Seminary Bulletin, can not fail to bring distress to many old graduates, as well as to many others who revere the traditions which have been established at the Seminary by five generations of loyalty to the Bible and Prayer Book.

In fifty words the Seminary (provided recent charges are without ground) could have reassured the General Church that the recent criticisms are without foundation. But instead of a direct and frank meeting of the questions, we are approached with a disingenuous letter—a letter studiously tactful and unquestionably evasive. The Seminary groups all the charges together and asks the public to believe that they are the echoes of certain aberrations on the part of The Southern Churchman. It then says, "Of all this the only thing that can be said is that it is untrue". It sounds convincing enough! By implication it is a denial of any and all charges. In effect it says, "No matter what has been said, or who said it, it isn't true. We have been defamed".

But the criticisms of the Seminary were definite. They were not ambiguous but were specific. A bill of particulars was suggested. The Seminary avoids the particulars and would say, "We have always been true in the past, therefore what you say now is untrue'.

We can appreciate the sense of dignity which prompts such a reply; but, unfortunately, certain facts (facts which are well known) make the Seminary's course open to the gravest kind of criticism.

Some of the criticisms are as follows:

1. That an extreme radical, in the person of Henry Sloane Coffin, was invited to be special lecturer. Does the Seminary deny this? Coffin is a man who bears a stamp of approval from the leading forces of Modernism. He represents an institution which is frankly radical and destructive, and which teaches that doctrines such as the Virgin Birth are non-essentials.

Now in the "GENERAL DENIAL", does the Seminary intend to say of this particular charge, "It isn't true". If the Seminary does not include this particular charge in its ambiguous "GENERAL DENIAL", then what, pray, is the point and purpose of the denial?

2. The definite charge has been made that the Old Testament criticism now taught at the Seminary is frankly and uncompromisingly radical in its nature. Conservative scholarship is not followed; and not only so but is ridiculed. The definite charge has been made that the notes given in that class represent the definitely destructive criticism that emanated from Germany and which has in its trail the wreckage of Christian faith.

The prophetic element in the Prophets is a matter for scoffing; the unity, the integrity and the inspiration of the Old Testament is generally denied. Surely this is specific and clear.

Does the Seminary intend to deny these allegations? Obviously not! It has no reference to such criticisms. Perhaps the notes taken in that class, notes given dogmatically as Gospel truth, make it impossible for a specific denial to be made.

To what, then, does the Seminary's letter of DENIAL refer? Not to the charges apparently!

There are at least two very subtle things in the Seminary's letter. The letter indicates that the charges have emanated from The Southern Churchman. And yet the Seminary faculty knows that the criticisms antedate by several years the date when The Southern Churchman changed hands. Indeed, the criticisms have been rather general. The attempt to divert attention by a counter-attack on The Southern Churchman is a course which should have been beneath the intent of the faculty. It is clever but questionable. The Southern Churchman (The Southern Churchman has not invited this letter; nor does the editor know that it is being written) has simply given a larger voice to a criticism that was widely current. What is more, the Seminary faculty knows this to be a fact. It is painful to have to state this.

The second subtlety is the charge that The Southern Churchman confessedly receives its inspiration from "such schools as the Moody Bible Institute". This is worthy of some attention. What, pray, is the matter (doctrinally) with the Moody Bible Institute? No doubt almost every Churchman would find himself in disagreement with the Moody Bible Institute over questions of Liturgical forms, Church Polity and Ritual. But so far as the major New Testament doctrines are concerned, the Moody Bible Institute follows the statements of the Apostle's and Nicene Creeds. On these the doctrines of the Church and of the Moody Bible Institute are in general agreement.

If the Virginia Seminary is in disagreement with the Moody Bible Institute over such questions as the Virgin Birth, the Deity of Jesus, the Atonement, the inspiration of the Bible, etc., then the Seminary confesses its deviation from the revealed truth of God's Holy Word.

We may say in closing, that when the Virginia Seminary can turn out men as well equipped to win men to Christ as are the graduates of the Moody Bible Institute, then all suspicions as to her loyalty to Christ and His Church will have been removed. But as long as the Virginia Seminary continues to turn out men who think it a mark of scholarship to sneer at holy things, just so long will men who are loyal to God and to His Holy Word offer protest.

What is the true meaning of a letter of general denial which very obviously does not refer to the specific charges? Is it not as though a man who was charged, say, with stealing, and lying, should reply, "I am an innocent man", but who, when cross examined, should say, "I am not, however alluding to the particular charges, and my general profession of innocence does not refer to the charges of stealing and lying".

The Seminary has not yet denied the charges. It might better have kept quiet.

SEVENTY SIGNERS.

Mr. Editor:

Speaking of the suggested changes by the Anglo-Catholic Party to be made in the Book of Common Prayer, I suggest, if they think they want a change of any kind, why don't they either go over to the Roman Church, or organize another to their liking, and let those who are loyal to the Protestant Episcopal Church keep the Prayer Book as it is. There are people leaving one denomination to join another every year, as that is their privilege. The first and most important thing is to be a Christian; then the next is to join the denomination where one can get closest to God. The services of the Protestant Episcopal Church have always impressed me more than those of any other denomination, because of their reverence for all sacred things in the Church, and because of the part the congregation has in the responses.

I have sometimes attended services where the rector has reprimanded his congregation because of their faint responses in the prayers, and has tried to tell them it was their service and that they ought to respond in an audible voice. From what I have read after you, I have no doubt of your loyalty to the Church, but neither need you have any doubt of mine so long as there is a Protestant Episcopal Denomination. So far as I am concerned I feel sure we have enough Episcopalians (loyal) to down this movement, but what I want to see is to have such a large majority at the next Convention in October at Washington that it will discourage the Catholic Party from suggesting any changes in the Prayer Book again for many years to come. Am doing what little I can to increase that majority, having gotten seventy signers to the petition from my St. Mark's Church here, Mr. Daniel G. Mackinnon, rector, who didn't hesitate to let his congregation know from the pulpit where he stood in plain language.

Am enclosing four signatures to you, and will try to get others who have not already been approached.

CONVICTION.

IMPLICIT CONFIDENCE.

Mr. Editor:

In connection with my recent letter commending your interesting paper, I wish to add that while I agree most heartily with respect to your opposition to the removal of the Thirty-Nine Articles from the Prayer Book, please do not construe it as approving of your position with respect to Dean Green of the Seminary. I have the most implicit confidence not only in him personally but in his conduct of the Seminary.

APPRECIATION.

Mr. Editor:

I am returning enclosed letter according to your request and thank you for your confidence.

Assuring you of my appreciation for your splendid work in upholding the teachings of the Seminary professors of my day and the dear clergy and laymen of Richmond as I knew them, especially my beloved rector, Dr. Peterkin, I am,

Mr. Editor:

Enclosed you will find my signature to the petition to the General Convention at Washington for the retention of the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion in the Book of Common Prayer. I feel that The Southern Churchman is rendering a service to the Church of an inestimable value, which is appreciated by every layman loyal to the faith and its doctrines, as enunciated in the Thirty-Nine Articles. Let the slogan be, Thou shalt not Pass Romeward.

With the militant activity of The Southern Churchman in arousing the laity to its sense of duty, the battle, I feel, is won.

Long live The Southern Churchman.

"I ALWAYS RECOMMEND."

Mr. Editor:

It is with the greatest pleasure and interest that I read your marvelous paper—veritable "Defender of the Faith"—and uncompromising, inflexible "Rock of Gibraltar"—and staunch upholder of the true Protestant traditions of our Grand Old Church, against which the puny efforts of these monkey souled modernists are hurled in vain.

It makes me laugh the way you completely checkmate and non-plus the opponents of the true faith in every issue of your paper.

I have often been asked to recommend a Church paper to those who are desiring of such, and in my official capacity at this school I always recommend your weekly with keen delight.

With kindest personal wishes for your continued success, I am,

NO LONGER OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Mr. Editor:

I am in receipt of a letter from a very able lawyer in an important city, who was very active in his parish and was its Treasurer. This letter is merely illustrative of many I am receiving from different parts of the country and furnishes startling evidence of the results of the labors of the "Anglco-Catholic" or "Back to Rome" Party in the Church. I do not give the name or location, as I have not asked permission of the writer of this letter so to do.

The letter reads:

Mr. C. L. Marsilliot,
Exchange Building,
Memphis, Tenn.

Dear Sir:

As I am no longer a communicant of the Episcopal Church, I am returning herewith enclosed the petition which you sent me for circularization. As an outsider, I extend you. however, my best wishes in the success of your undertaking. Too much ritual, too much ceremonious bowing and scraping, too much cut-to-measure religion, and an over-abundance of hypocrisy disgusted me with the whole thing, and I therefore withdrew more than two years ago.

Yours very truly,

———————.

This letter speaks most eloquently for itself.

Mr. Editor:

May I express my appreciation and gratitude for your deserved castigation of both Bishop Darlington and the Editor of the Churchman in The Southern Churchman for April 14?

REPORT OF NATIONAL COUNCIL MEETING.

Discussion of the Report in the Department of Missions and the Council meeting April 25 and 26, centered chiefly upon the question of educational policy. The following statement as a policy for the immediate future was decided by a practically unanimous vote:

China.

Whereas, it is not the function of the Church, as it endeavors to make our Lord known in non-Christian lands, to build up a system of purely secular education; and

Whereas, under the regulations of the various governments of China for the registration of schools, the liberty of Christian worship and instruction in schools is seriously curtailed;

Therefore, the National Council informs the Bishops in China that in view of the present unsettled conditions it cannot authorize the registration of our Schools, but hopes that at least some of the Schools may be carried on without registration; and

Further, that, whenever a stable government shall be established and a national system of education be in effective operation, it will consider sympathetically any regulations regarding private schools, supported in whole or in part by this Church, which may be formulated by the Government.

That educational institutions supported in whole or in part by the aid of the Church in the United States shall not register with the Government if the use of the "Sun Yat Sen Ceremony", or the teaching of the San Min Chu I is required by the Government.

That until the above conditions can be complied with, no authorization be given to registering any educational institutions, supported in whole or in part by the aid of the Church in the United States.

That the Department of Missions instruct the secretary to confer further with the bishops in China concerning the possibility of conducting all educational work of college or university grade in one institution and report to the Department of Missions as soon as possible.

To the Synod of the Sheng Kung Hui, which was being held April 21 to 28 in China, the Council sent its greetings and its prayer for the welfare of China.

The Executive Secretary of the Department of Missions was requested to send to the Presbyterian Board an expression of the sympathy of the members of the National Council for the death of Dr. Walter F. Seymour, one of their missionaries killed by a Chinese soldier in Tsining, Province of Shantung.

In the distribution of the undesignated legacies of 1927, owing to the absence of the Executive Secretary of the Department of Missions, a portion was set aside for distribution in the Foreign and Latin American fields, awaiting his return. The Department of Missions took up the consideration of this matter and recommended to the National Council that appropriations be made from this fund for buildings in the District of Kyoto, North Tokyo and Tohoku in Japan, the Philippine Islands, Liberia and Cuba.

The Bishop of Porto Rico presented a plan for the concentration of work at San Juan, taking in the present parish church of St. John's, which is used by the resident Americans, the Chapel of St. Luke, in which two distinct congregations worship, i. e.: the Spanish-speaking people and the colored people, and St. Catherine's Training School. A good part of the money is in hand as a result of the sale of property no longer necessary and gifts of interested friends, and the plan was approved by the Department of Missions and the Council. It is necessary to raise at least $25,000 additional, and the Bishop of Porto Rico was authorized to make this appeal.

A loan of approximately $1,000 had been made to congregation of St. John's Church, North Tokyo. This was to be repaid from income which the congregation had expected to receive from the sale of property, but owing to the earthquake this expectation failed. The congregation had done so splendidly in its own behalf that the Department of Missions and the Council felt that they could do nothing less than match the generosity of St. John's people, and cancelled the loan.

When the native Diocese of Tokyo and Osaka were erected, a small appropriation was made, with the understanding that it would be decreased automatically each year until extinguished. There has been steady growth during the past five years in these dioceses, with a twenty-five per cent increase in communicants and with steady increase in contributions. The work has been extended to hitherto unevangelized districts. Our expectations as to the value of the Japanese Episcopal leadership have been amply justified. Upon the above statement to the Council by Bishop Tucker, former Bishop of Kyoto, and the recommendation of the Commission, which visited Japan also, that it would mean a great deal to those two native dioceses if the automatic decrease in appropriations might be suspended for a short while to give them the small amount appropriated for the extension of the work, the Council unanimously voted that these automatic decreases should be suspended for the next three years.

In Shanghai there is a school for the children of foreign missionaries, which is supported by contributions from the various mission boards. Bishop Graves had requested several times that our Church make an appropriation for the erection of buildings. The Council had hitherto felt unable to do this. There is a fund in China known as the Hongkew Lease Rentals, being the income from property purchased many years ago, which is used for extension work in the three dioceses in China. Bishop Graves was authorized to make an appropriations from this fund to add to a similar appropriation from undesignated legacies to enable our Church to do its share in supporting this splendid work.

The Commission to China, having also visited Japan, and inspected the work of St. Margaret's School in North Tokyo, and the need for the erection of the new buildings to take the place of those destroyed in the earthquake, recommended to the Council that the Bishop be authorized to proceed at once with the erection of the academic and science buildings, with equipment, the assembly hall, with music and art rooms, with equipment, and to provide the water, sewerage, roads, etc., for the entire plant. Part of the money for this purpose is in hand, and the Council approved the plan of the Bishop to proceed at once with these buildings.

Through the efforts of Dr. Teusler, St. Barnabas' Hospital in Osaka has been reopened, and the Council expressed to him its great appreciation for the effort he has made to bring about this happy event.

A request had been received some time ago from the authorities of the Church in India and the Church Missionary Society of England, that the Church in the United States undertake missionary work in India. This had been referred to a committee which had given much study to the question. The committee regretfully recommended that the request of the authorities of the Church in India be declined for the following reasons:

1. The Church in the United States is responsible for missionary fields at home and abroad, in which there are pressing needs and incalculable opportunities and these fields are our first responsibility.

2. By reason of the failure to secure from our people contributions sufficient for present needs, the necessity is laid upon us year by year to reduce appropriations and to forego advance work which is necessary to the success of work already begun.

3. To enter a new field under present conditions would seem to be unwise and to jeopardize further our present undertakings, especially a field such as India for which the Church in the United States is not primarily responsible.

While the report of the committee was adopted, a resolution was passed authorizing the appointment of a committee to study the whole question and bring the matter to the attenion of General Convention.

The Venerable Doctor E. A. Ashley of South Dakota has completed fifty-four years of continuous service on behalf of the Indians in that missionary district. The Department of Missions and the Council sent its affectionate greetings and congratulations to him, and requested the Presiding Bishop to symbolize in some appropriate way the Council's heartfelt appreciation.

A notable meeting was held in Kansas City, Mo., on April 18 and 19, at which the Bishops of the missionary districts as well as the bishops of the dioceses received appropriations from the National Council were present. This was in accordance with the recommendation of the Evaluation Committee.

To the Bishops and Chairmen of Diocesan Commissions of Evangelism.

It gives us much pleasure to announce that the Rev. Wm. H. Milton, D. D., has consented to serve as Assistant Chairman of the National Commission on Evangelism, and, beginning September 1, will give his full time to the work of the Commission until the beginning of Lent, 1929.

As you doubtless know, the Chairman of the Commission has given a great deal of his time to the direction of the Bishops' Crusade and the follow-up work in connection with same during the past two years, but he now feels that he must devote more of his time to his own diocese, and for that reason it became necessary to secure an outstanding clergyman of the Church who could relieve the Chairman of a large part of his duties and responsibilities in connection with the forward program of the Commission.

We are especially fortunate to have secured Dr. Milton for this important post, and his vestry has very graciously tendered him a six months' leave of absence in order that he may give that time to the direction of the Commission's program during the coming fall and winter.

The headquarters of the commission will remain in Wilmington, N. C., but beginning immediately after the General Convention, Dr. Milton will open a branch office at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, in order that he may keep in closer touch with the Church and be more accessible to those who desire his services.

Requests for the services of the Rev. W. J. Loaring Clark, D. D., General Missioner, and Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, Field Worker, should be sent to the National Commission at Wilmington, N. C.

Dr. Milton is too well known in the Church to need any detailed description of his life and ministry. Suffice it to say that he is entering upon his work for the Commission with the same zeal and enthusiasm and practical efficiency that has characterized his work in other departments of the Church's life.

We trust that you will allow him to serve you in any way in his power in your plans for emphasizing the place and purpose of Evangelism in your diocese.

The First Organiaztion of the Church to Have a National Center in Washington.

The Girls' Friendly Society in America announces the opening on April 2 of its National Center at 1533 New Hampshire Avenue, Washington, D. C.

In November, 1923, the National Council of the Girls' Friendly Society in America met in Baltimore. Previous to that meeting, the plan for raising $100,000 for the Washington National Center was presented to the Presiding Bishop and National Council of the Church, and was approved by them. In Baltimore, backed by the approval of the Church, the matter was placed before the National Council of the Girls' Friendly Society in America, which is composed of duly accredited representatives from the dioceses throughout the country. In this way, the question of the Washington National Center, together with the method of raising the fund, was put to vote and was passed by an overwhelming majority.

The House is purchased, and is free of all indebtedness. The plan to raise $50,000 for an Endowment Fund has not yet been realized, as the Fund is about $18,000 short.

On the day the National Center opened its doors to guests, Miss Sarah Bennett Hopkins, the chairman of this undertaking since the beginning four years ago, was laid to rest in Worcester, Mass. In memory of Miss Hopkins, this fund is to be called the Sarah Bennett Hopkins Memorial Fund.

The purpose of the Washington National Centre is to provide a National Center from which the objects and activities of the Society can be made known; to offer hospitality to its Members and Association as transient guests, and to other women who may be going to Washington.

It is hoped that the cooperating organizations of the Church will avail themselves of this opportunity. Especially does the Girls' Friendly Society in America wish the women of the Church to know of this Center in the City of Washington, to which they will be accorded a most cordial welcome.

During the General Convention the Presiding Bishop, assisted by the Bishop of Washington, will dedicate this National Center to the uses for which it is intended.

Spring Meeting.

The Rappahannock Valley Convocation met May 9-10 at St. John's Church, South Farnham Parish, Tappahannock, the Rev. H. S. Osburn, rector.

The services opened with Corporate Communion, Wednesday morning. The Rev. George C. Shaw, of Mathews, Va., preached the sermon. All the clergy except one was present, and thirteen parishes had lay representatives.

In the afternoon the session was turned over to the Layman's Association, with its President, Mr. Robert Beverley, in the chair.

It was urged that an effort be made to get the association to function locally as does the Woman's Auxiliary; and a committee was appointed to arrange programs for the local sessions. Those appointed to act with the president, were J. M. Lewis, Blake Newton, E. F. Barnes, Jr.

A motion to ask the Diocesan Council to redistribute the parishes of Convocations of the Diocese was carried.

At the evening service the Rev. Wm. Presley Bell, D. D., of the Virginia Theological Seminary, addressed the Convocation, his subject being, "The Existing Unity in the Light of Lausanne Conference".

On Thursday morning Dr. G. Freeland Peter, of St. James' Church, Richmond, held a Quiet Hour, and later made an address in behalf of the Board of Religious Education. As the outcome of this address the following motion was carried:

Be It Resolved, That in view of the work which the Board of Religious Education is called upon to do, and in view of the fact that the amount granted the Board by the Diocese is not sufficient to carry forward the work effectively, therefore we approve the suggestion of the Board to ask the Sunday Schools of the Diocese for sufficient money to provide a Field Secretary to help carry on the work."

A vote of thanks was awarded Dr. Peter for his timely address and a copy of these resolutions ordered sent to him.

At the noon hour the Rev. E. R. Dyer, of China, addressed the Convocation, giving some of the reasons for the recent uprising in China.

At the next business meeting it was resolved, "That it is the sense of the Convocation that it would be unwise to omit the Thirty-Nine Articles from the Prayer Book".

Mr. Robert Beverley moved:

"In view of the fact that there has been some controversy in The Southern Churchman on the conditions at the Virginia Seminary that have been subjects of criticism, that we express out utmost confidence in the statement of our beloved Bishop, and the written statement signed by the Faculty of the Seminary, that conditions at the Seminary are at present entirely satisfactory." A copy of this resolution was ordered sent to the Dean of the Seminary.

The Rev. Dudley Boogher and Mr. Blake Newton were nominated to represent the Convocation on the D. M. S. Board.

The Convocation adjourned to meet in the fall at St. John's Church, Warsaw, time to be set by the Dean in conference with the secretary and rector.

Consecration of the First Chapel of Remembrance: Middle River Mission.

On Friday, May 4, at eleven o'clock, the Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker consecrated the Chapel of Remembrance at Middle River, Va. This Chapel has been built in one of the most remote parts of the Archdeaconry of the Blue Ridge, in District Number Six, which is under the charge of the Rev. David H. Lewis. The funds were raised largely by the Mountain Missions Mite Society, which was organized by Miss Marcelyn Buxton, of Baltimore, Md., when she was a child of twelve. She has succeeded so well in interesting people in the Mountain work that the Society has built in six years' time a large stone Mission House in the Ragged Mountains near Charlottesville and this stone Chapel, each building costing five thousand dollars, and they are now raising funds for a Second Chapel of Remembrance.

The Fourth of May will live long in the memories of those who were privileged to attend the ceremony of consecration. There were four clergy beside the Bishop in the procession; the Ven. W. Roy Mason, the Rev. W. Clayton Torrence, the Ven. F. W. Neve, and the Rev. Nelson Page Dame. Many friends of the Mission both from the surrounding country and the other missions, and from the outside, were present.

The chapel is of the native rock of the hillsides and was built by native workmen under the direction of the Ven. W. Roy Mason. It is furnished with a stone altar, pulpit and font of the same variegated brownish grey native rock. The windows open casement-wise upon entrancing views of woods and hills and blossoming dogwoods.

After the service of consecration the Bishop confirmed the four persons from the community and preached a sermon which will be remembered by all who heard it. He spoke of the Beauty of Holiness, and as he spoke the soft sweet songs of birds and of the river mingled with his words and added their praises to the loveliness of the blossoming trees. One could but feel that the Beauty of Holiness was very real.

If you ever ride that way, you will come to a turn in the road and suddenly you will be confronted with what seems like a mirage; on the mountain side above the racing, singing river, this marvelous piece of stone work, the Chapel of Remembrance. If it be a week day you may wonder where there could be found a congregation in that seemingly deserted spot, but if it be a Sunday you will see the place filled with people, for this is the only place of worship in that whole region, this beautiful thing which the Church has placed there to preach silently the "Beauty of Holiness".

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Archdeacon of Georgia.

Appointment has just been made of the Rev. C. C. J. Carpenter, rector of Grace Church, Waycross, as Archdeacon of Georgia, giving part time service, continuing as rector of his parish, and to act as assistant to the Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese. Some time ago decision was reached by the Executive Council that Bishop Reese should have aid in the administration of diocesan affairs, and at the recent diocesan convention, the matter was referred to Standing Committee for immediate action. Rev. Mr. Carpenter is a native of Augusta, Ga., and is a grandson of the late Charles Colcock Jones, noted Georgia historian. Mr. Carpenter was ordained deacon in December, 1925, in St. John's Church, Savannah, by the Bishop of the Diocese, and was advanced to the priesthood in his own parish, the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta, in June, 1926, when he became rector of Grace Church, Waycross. He is a graduate of Princeton University, and received his theological training at the Virginia Seminary. He is a young man of exceptional attainments, and the appointment is considered one of distinct advance in the diocese. He will have supervision of all missions. When Mr. Lloyd Clark, who is now finishing his theological course at the University of the South, is ordained deacon in the late summer, he will be assistant minister at Grace Church, and will have charge of the missions in Chatham County, Ga.

Endowment Fund.

An endowment fund of $60,000 has recently been made to the Diocese of Georgia by Mrs. Margaret S. Byllesby, of Chicago, for settlement work in the mill district of Augusta, Ga. This gift was made through Deaconess Ruth E. Byllesby, of Roxbury, Conn., who returned to the diocese last October, having served at Christ Church, Augusta, some years ago, and who is now giving her services at that mission. The endowment is to be known as "The Henry M. and Margaret S. Byllesby Fund", the interest of which is to be used for the work as long as it is in existence, and if it is ever abandoned, the money can then be used at the diecretion of the Bishop of the Diocese. This magnificent and unexpected gift will make Christ Church mission even more effective in the district where it tis located. Since coming to Augusta last fall, Deaconess Byllesby has been doing notable work. Her specialty is kindergarten work, and a room in the parish house was fitted up for her use in that field. The Rev. Jackson H. Harris, rector of the Church of the Atonement, Augusta, is vicar of Christ Church.

A Memorial in St. John's, Camden.

On the Second Sunday after Easter a new clergy stall that had been placed in the chancel of St. John's Church by Mrs. A. A. Tufts, was dedicated. The inscription on a little brass plate placed where it is almost invisible reads: "To the Glory of God and as a Thank Offering for the Faithful Ministrations of the Rev. Randolph Royall Claiborne".

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop.

On Easter Day the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, the Rev. Chas. A. Ashby, rector, broke ground for its new church edifice, which will complete its $598,000 plant, making this one of the largest and most thoroughly equipped church plants in the South.

The campaign for the new church was started on Easter Sunday, 1927. What is known as the "silent method" was used—no one being seen, but literature being sent to those interested in the parish, asking that, if they cared to share the privilege of the undertaking, they would respond on Easter. There was a widespread and splendid response, and the architects were directed to proceed with the plans. Mellen Greeley of Jacksonville, and Carbusier and Foster, of Cleveland, Ohio, are the architects for the church. Both firms are expert in this line and the result of their talent has been the promise of a handsome and beautiful building. The contract for the building has been awarded to A. Bentley and Sons Company, of Jacksonville, who are now at work.

The new church will be of stone, the sanctuary paved with marble, the aisles of handsome tile, and the space under the pews of rubber tile. The church be made for a choir of sixty. The buildwill seat about 1,000. Provision will ing is Gothic. On each side of the chancel will be an organ. A large working sacristy, choir rooms, rector's study, music rooms and a library are provided. The contract calls for completion by February 15 next, and it is expected that by next Easter the church will be in use. Many beautiful memorials have been given to the parish for the new building.

The first unit of the parish, now used as a gymnasium, was erected in 1918. Here services were first held. In 1921, the second unit, which contains the chapel, club rooms, swimming pool, guild halls, kitchen, offices and Sunday-school departments, was added. In 1925 two additional large halls for departments of the Church School were built, thereby giving the parish one of the most complete parish-houses in the South, and making an investment of over $350,000 in buildings. The Church of the Good Shepherd has specialized in its Sunday School and young people's work, and has one of the largest and most efficient schools in the Episcopal Church. Its present enrollment being nearly 1,200. Its swimming, basket ball, baseball, track and football teams are outstanding organizations. The young people are taught in the parish to render many services to the General Church, to the Diocese of Florida and to the community in which they live. At the present time the parish house is used for the church services—this is an auditorium, seating about eight hundred people. The parish has about 1,400 communicants.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

Ancient Churches Visited.

Bishop Guerry on Sunday, May 13, visited and conducted services in St. James, Santee, and old Christ Church, near Charleston, two of the oldest Episcopal Churches in the United States. Both the parishes were created in 1706. The original Christ Church was built in 1708, but was partly destroyed by fire, although the walls are yet standing. St. James, Santee, was built in 1768.

The Charleston Convocation met at Mt. Pleasant, Monday and Tuesday, May 14 and 15. The Rev. W. B. Sams, of Mt. Pleasant, who is rector also of the two old parishes, was present. The Rev. A. W. Shardon of St. Jude's, Walterboro, conducted the opening services and preached.

New Rector Arrives.

The Rev. G. F. Cameron, new rector of Christ Church, Charleston, S. C., has taken charge of the parish and on May 13 conducted an open-air meeting under auspices of the Laymen's Evangelistic Brotherhood, in Hampton Park, Charleston. Mr. Cameron was called from Ayden, N. C. He is a B. A. of the University of Virginia and graduate of the Episcopal Theological Seminary at Alexandria. He succeeds at Christ Church the Rev. Roderick H. Jackson, who has gone as missionary to Japan.

Discussing Rural Work.

The Pee Dee convocation of South Carolina met at Stateburg, May 17-18 in the historic church of the Holy Cross. Bishop Guerry led the discussion of the main business of the convocation, which was the extension of rural work. The Rev. H. W. Fereman, of New York, Secretary of the Division for Rural Work of the National Council of the Episcopal Church, was present and participated. Plans were formed for prosecuting rural work systematically and energetically.

The Church of the Holy Cross was built in 1788 on land given by General Sumter. It was incorporated by act of the General Assembly, its incorporators including the vestries and wardens of Episcopal churches in the parishes of St. Luke, St. Mathew, St. George, Winyah, St. Stephen's and St. James, Goose Creek, Claremont, and St. Helena Island.

Daughters of the King.

The Twenty-first Diocesan Assembly of the Order of the Daughters of the King of Southern Virginia, convened in old St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, on Thursday, May 10.

Holy Communion was celebrated and a Quiet Hour Meditation conducted by the Rev. Norman E. Taylor.

The business session was held in the parish hall, the diocesan president, Mrs. E. P. White, presiding. Sixty-three delegates and a number of visitors were present.

Treasurer's report showed a total of cash on hand and receipts of $320.50; total disbursements, $244.03, leaving a balance in bank of $76.47.

The Chapter reports show that the Daughters of the King in this diocese are active in every department of the work of the Church. A total of 3,783 visits were made during the year to the sick, in homes and hospitals, to shut-ins, and institutions. Five hundred and thirty-seven persons, including strangers, were spoken to in church by the Daughters; fourteen persons brought to Confirmation; thirteen to Baptism, and seven children to the Church Schools; $238.04 was disbursed for charitable purposes, and four hundred and fifty-nine magazines were distributed.

The Rev. Newton Middleton, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, in this city, made an interesting address, and bade the Daughters an official good-bye, as he will leave July 1 for Jacksonville, Fla., where he will assume the rectorship of St. John's Church.

Our national president, Mrs. A. A. Birney, who was to have made an address at this Assembly, was prevented from coming, but sent a message which was read by the diocesan secretary.

The by-laws were amended, changing the time of our annual meeting from the month of May to the month of April, at some date after Easter to be arranged by the Executive Board.

The following were elected as delegates and alternates to the triennial meeting of the Order of the Daughters of the King, in Washington, in October of this year:

Delegate, Mrs. E. P. White; alternate, Mrs. John A. Scott; delegate, Mrs. H. L. Addison; alternate, Mrs. A. LeB. Ribble.

The election of officers resulted as follows: President, Mrs. A. LeB. Ribble, 3025 Vendome Place, Norfolk; Vice-President, Mrs. L. A. Plummer, 524 South Street, Portsmouth; Secretary, Mrs. J. S. Moore, 512 Hampton Place, Portsmouth; Treasurer, Mrs. Thomas R. Johnson, 1513 Lafayette Building, Norfolk.

After supper, served by Bishop Randolph Chapter, and a social hour, an evening service was held in the church, the speaker being the Rev. M. S. Eagle.

The rector, Dean Peacock, formerly of Christ Church Cathedral, Mexico City, conducted a Retreat in Christ Church, Norfolk, under the auspices of the Daughters of the King, on Wednesday, May 9. The Quiet Day commenced with an Early Celebration and Meditation. The rector gave five addresses on the following subjects: Prayer; World Peace; Missions; Faith and Love.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett. D. D., Bishop

The Church School Lenten Offering.

In the afternoon of Sunday, April 22, a Diocesan Lenten Offering service was held in St. John's Church, Roanoke. In addition to the members present from the Sunday Schools of Christ Church, St. John's and St. Peter's in Roanoke, there were large delegations from St. Paul's at Lynchburg, St. Paul's at Salem and Grace Church, Radford and two representatives of R. E. Lee Memorial at Lexington.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Messrs. Alfred R. Berkeley and Sumner Guerry of St. John's, Roanoke, and the singing was led by the combined junior choirs of Christ Church and St. John's. The Rev. G. Otis Mead of Christ Church made a brief address and the Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey of St. John's, Wytheville, spoke most interestingly of his recent visit to the Holy Land. It had not been possible to obtain reports on the Lenten Offering from all the schools in the diocese, but the tabulation of those heard from indicated that the final diocesan total should closely approach, if not equal, the figure of last year, which was $5,929.41.

The three banners awarded in 1927 were returned and re-awarded at this service. That for the largest total offering from a school was surrendered by Christ Church, Roanoke, and awarded to St. Paul's, Lynchburg. That for the largest average contribution per member of school was won by St. Peter's, Altavista, the same that won this banner last year. The banner for the greatest percentage of increase in school offering over the previous year was transferred from Trinity Mission, Richlands, to Christ Church, Pearisburg.

The Rev. Mr. Guerry to Supply at Lexington.

The Rev. Sumner Guerry who, since September, 1927, has served as Assistant Minister at St. John's Church, Roanoke, under the Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, rector, acceded to a request that he take temporary charge of R. E. Lee Memorial Church at Lexington, Va., beginning the first Sunday in May.

Mr. Guerry was for a number of years a missionary in China, being stationed at Yangchow most of the time, and it is probable that he will be called back to China during the coming summer or fall. Thus it would not be possible for him to accept a rectorship in America at this time.

The church at Lexington is at present without a rector o naccount of the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Churchill J. Gibson, effective April 15, to accept a call to St. Mary's at Ardmore, Pa.

Mr. Guerry is a son of the Rt. Rev. William A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of South Carolina. During his stay in Roanoke he has made many friends who will realize with pleasure that Lexington is not far away and that thus it may be possible to see a great deal of him still before he leaves to take up again his work in the foreign field.

College of Preachers' Cornerstone.

The cornerstone of the College of Preachers, attached to the Washington Cathedral, was laid Thursday, May 17, the ceremony being in conjunction with the annual meeting of the National Cathedral Association at Mt. St. Alban's. Representatives of the sixty-two committees of the association, which now has membership of more than 6,000, were present. The Holy Communion was administered at ten A. M. at Bethlehem Chapel. The opening address was by Bishop Freeman, of Washington, who was followed by William R. Castle, assistant secretary of state, and former Senator Pepper of Pennsylvania. The cornerstone was laid at three P. M. The immediate erection of the college is made possible by a recent gift from a layman of $250,000, and the existence of an endowment fund yielding $50,000 annually. General John J. Pershing is chairman of the Cathedral Committee.

Imperishable Record of Givers.

Since 1893, when the building of the Cathedral at Washington began, more than 27,000 persons have contributed for the work, the gifts varying from a few dollars to more than half a million, and the names of all givers are to be recorded imperishably. They are written with fadeless India ink, made from a formula obtained from the Library of Congress, in a series of volumes called "The Book of Remembrances". Each volume contains one hundred and eight pages of hot pressed linen paper, more lasting than the best parchment, and all will be bound in cream colored vellum and placed in a richly carved niche in the sanctuary of the building. Thirteen volumes have been filled thus far, the total gifts exceeding $7,000,000. They include gold wedding rings, to be melted for the Holy Communion service, rare laces for the altar, stones of historic association to be incorporated with the building, valued paintings. One name to be included is that of a workman who gave a month of his labor.

The name of the book carrying the names is suggested by a verse of Malachi: "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard of it and a

Whitsunday.

Rev. J. J. Clopton.

The wonderful happenings of the first Whitsunday are naturally expected as they marked a definite spiritual epoch. The nature of them (fire and wind) are likewise natural as foreshadowing mighty upheavals in the spiritual realm.

The Lesson of Pentecost is primarily a witness of Christ's Exaltation and permanent headship and guidance of His Church.

Christ's instructions to His disciples in the promise of the Holy Ghost, and His reminder just before His ascension, point directly to this continued guidance by the Spirit.

Pentecost also is a witness of larger spiritual power and vision.

The Apostles' conception of religion was ceremonial, rather than spiritual. Their conception of the Kingdom was National rather than Universal. Their attitude in time of spiritual testing was cowardice rather than courage.

Pentecost is the witness of world-wide fruitage of spiritual gifts, both as regards Christ's intention and power as Redeemer. The charge of Christ to them, "Ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem and in Judea and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth", stretched in Christ's intention, the bounds of the Kingdom to the ends of the earth, as well as guaranteed the power for its accomplishment. The Old Testament Church was local, both in its experiences and in its outlook. Occasionally disciples, like Simeon and Anna caught the world mission to the untried apostles. Go ye into all the world and make disciples of all nations; all power is given unto me in heaven and in earth.

It is spiritual power. "Not by power nor by might, but by My spirit", saith the Lord. Faith in and use of spiritual power through God the Holy Ghost, means world redemption.

The Joy of the Lord.

The Lord Jesus was the man of sorrows, yet He was the most joyous man that ever walked this earth. He Himself said that the little disciple band was like a wedding party. And if that were so it was because He Himself was the life and soul of the group of friends. Upon Him rested the burden of the sin of the world. Over His consciousness loomed always the shadow of the Cross. Yet His presence radiated serenity and gladness for the hearts of the friends with whom He lived and the crowds who gathered round Him. "As He is, so are we in this world." So ought we to be, so may we be. The Christian life is not to be one immune from care, though it is to be care free. "Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you." And you and I may learn by His grave to be object-lessons of what He can do for frail ordinary folks who have no resources of goodness or strength of our own. And thus our own inadequacy becomes the brighter foil to set off His power as men see that we can exhibit a joy quite irrepressible, spontaneous, overflowing into other lives, that joy of the Lord Jesus which is our Strength.—Rev. J. Russell Howden.

What Makes Life Worthwhile?

Louis Deschamps.

In all the blind groping of an intellectualized approach to the mysteries of life, there runs the plaintive note of cynical melancholy expressed in the form of a question: what makes life worthwhile? And while philosophers, wise and otherwise, wreck their minds in the strain of many ologies, many humble, unobserved people are living lives of proclaiming the answer to such a question and many great men of past and present demonstrate the worthwhileness of life. A recent study of suicides has revealed the interesting fact that locomotive engineers have the lowest suicide rate of all occupations. This suggests that the glamour and responsibility of such work must give the desired interest and zest. The engineer not only feels that he has a definite duty to perform, but also keeps alive a priceless sense of adventure and glamour in the never-failing achievement of the successful run. In short, he feels that life demands of him a steadfast, efficient work; and he cherishes with pride hi sresponse to the ideals of his calling.

The difference between happiness and boredom is essentially a matter of enthusiasm. To be animated and inspired by some dynamic conception, derived from one's own personal convictions, is to find the meaning of life. Critics argue that religion and idealism offer only a sporadic, emotional power, and that one can not remain "up in the clouds" indefinitely. But one does not have to be in a blissful state of ecstatic joy to perceive meaning to life A dying man once told his sons that his greatest bequest to them was the honor of their name, the valiant ideals of virile, Christian living to which he had pledged his own life, in spite of failures. Life is ultimately significant in proportion to the immortal ideals one cherishes and persistently strives to achieve.

How can one answer for himself the vital question of what makes life worthwhile? The imagination is a great factor—imagination to feel the pride of duty, to picture the beauty of that ancient conception of noblesse oblige, literally to fire the mind and soul with inspiring ideals and zest for knowledge. And that mysterious element of glamour or romance so essential to prevent monotony, that too comes from imagination. Strives to succeed in catching the viewpoint of the engineer, or of the navigator, or of the soldier toward the duties of life, and one finds that many apparently burdensome morals are as alive with adventure as the alluring evils.
